We crossed Queen Victoria Street, then passed Rosenberg Plaza on the north side. We went down Bucklersbury and across Walbrook, then through a narrow alley in-between Mansion House and St. Stephen’s, a beautiful Christopher Wren-designed church almost completely obscured on all sides by tall office buildings. I wanted to go in and check it out for a minute. But the front door was locked, and there was a sign posted saying it was closed for repairs. So we took one more left around one more building, and then we were there, standing in front of the place where the Rothschild family had been running their global finance empire for over two centuries.

We opened the front door and walked into the reception area, which was a gigantic, virtually empty space with a ceiling oddly identical to the floor, looking like blond wood paneling. We found the elevators, but they were locked. Behind us, someone cleared his throat. It was a Hawaiian-looking man with broad shoulders, dressed in a dark suit, with a white cord dangling from his left ear. He was standing at the security desk. We walked up to him.

“Hi, I’m Pamela Auger,” I said. “And this is—”

“Agent Chesterfield, I know,” he said, interrupting me. He showed us a touch-screen tablet he was carrying, with pictures of us both, as well as several others. I recognized mine as my Facebook profile picture. The one of Chesterfield matched the one on his Security Service badge. I wondered how they got it.

Chesterfield looked alarmed. The man motioned for us to autograph a sign-in sheet on his desk.

“Let me help you with the elevator,” the guard said. He used a card carried in a lanyard around his neck to unlock the elevator, then punched the floor number, which I don’t recall. When the doors opened, he stepped in with us, and rode all the way up.

When the doors opened again, we found ourselves in yet another vast empty room. There was almost nothing in it except one long wooden table, positioned a few feet away from the far wall, at which several people were already seated. One of them was Rosenberg. He was talking to Marcia Martina.

Most remarkable of all were the walls around us. They were incredibly tall, all glass, with a magnificent view of the city on all sides of us. It was like being on top of Mount Olympus. Indeed, I'm certain that's what it was designed to feel like. The side that the table was placed on looked out over the roof of Rosenberg Plaza, which, at only ten stories tall, was quite a ways beneath us. The setting sun reflected off the sunroof with a reddish pink glow.

This must be the 'Sky Box' Chesterfield mentioned, I thought to myself.

Chesterfield made his arm into a bow, into which I inserted my own, and then he led me over to where Rosenberg was seated. We all said "Hello" again, and then he introduced us to the Lord Mayor. To her right was Crispin Martina, her son and the chief operating officer for Rosenberg Inc. UK. Blue-eyed, blond-haired, comely and ectomorphic, wearing a finely-tailored suit the color of Egyptian blue, he resembled a twink from the cover of a men's fashion magazine.

He couldn't have possibly been more than 22 years old from the looks of him.

That's quite an impressive position for someone so young, I thought. I have since learned that he was the youngest person to every hold such a title in a major corporation.

On the other side of the table was Mark Wetzel, the new Editor of the Financial Times. He was white and chubby with thinning gray hair and a pinstriped suit. He looked to be about 60. Finally, to Rosenberg's left was a homely-looking twelve-year-old girl, wearing white culottes and a white polo shirt, with her permed hair in a pony tail, and she had braces on her teeth. Rosenberg introduced her as Philippine, his daughter.

She looked very shy and uncomfortable, which was how I felt in a room full of financial elites, so I thought that breaking the ice with her first would be easiest. She blushed and turned her gaze away from me, smiling limply at nothing.

The Lord Mayor grabbed me by the arm and whispered.

“Don’t get her started. The only thing that empty-headed girl ever talks about is horses.”

We sat down next to Wetzel. A young dark-haired white male in a black tuxedo came and poured us champagne from a bottle that probably cost more than I had made in the previous tax year. Everybody except for Philippine looked like they were already somewhat drunk.

“Blake already told us a little bit about you guys, particularly you, Miss Auger,” said Wetzel. “Sounds like you’ve done some interesting work.” I smiled.

“I saw you two walking up to the building,” said Ms. Martina, sniffing as she spoke. “I was just coming back from the lavatory on the other side of the room. I looked out the window and I saw you walking down St. Stephen’s Row.” She sniffed again and smiled.

Cocaine? I thought. It looked like it. Her nose was red.

“You could have taken the secret tunnels,” said Rosenberg. “I should have told you about them!” He and Marcia both laughed.

“What do you mean?” I said.

“There are tunnels connecting all of these buildings, and others,” Marcia said. “From New Court to St. Stephens. From St. Stephens to Mansion House.

From Mansion House to the Bank of England. All built by my dead husband's ancestors, of course. To make it easier to control everybody." Ms. Martina laughed again.

"You're joking?" I asked.

"Not at all," said Crispin. "And Rosenberg Plaza is now part of the grid too."

I looked at Chesterfield. He did not look amused. He grimaced at the Lord Mayor. The silence was palpable.

"Oh bloody Hell," said Ms. Martina. "I forgot we had MI5 in the house tonight."

"All this has been cleared with the City, I presume," said Chesterfield, making notes on his black leather notepad. Martina leaned in and squinted at him.

"Darling, this family IS the City," she bragged. She took another sip of her champagne.

"So what do you use really these tunnels for?" I asked.

"You'll find out tonight," said Rosenberg. "We're going on a special tour later on."

"Oh really," I said. "I'm not sure how long I can stay though."

"Oh you don't want to miss this," said Mr. Wetzel. "The first ritual in a properly restored ancient temple in London for thirteen-hundred years. When will you get another chance like that?"

Oh no, a ritual? I thought. The hair on my neck stood up as I thought about my last experience with a ritual inside London's secret tunnels.

"What's he talking about?" asked Chesterfield. He turned to Rosenberg. "I thought the mithraeum belonged to the people. It's a piece of British heritage that just so happens to be inside your building. It’s not your personal playground.”

“We’re just going to have a little fun,” said Crispin. “It’s a party. Lighten up.”

Chesterfield looked at his champagne glass, still full, and put his notebook in his pocket. Rosenberg deftly pivoted the conversation.

“You know, Dutch businessman Erik Ubels, whom I consulted on the design of the Plaza, has said that in the future all parts of a building will be connected to all the other parts. What’s more, he said that all of the buildings in a city will be connected to each other. Tunnels are one thing, and that’s been going on for centuries here in England. But they will also be doing things like sharing electricity, which they will be generating on-site for each other. And they will be sharing data about how the buildings are being used. The City of London in the future really will be a ‘house with many mansions,’ like the New Jerusalem. I think that’s exciting, and I like to think that Rosenberg Plaza is helping to lead this movement.”

“Well, we got Wodin Energy that consulting contract,” said Martina.

“Convinced the aldermen that it’s worth the investment. Now we can get them to agree to fund the things we’ve already been doing. So it’ll be done months ahead of schedule, which will impress them and keep them handing out funds.”

“Wodin Energy is doing for cities what Erik Ubels is doing for buildings,”

Wetzel explained, seeing my confusion. “Networking the streetlights, covering them with sensors, and using the data to make decisions that boost energy efficiency. They call them ‘Smart Cities.’”

“London is on the verge of a new renaissance,” said Crispin with pride, looking at his boss with admiration. “Rosenberg has been working with the mayor of Greater London on the river restoration project too, which is huge. We’re bringing back all the culverted underground rivers, like the Fleet and the Walbrook. We’ve been building the infrastructure and connecting it to the City’s new Smart Grid. When it’s all unveiled, the public will be completely blown away.”

“What will the rivers be used for?” I asked. “I thought they were all mostly sewers now.”

“They used to be,” said Rosenberg. “But they closed them over and built other sewers, then mostly abandoned the rivers. They still trickle underground and empty into the Thames. Now since Ms. Auger here is an expert on occult secrets, I’ll tell you a secret about the water system here and let you figure out what it means.”

Everyone got quiet and scooted in their chairs so that they could lean in closer. Except for Philippine. She continued to stare blankly out the window.

Rosenberg went on.

“In the 1200s they built a conduit between Tyburn Springs, on the current site of Buckingham Palace, and the Walbrook, right up Ludgate Hill where St.

Paul’s is, to bring fresh drinking water to the merchants in the City. Supposedly they stopped using it after the Great Fire in 1666. But the engineers from Woden Energy explored the old conduit, and found a tiny tube running along the length of the whole thing, from directly beneath Buckingham Palace to where the Walbrook meets Bucklersbury on the northern side of my mithraeum, before turning west.”

From the corner of my eye, I saw Chesterfield wince when Rosenberg said he said.

“my mithraeum.”

“What do you mean, a ‘tube’?” said Wetzel. “Like a plastic tube?”

“Oh no. 2.7 miles of Burmese glass, surrounded by plain white PVC pipes,”

“Burmese glass? You mean that stuff they used to make from uranium oxide and tincture of gold? That was Queen Victoria’s favorite! It’s beautiful, and so radiant in UV light. She collected tons of it. But usually dishes and figurines, not plumbing pipes.”

“Yes, well there may have been other reasons why she had the company in Massachusetts that manufactured it make so much of it for her. The glass is useful for maintaining the chemical composition of the fluid running through it. I wouldn’t be surprised if that company itself was secretly contracted to produce some of these pipes. And somebody is still making them now. Certain sections of the tube line have obviously been replaced quite recently.”

“You mean it’s in current use?” I asked.

“Fluid?” everybody said all at once.

“Don’t tell me you didn’t know” said Rosenberg to Martina with a mocking smile. Then he turned around and gave the same look to Crispin. “Or you.”

The young man and his mother looked at each other and shrugged. But Rosenberg was right. They were playing dumb.

“Blake, whatever are you talking about?” said Ms. Martina.

“Do you remember what Edmund Mortimer called the Walbrook River in Henry the Sixth, when he sat upon the London Stone and proclaimed himself Lord Mayor?”

She laughed. “He called it a ‘pissing conduit,’” she said. “Which it was.”

“Then he declared that the river should run with nothing but claret wine for the first year of his reign,” her son added, swilling down the last of his champagne. He called the servants for more.

“So what’s your point,” said Chesterfield. “Is there sewer water still running through this narrow tube in the conduit for some reason?”

“No, not sewer water per se,” Rosenberg answered. “Pure golden streams of urine. Obviously collected directly from the source, without contamination.”

Once again I thought about the toilets at Rosenberg Plaza, and my speculation that Rosenberg might have been generating energy from human waste products. Or he could have been using it for any number of other esoteric, alchemical workings. Or maybe he was just a sick pervert who liked to bath in or drink other people’s piss.

Now he was telling us that someone else was doing the same—somebody rich like him with access to the remains of the conduit. He implied that he thought the Rothschilds at least knew about it. Perhaps they did. Marcia and Crispin seemed to be getting uncomfortable.

“Has the site of Tyburn Springs always been the location of the royal residence?” I asked.

“No,” said Wetzel. “It belonged to Edward the Confessor, but then a lot of other people owned it before they built Buckingham Palace in the nineteenth century.”

An image flashed into my mind just as a tingle went down my spine, a sure sign that I was getting one of my intuitions. It was a picture I’d seen before of the River of Life flowing from beneath God’s throne. This is the water that the righteous drink from to gain eternal life. The message is clear: immortality can be gained from consuming the bodily substance of immortals.

God, in the Old Testament, is shown consuming the flesh and blood of sacrifices, licking them up with tongues of fire. But while they might eat kosher meat, blood he forbade to the Hebrew people, as it contained “the life.” For the same reason, Adam and Eve were booted from Paradise to prevent them from gaining access to the Tree of Life, which would make them “live forever.”

The fluid exchange is this: God drinks the “Water of Life”—blood, generally—from the altars of his worshippers. He then feeds the “tree of life” in paradise with the “rivers” that issue from beneath where he sits. The tree grows the “fruit” that brings life, and that fruit is offered back to the worshipper in the form of the vivifying flesh and blood of Jesus.

What I was now hearing about from Rosenberg was an exchange in which urine was being piped from a location directly beneath Buckingham Palace and into the business district, right to the front door of the Rothschilds. That is, right to the family that historically funded the government which paid the royal salary during the nineteenth century, when this special royal pissing conduit may have first been built. For all I knew, they were still doing so.

Perhaps royal urine has a particular value for them somehow, I thought.

“So,” said Rosenberg, breaking the silence. “Since you don’t know anything about this, do you think your father-in-law does?” It was directed at the Lord Mayor.

“Look, everybody knows these freaks are dirty to the core. And richer than the Pope. So if you’re telling me that my in-laws have a private pipeline carrying prostitute pee for their golden shower orgies here at New Court, don’t expect me to be surprised. I’ve heard worse. MUCH worse.” She then turned to her son, glared at him, and walked off to the rest room again. Crispin turned to Rosenberg looking hurt. He spoke.

“Blake, I do believe you are violating the Law of Hospitality. And there is STILL a token between you and my family that has not been satisfied.”

“Don’t accuse me of that,” said Rosenberg, pointing in Crispin’s face and staring him directly in the eyes. “You know I take that VERY seriously.”

Wetzel, in an attempt to break the uncomfortable mood, leaned past me and asked Chesterfield how the investigation of Pindar’s murder was going.

“Oh, we’re working on it,” the agent responded, a total non-answer. He changed the subject again. “I heard your paper moved back in to Bracken House round the corner.”

Chesterfield turned to me. “Bracken House is across the Square from St.

Paul’s. It’s the one with the zodiac clock on the front featuring the face of Winston Churchill as the Sun. It’s the historic home of the Financial Times, but they moved out for a few years while the place was refurbished.”

I remembered seeing that place when we were walking to the murder scene the night before.

“Today’s been a hell of a day for your paper, I imagine,” said Chesterfield.

“Where do you think it’s all going?”

“Directly down the toilet,” the Editor responded. “The Euro’s obviously trash. Which may help the pound in the immediate, but unless you’re these blokes you won’t feel the benefit,” he said, pointing to Marcia, Crispin and Blake with a broad swirl of his finger.

“So you guys aren’t suffering at all from Europe’s collapse?” I said.

“Are you kidding,” Ms. Martina said, laughing as she sat back down at the table again. “We caused it. That is to say, we refrained from propping them up any longer. ‘Going Galt,’ as they say. The people won’t accept austerity, they refuse to face facts, so we can’t keep doling out free credit to states any longer.

But we’ve all been hoarding gold for months. So we won’t go hungry. Quite the contrary. We’re on the precipice of what you might call ‘the Great Reaping.’” She winked at Rosenberg. He smiled emptily.

I could never imagine that the world's elite actually refer to themselves as 'we' the same way we non-elites refer to them as 'they,' I thought to myself. Their arrogance was truly amazing, a combination of cinematic and surreal.

"Pamela, you remember the story of Joseph and his brothers in Genesis, right?" said Rosenberg.

"More or less," I answered. "Why?"

"Have you ever thought about how it tells the story of the process by which a people become enslaved through usury? Joseph's brothers come from Canaan to Egypt, looking to buy food during a famine. They don't know he's the brother they sold into slavery some time ago. They find that, because of his great psychic insight, which predicted the famine, he's been storing up grain for seven years in Pharaoh's granaries."

"He plies them with freebies. He makes them think the food was free because the money they bought it with magically reappeared in their sacks afterwards. He takes one of them captive as collateral, Simeon. Then he tries to trick them into giving up their littlest brother, Benjamin, as a slave to him, by falsely accusing him of the theft of his silver divination cup."

"Where is all this going, Blake," said Miss Martina. "You know I despise the Bible." She yawned and sipped her champagne. Rosenberg rolled his eyes and kept talking.

"Then he convinced Pharaoh to give his brothers a good slice of the best land in Egypt, and lots more free stuff besides. They lived there fat and happy for two years, until the famine spread to Egypt as well. Then the true process of enslavement began." He cleared his throat, and smiled eerily.

"First Joseph, on behalf of Pharaoh, took all the money from both the Egyptian and the Canaanite people in exchange for bread from Pharaoh's granary.

Then the money "failed" in the land. All of the coins of real value being in the hands of the Pharaoh now, anything coined as money from that point on would not be accepted by the market as a store of value. We all know that."

Crispin, Marcia and Mr. Wetzel all smiled, now picking up on the similarities between the Bible story and the present situation.

"People like me and the Rothschilds have all the gold now," Rosenberg continued. "The coming breakaway European states can print their own money all they want. But nobody abroad will accept it. And the market already knows it."

"But let them try," said Marcia. "I really want to see them try."

"Returning to the story," said Rosenberg, annoyed at the interruption,

"Joseph next took cattle, from both the Egyptian natives and the Canaanite aliens, his own brethren, in exchange for more bread. That lasted only a year. After that, there was nothing left but for the people to offer up their lands, and their bodies for slaves, in exchange for mere bread."

"Now they were all slaves to Pharaoh, with Joseph in the real seat of power as vizier. But the Canaanites were the happy slaves, because they got special treatment from Joseph, on account of their relation to him. The aliens grew more prosperous and more numerous in their condition of slavery than the native Egyptians, and this bred contempt. So when a new Pharaoh came to the throne, he instituted a policy of treating the Canaanite aliens more harshly."

He stood up with his eyes closed and his arms raised up, bent at the elbow, his palms turned outward towards us.

“This is how the condition of harsh slavery in Egypt came upon the children of Israel. This is also how the Egyptians themselves became slaves to their Pharaoh. It was because of the financial machinations of their brother Joseph, wily like Hermes the thief.”

“I’ve actually thought for some time that the figure of Joseph is a masked form of Thoth or Djehuty, the Egyptian Hermes,” I said. “Jude also.”

“Well, yes, ‘Djehuty’ sounds a lot like ‘Yehudi,’ doesn’t it,” Rosenberg agreed. “Using confidence tricks to gain wealth and power, to enslave the masses through money. That’s what both Joseph and Hermes were known for. And that’s the popular stereotype of the money-grubbing Jew that has endured for almost two millennia.”

“Because they keep living up to it!” howled Miss Martina. Rosenberg shot her a look of disapproval. She looked away from him towards me.

“I was married to one so I can say it,” she chuckled. “I’ve counted his money. I know what I’m talking about.”

“Well there’s one more parallel with the anti-Semitic stereotype. Joseph was originally a slave, an alien, but came to rule the land de facto by ingratiating himself with the royal house: by making himself indispensable.”

“He took Dale Carnegie’s advice,” joked Wetzel.

“He used his mind’s eye to gain intelligence that gave him power. Because it was useful. Think on that, Miss Auger,” said Rosenberg, raising his eyebrow at me.

“Why?” I asked.

Before he could answer, there was a flurry of movement around us. It was dizzying and disorienting. It all happened so quickly, I didn’t realize what was going on. I didn’t actually see any of the servants carrying the platters. But when the movement passed, I looked down and saw a shiny silver plate in front of me with a tiny bird on it, baked with a caramelized sauté. We each had one. The plates were all different colors and, it looked like, made from different materials.

But now Rosenberg was missing from the table. His wine glass was also gone. And there was no setting for him at the table.

“Where’d Blake go?” asked Wetzel. He looked at Philippine, who looked up for the first time in twenty minutes. She shrugged her shoulders. I noticed that the Sun was now almost totally gone over the horizon and the Moon was visible behind Philippine. Although it was not quite full, it loomed large and seemed to hang down very low.

“He’s probably gone to the toilet, I imagine,” answered Crispin.

“So what are we having anyway?” Marcia asked her son.

“I don’t know,” he responded. “I let Blake tell the kitchen what to make.”

“Oh right, Blake ordering our family’s servants around, as always,” she sighed. She took a bite of her bird. She swallowed it, but slowly, reluctantly, looking both disgusted and surprised.

“Oh right, now this is gross,” she said. “What the Hell is this? It tastes like an arse.”

“No kidding,” said Wetzel, who had sampled his as well and pushed it away in disgust. “That’s foul.” He snorted a laugh at his own joke. “Get it? Fowl?”

I put a piece of it on my fork and sniffed it. It smelled like spoiled milk and sulphur.

I looked at Philippine. She was dutifully eating it, but shuddered as she did so. Then I looked at Crispin. He was eating his too, with dislike, in very small bites.

Marcia turned around to complain to the servants. But she found none. We were now alone in that vast empty room, with no sign of the guest of honor who had ordered this mystery meal.

“Maybe Rosenberg went to go tell the staff that they forgot my plate,” said Chesterfield. “Although it doesn’t look like I’m missing out on anything good.” I looked and, sure enough, he had no plate.

“No, he must be in the lavatory,” said Marcia, angry. She stumbled drunkenly over to the unisex toilet room and walked right in, calling his name. A few seconds later, she came out.

“He’s not there either,” she announced, coming back to her seat.

“You don’t like your food?”

Rosenberg’s voice came from the other side of the table. He was standing next to his daughter, who sat motionless staring at the bones on her plate, having eaten every scrap of the bird’s bitter flesh. Everyone was startled. Then Marcia and Wetzel laughed.

“Yeah, send it back and order a pizza, Blake,” answered Marcia. “This is the worst.”

“I’ve already had a pizza today,” he said.

“Not that kind of pizza,” said Marcia, snickering at what appeared to be an inside joke.

“Don’t reject my offering, friends,” said Rosenberg, addressing us all. “True, Crispin kindly provided the champagne, and let us sit at the table of his esteemed family’s house. But these birds I caught myself, and put myself in great peril to do so.”

“Seriously?” said Marcia. “Honestly, I didn’t know you liked to hunt. I thought you hated firearms.”

“No, he hates peasants having firearms,” whispered Wetzel, oblivious to how weird things were getting.

“I didn’t shoot them!” he responded. “I had the servants slaughter them.”

He inhaled sharply.

“Please nourish your bodies with this flesh,” Rosenberg continued to implore. “At least enjoy the sweet livers. That’s the best part.”

Upon hearing the words “sweet livers,” Chesterfield stiffened up next to me. I could feel his eyes upon me. But Rosenberg now stared at me as well.

“Come on, Miss Auger,” he said. “Eat the liver. It’s the best part.”

“Don’t do it, Pamela,” said Chesterfield. “You don’t have to. We can leave.”

“Not until you’ve eaten!” shouted Rosenberg. As he said this, he leaned forward, slammed his fist on the table, and stared angrily at me, his face becoming red.

I don’t know if it was a hallucination, like so many of the things I witnessed from this point onward. But to me it seemed as if his eyes began to glow red as well, as his stare pierced me through my skull. I felt myself swaying in my seat. As if I had no will of my own, I picked up my fork and knife, tore the bird open, located what looked like a liver, and stuck it in my mouth. In my peripheral vision, I saw Marcia and Mark doing the same.

At that moment, Chesterfield got up and ran across the room to the elevator we had arrived in. He punched the “down button.” Everybody was looking at him, so I took the opportunity to spit out my bite of the unknown bird into my champagne glass, which I then covered with a napkin.

“Come on, follow me Pamela!” he shouted, beckoning me with his hand.

But then he looked at the elevator button, and the digital display next to it, which was supposed to tell you what floor the elevator was currently on as it moved up and down. However, something was wrong. He pressed the button frantically several more times, shouting “Fuck! Fuck!” Then he stormed over to the table again.

“Tell me why the elevator’s locked,” he demanded of Rosenberg. The man just sneered at him. Then Chesterfield addressed the Martinas.

“How do we get out of here?”

“Oh, don’t overreact,” said Marcia. She walked over to the elevator.

“It should be working,” she said. When she saw that it wasn’t, she tried pressing an intercom button next to the elevator.

“Hello! James? Hello! Teddy? Anybody?” There was apparently no answer.

She walked back to her desk and took her phone out of her purse. Her bag looked like it cost more than my mother’s house. But she had the same model smartphone as I did. It didn’t do her any good though.

“Bloody Hell, I can’t even get a signal. What’s going on?” she shouted to Crispin. He shrugged, then gave Rosenberg a pleading look.

“Nobody’s going anywhere until we’ve all eaten!” Rosenberg shouted.

“I think we’re done,” said Wetzel. “We’ve all had a bite. We all tried it.

Thank you, Blake. Maybe we’re just not hungry. Let’s do something else now.” He was trying to calm his friend down.

“I’M not DONE!” Rosenberg countered.

“I’m eating mine raw!” Rosenberg interrupted.

He reached down and picked up something on the floor next to his feet, which had been obscured from my view by the table. It was covered in a black cloth. He placed it in the center of the table. I heard coos and a flutter of wings.

Not again, I said to myself. I don’t want to see another animal die.

But of course I couldn’t stop him. He ripped the cover off the birdcage, revealing a raven, which he took out with his hand, gently, putting it on the tabletop. It walked around and flapped its wings helplessly. They were clipped.

I thought to look away, but I wasn’t fast enough. With sudden ferocity, Rosenberg grabbed the bird and tore its head off with his bare hands, then tipped the neck towards his mouth and sucked down the blood as it spurted out. At that moment, I heard a sonic boom and felt something like a shockwave. This was followed by the sound of metal crunching and scraping together. It didn’t seem to be coming from the sky, which became noticeably darker in that instant, as if someone had put a light filter over it. Also, the Moon drew down lower in the sky.

The crunching sound turned into a high-pitched whine, then a low, long moan like a foghorn. It sounded like a concert from an orchestra of 100 waterphones.

“Ahhh,” said Rosenberg, wiping his mouth and gasping like he had just taken a refreshing drink on a hot summer day. “That’s the sound of the sky beginning to fall in earnest. Now let us commence with the Supreme Rite, to bring about the Baptism of Wisdom!” He threw the desiccated raven’s headless body into the middle of the table, and dropped the head where he stood.

I wasn’t operating at full capacity, so I wasn’t reacting as I normally would to these abnormal occurrences. But I wasn’t as bad off as most of the other guests. Indeed, they all appeared to be going through an almost lycanthropic transformation before my eyes.

Across from me, Marcia had pushed her seat back from the table and now sat back in her chair, with her blue evening dress hiked up to her crotch, which she was now rubbing lasciviously through her panties, fully visible. She was biting her lip hard, and blood trickled out of the corner of her mouth. She cackled like a witch.

Presently Crispin stood up and kissed Rosenberg passionately on the mouth. Rosenberg reciprocated, then violently wrenched the young man’s arm behind his back. He bent him over the table and began dry-humping his ass.

Next, Mr. Wetzel stood up, an evil gleam now in his beady eyes. He walked over behind Philippine, grabbed her by the hair bun and jerked her head up. Her eyes were solid whites without pupils. I’d never seen anything like it before.

Her jaw dropped open. Her tongue began to flutter. She started to utter some strange glossolalia that I didn’t recognize as human language. But then Wetzel slammed his right foot up on the table in front of her, unzipped his pants, and silenced her with a thrust of his penis. Her speech turned into gagging and slurping. That lasted a few seconds before Rosenberg reached out and shoved him away from her.

Then he turned and addressed the group, bellowing:

“Let us now descend to the sacred caverns! Last week was the Spring Equinox, but this weekend we shall celebrate the true Equinox of the Gods!”

Over his shoulder I caught sight of the Moon again. Then from behind it—I swear—I saw five bright lights emerge, each a different hue, and just hover there.

They looked like stars, but they behaved like UFOs. I could tell that they were looking at me—at us.

I stood up and stumbled backward. Chesterfield grabbed me from behind and steadied me, immobilizing me with his arms.

“Do you see the stars moving outside?” I whispered in his ear.

“Just pretend you’re possessed and make out with me,” he whispered back.

Understanding his meaning, I kissed his neck and growled like a dog. He began fondling my breasts.

Rosenberg walked over to the elevator now, with his friends following behind him like a procession of screaming banshees. He hit the intercom button.

“Miles, you can come up now,” he said.

Miles? I thought. How many servants in England are named Miles? That’s so cliché! Why not Jeeves? Why not Mr. Belvedere? Even in this insane crisis, under the slight influence of whatever was in the raven meat I spit out, my mind was still able to calm itself by telling itself stupid jokes, like it had so many times before.

I watched the numbers on the display change as the elevator climbed up to our floor from the bottom. When it got there, the doors opened, and there was Miles, Leopold Black’s chauffer, with a gun in his hand again, pointed out towards us.

“Hello, Miles,” said Rosenberg. “Where are the others?”

“They’re waiting for you in the temple, sir,” he replied.

Rosenberg gestured towards us, and we all piled into the elevator. Miles punched a code on a keypad next to the elevator’s main set of buttons, and we started going down. The others were shrieking loudly, still busy molesting each other. There was enough noise that I could safely whisper something to Miles, who was standing right next to me.

“So you and Leopold and the rest of the butchers were in it together all along!” I said. “No surprise, I guess. Now what are you guys going to do us?”

But he just stared ahead like a Beefeater on duty, holding his gun with the barrel pointed out towards the elevator door. Meanwhile, the elevator continued to descend, down, down, down. We went past B1 and B2, the two basement levels listed on the main set of buttons. Then we kept going, into what seemed like a bottomless pit.

Chapter 21: Taurobolium

According to one account dating from the 1830s, the Rothschilds owed their fortune to the possession of a mysterious ‘Hebrew talisman’ that enabled Nathan Rothschild, the founder of the London house, to become

—Nigel Ferguson, The Ascent of Money

When the elevator opened, we walked out into a hallway with stone floors and walls. The walls were lined with torches lighting the way. At the end of the corridor was an opening leading off to the left, and a statue of Harpocrates, the Egyptian god of silence, as a naked young boy. He held his index finger to his lips in his signature pose, with his other hand covering his crotch. I knew he was equated with Eros in Hellenistic syncretism, and was bound by an oath to keep the secrets of his mother Aphrodite’s many sex crimes. I could only imagine what his presence in this hallway presaged. But my imagination was not extreme enough to predict what actually did happen.

All of us came out of the elevator except for one person: Chesterfield. He tried, but Rosenberg pushed him back in there, and then instructed Miles to shoot him in the head. Miles pointed the gun, and Chesterfield cringed, bracing himself.

But then Rosenberg changed his mind, saying that Chesterfield “might come in handy later.” The elevator door was shut, and then Rosenberg punched in a code that locked it in place. Poor Chesterfield was stuck in there.

I was blindfolded by Miles again, just like last time I was in a tunnel with him. But was led by him arm-in-arm down the hall, instead of being forced to lead. As we walked, Rosenberg and his friends were hooting, hollering and whooping like animals. Then we stopped abruptly. Someone, Rosenberg I presume, grabbed my arm and put my left hand upon a door handle. Then Rosenberg spoke to me.

“Pamela, my Cryphius: tell me: Can you see it in your mind’s eye yet? What will we find in here when we open this door?”

I recognized the word “Cryphius” from my online reading about Mithras. It literally meant “occultist,” and it was named by Franz Cumont as the title of the first degree of the Mithraic brotherhood. However, this was based on a single archeological find. All other evidence showed that the name of the first degree was Corax, meaning “raven.” Allegedly, a raven had played the role of divine messenger, Mercury’s job. It was sent by the sun god to Mithras, instructing him to have the bull slayed.

Pondering this, I then realized that Rosenberg wanted me to use my innate clairvoyant abilities to play the role of messenger for him. I was there to do divination on command, just like what Leopold and the Butcher’s Society had kidnapped me for. That was probably why he had invited me to his party, and why he was keeping me alive.

So I had better find a way to perform, I thought.

I couldn’t see anything in my “mind’s eye,” but I did hear a male but inhuman eldritch-sounding voice in my head, and it gave me a message.

The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobes.

I repeated this to Rosenberg, and he laughed.

“Good, good, you’ll do,” he said, taking off my blindfold.

He opened the door, revealing a dimly-lit room with old light fixtures, and three wardrobes sitting next to each other on the far wall. Two were closed, and the one on the right was open. Inside there were what appeared to be theater costumes. And in front of the wardrobes stood two people already in costume.

One of these people was wearing a black robe and a mask of a lion’s face.

The other was an old Caucasian woman wearing a white gown, a red cape, and a large white hat that resembled a champagne cork. She had white foundation caked on her face like a clown, with thick black eye make-up and bright red lipstick. She smiled.

“Paternoster!” she said to Rosenberg as she held out her arms for him.

“Hello Matri Deum, Consivia, planter of the garden!” he said back to her.

He kissed her on the hand, smiling back at her.

So this is Consivia, I said to myself. And she’s here as a priestess tonight, but not for the Anglican church.

Rosenberg then turned to the man in the lion’s mask.

“Is everything ready with the bull and the Butchers?” he asked.

“Absolutely, Father,” he said. I recognized the voice. It was Leopold.

So even the pretense that Leopold and the Butchers were working against Rosenberg was a ruse, just like everything else about him, I thought. They’re all in league together, and this entire thing has been a set-up against me from the beginning.

We all got suited up too. Each one of us had a face covering and a black robe tied that opened in the front, tied with a silver cord. Everybody dressed himself except for me. I got help from Consivia and Miles. They gave me a black bird’s mask like the ones we had seen on the Easter Sunday film. Crispin wore a golden headband that suspended a white linen veil over his face. Marcia Martina put on Roman soldier’s plumed helmet and a plain white mask. Wetzel wore a golden sun face. Most put their robes on over their clothes, but Philippine, her pupils now returned to the front of her eyeballs, somberly stripped off her clothes first, having obviously been given instructions ahead of time. Instead of a mask, she wore a black lace veil.

Rosenberg donned his Phrygian Smurf hat and a mask that resembled the bust of Mithras found at the London mithraeum. He also took a foot-long iron harpe (an ancient type of sickle) that was hanging on a hook on the back wall of one of the wardrobes. He holstered it with his belt. Then Miles opened the door to the hallway again, and everyone filed out, with Rosenberg leading the way.

Just to the right of the door of the wardrobe room, the hallway ended. The long dark corridor we had come from stretched out into darkness on our left and ended. Right there was a stone spiral staircase leading up. Rosenberg took a torch off the wall with his free hand and started going up. Everyone followed.

I couldn’t see where it was leading until Rosenberg got to the top and drew his harpe. He then used it to flip open a hatch door above him. Torchlight and some ominous piano music poured through the opening. He holstered the blade and climbed up.

Rosenberg put his torch through the opening first. Someone above played a triumphant series of notes on a trumpet. Then a white gloved hand came down from the other side. Rosenberg grabbed it with his free hand and allowed himself to be helped up. A few seconds later we heard him bellowing loudly.

“Hail to the Lions!”

Then came a reply from a chorus of voices above.

“Hail, Father!”

We all went up through the hatch as well, except for Miles and Philippine.

Miles grabbed the girl by the arm and nudged her with his gun back down the stairs. Then he motioned for me to squeeze past him. When I emerged, I saw that we were in the mithraeum. Miles shut the door behind me.

We had come out of a hole in the floor in the southeast corner of the room, near the altar, which was a recreation of an original feature, as I remembered from reading the plaques on display earlier that day. It was covered by a box on the floor, made of stone and about a foot high. The archeologists who found it thought that it must have contained ritual paraphernalia of some sort. But now the box acted as a portal to a lower chamber, with a door that could be pushed open from below. Miles came up from behind me and shut the door as well as the box lid as soon as he was through.

I saw before me a small crowd of about 40 people, some adults, some children, and all male as far as I could tell. They all wore black robes like us, and masks like those worn by several of Rosenberg's friends. There were men in lion masks, men in raven masks, men in Roman soldier helmets, and young boys aged seven to twelve wearing linen veils like Crispin. Each of these types were lined up in a row together.

The ones in the lion masks were using large censers on chains to waft us with incense as we each emerged from the box. The veiled boys were all against the wall on the left, making music. One sat at a piano in the corner, playing the somber tune, right next to the boy holding the trumpet. Against the opposite wall were boys singing dolorously in Latin.

But only Rosenberg wore the liberty cap, Wetzel had the only sun mask, and only Consivia wore the champagne cork hat with the clown make-up. Also, nobody else wore the lacey black veil that Philippine had been wearing.

However, there were several people in the congregation who were wearing black veils, just not of lace. These others were made of leather with eye slits cut out, just like the one I had seen on the people who slaughtered the bull beneath Stratford House. But there was one change: some of the leather veils were marked with a white waxing crescent moon symbol in front of the mouth. Others were marked with a black waning moon symbol outlined in white.

These must be Leopold's Butchers, I thought. I wonder why there are two different kinds.

Each of Rosenberg's friends took their place in front of their corresponding groups of congregants. Leopold stood before the Lions, and Marcia the Soldiers.

Wetzel stood in the middle, in-between the Soldiers and the Lions. One of the Soldiers grabbed my arm and positioned me in front of the Ravens.

Consivia Springhole went to stand behind the stone altar, and Rosenberg stood to the left of it. It was not the original short and narrow altar that had been displayed in the mithraeum earlier. It was a much larger one of roughly hewn stone, the width of a man's length when horizontal, and I recognized it from Wikipedia. It was the one from the church next door, St. Stephen Walbrook, famously made to resemble the one in the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem. The latter was, by tradition, the place where Abraham almost sacrificed his son. It was also said by Jews to be the "Even Ha-Shitiyah," the "foundation stone" of the universe, from which creation radiated outward a the beginning of time.

Behind the altar and the priestess was a black curtain, attached to a curtain rod that ran in a circle throughout the room. I hadn't remembered seeing that last time I was in there, so they must have set it up just before the ritual. All of the informational plaques and other display items I'd seen earlier had been removed.

Consivia began waving her arms about and chanting in Latin, making an invocation of some sort. One of the Ravens pulled the curtain aside, revealing the ancient stone taurtoctony, now the only piece of art on display from the original mithraeum, mounted on the wall behind the altar, just as in the days of old.

Consivia turned and faced me directly.

“Cryphius, have you any dispatch from the Mount of the Gods?”

This was a test, I knew. Again, they wanted me to prove my psychic abilities. I tried to clear my mind so that I could hear that same strange voice that had told me about the wardrobe room.

Tell me what to say, I asked mentally.

To my relief, a reply came quickly. Bring forth the Bull of the World. Give its blood and seed to the Virgin my Queen.

I repeated these lines to the priestess, and then she repeated part of it as well. She shouted to the back of the room.

“Bring forth the Bull and the Queen of Heaven!”

At that moment, one of the two doors acting as the main entrance to the mithraeum swung open. A man with a waning moon veil led a black bull on a rope through the door and down the wheelchair-accessible ramp into the temple. The bull was draped with laurel crown and a red tasseled scarf on its back. On top of this Philippine rode side-saddle, her veiled head slumped in front of her.

When they got to the altar, two waning-moon Butchers grabbed the girl and slid her down from the bull. All three then went to stand with the rest of the Butchers. Another took the reigns from Miles, who walked back to the front doors, now closed, and stood before them, facing the altar while holding his gun out in front of him as before. A Raven came and stood near the altar, holding a modius full of grain. Then Consivia spoke to me again.

I hesitantly stepped forward, trembling. A Lion brought forth one of the censers, now burned down to nothing but smoldering charcoal. She stuck her finger in the ashes and drew a circle between my eyes. Then she put a dot in the middle.

“Now with your mind’s eye do you see what is in store for your own near future?” she asked.

Again, I couldn’t see anything, but I heard an answer from the robot voice, with a very disturbing message.

This is going to hurt a lot, it said.

“Oh shit,” I said as the floor beneath my feet gave way. I fell through the trap door and into a stone pit, landing hard on both legs, which both snapped on impact. I screamed as my body crumpled beneath me. Bones stuck out of both ankles. Blood poured out. I moaned and cried pathetically. I shook and convulsed uncontrollably, going into physical shock.

“Wh-wh-what are you going to do to me?” I was stuttering because I was hyperventilating.

But of course I knew what was coming. More or less. The pit was about six feet deep. It was round and small, barely big enough to sit in, except that in front of me there was a hallway the width of a man, which I could not see the end of. I could hear well what was going on above me. As my sobs grew quieter, Consivia began intoning an incantation above me

“Spirit of the World, come into the body of this horned creature. Accept the grain offering! Eat!”

I heard the bull’s hooves scraping against the stone floor. I heard it snort as it most likely began to eat the grain, probably offered upon the altar in the style of the Greek Bouphonia ritual. That meant the “hunters” would now be sneaking up behind it. And if Rosenberg was playing the role of Mithras in this syncretistic ritual which they had devised, then it was probably his lance that would do the slaying. I heard the bull lowing, while men were shouting and grunting. Then I heard the voice in my head again:

Close your eyes.

I obeyed the order as the bull’s blood came pouring down upon me. It was a kosher slaughter, so it took a few minutes for the animal to bleed out, during which time I continued to hear grunting. This was followed by a loud gasp of exaltation just as the flow of blood was slowing to a halt. This told me that the tradition of sodomizing the bull while it died was being carried out by someone in the group.

Now I don’t know what was the worst part: the sounds the poor creature made as it died, the feeling of the disgusting ooze dripping on my face, or the horrible stench. Thoughts of Mad Cow Disease and intestinal parasites came to mind. But none of it distracted from the pain in my legs for more than a few seconds. I wiped the blood from my eyes with the sleeve of my robe. Then I looked up and saw Consivia staring down at me from above.

“Now you have been baptized with a blood niptron. You should be able to see more clearly.”

Quite the opposite. Not only was there still some blood stuck in my eyelids, clouding my vision, but my eyes, already swollen from crying, were also starting to itch and sting in reaction to the bacteria in the raw blood.

But I wasn’t the only one crying. Philippine, whose only known personality trait was her love of animals, was becoming hysterical. She was under the influence of the poisoned bird from dinner, but she was still herself, and she was being severely traumatized by the sight of this (although, I suspected, not at all for the first time). However, she would not remain herself for much longer.

Consivia began another invocation, even as the knives of the Butchers could be heard ripping into the bull’s flesh.

“Virgin Mother, Queen of the Night, come hither into the vessel of this female body that stands before this altar. Come forth and accept the bollocks of this bullock, the World. Take into your mouth the sacred germ of secular living.

Feast!”

The room above me suddenly became illuminated with a new light. It was not torchlight, but a soft blue glow, like natural moonlight. It traveled from the southwest side of the temple to the altar, floating over the aperture above me along the way. I say “floating” because when I finally got a look at it, I saw that it took the form of a sphere. When it passed over me and onto the altar, I heard Philippine gasp.

I then heard yowling, like that of a cat, and the hissing of a lizard or a snake.

This was following by gurgling, ravenous chewing and swallowing. The gore of the bull’s severed testicles was undoubtedly being poured into her mouth.

I heard more ripping of flesh with knives, and the cracking open of bones.

Then there was a rattle of chains, and muffled screams from the girl, sounding human again. After that, there was a moment of silence, just long enough for me to hear the faint sound of an insect stridulating. I looked directly in front of me.

There was a scorpion, blond-colored and about and inch and a half long, standing about two feet from my disfigured legs with its pincher prone.

I tried to scoot back away from it using my hands. But I was already pretty much up against the wall. It started running towards me, and I closed my eyes.

Then I heard a footstep, and a crunch. I opened my eyes and saw one of the Lions standing in front of me, holding an iron ring full of skeleton keys in a disfigured old white hand. He had stomped the scorpion beneath his light brown leather cap toe Oxford shoe.

“Leopold?” I said, just as the onerous music started up again in the temple above me.

He looked upwards through the trap door, at nothing, then lifted up his mask briefly, revealing the expected familiar face of the devious old con man. He winked at me, then put the mask back down. He knelt down beside me and pulled out a syringe. I screamed.

“No!” I turned away from him as far as I could, and tried to wrench my arm away from him as he grabbed it. He held tight. He whispered in my ear.

“Be quiet and stop struggling. I’m trying to help you. Now be still. I don’t want to hurt you.”

“I’m already in agony!” I snapped.

“That’s why I’m giving you morphine,” he replied through clenched teeth.

My struggle subsided. Within seconds I could feel that the injection did indeed contain opiates, ameliorating my suffering. I accepted it.

Maybe they’ll chop me up and eat me bit by bit while I’m still alive, I thought to myself. At least with the drugs it won’t hurt as much.

I slumped back and allowed myself to be dragged without struggle several feet down the dark hallway. Then Leopold picked me up and heaved me into a chair. It was a wheelchair.

He blindfolded me again. I felt the chair dragged backwards some distance.

Then he turned the corner, and was able to turn the chair around so that he was pushing it forward. I felt us going up a ramp, turning and turning, for several minutes.

Then we straightened out again, went across a hallway, and stopped in front of a door. Leopold tapped on it nine times—six short ones and three long ones. The door opened and I smelled the incense. The Gothic organ music played and the boys chanted in Latin as we rode down the wheelchair ramp of the mithraeum's proper entrance. At the bottom, he removed my blindfold. The music stopped. Consivia addressed me.

“Cryphius, you have been hobbled to prevent you from running away. For you are a slave to us. You will now be set forth before your master, to whom you shall genuflect in obeisance.”

“How am I supposed to get down on my knees when I can’t even stand?” I said, quivering.

But even as I spoke, Ravens were lifting me up and placing me on my knees.

I had to fall forward on my hands and hold my broken legs up behind me with great effort to keep them from bearing weight against the ground.

“That just makes it easier to fall on your face,” said Rosenberg, behind his mask of Mithras. He now stood in front of me, and in front of the altar, now displaying the eviscerated carcass of the sacrificed bull split down the middle and cracked open. Despite the incense, which itself was an unpleasant smell, the room was still full of the most god-awful stench from the dead animal. Rosenberg stated his demand.

“Do you promise to serve me without reservation henceforth, to do everything I ask, to submit to every humiliation, while also offering me your best efforts on the tasks I set for you, giving me true and complete information on every question I lay before you, and accepting a price worse than death if you fail in this?"

"Yes," I said in a cracked voice full of desperation.

How is this a bargain? I have no choices and nothing to negotiate with! I thought to myself.

Rosenberg then stepped aside from the altar, and two torch-bearing Lions stepped out to shine their fiery lights ahead of me so that I could see what was on the ground in front of it. There was a bloody pile of meat, specifically a string of intestines, now just a foot away from my face. Then Rosenberg spoke again.

"Here are the entrails of the sacrifice, sitting in the exact state in which they fell from the victim's body. Within the bowels of this beast you should be able to see the location of the keystone we are seeking. Can you see it?"

The Ravens raised me up a couple of inches. I looked at the guts. I couldn't help but notice that the manner in which they were arranged resembled the trefoil spiral staircase of the building we were in. And right in the center of the pile, at the end of the hose, there was something red and shiny like a ruby, its bright glow visible through the slime-covered flesh. I swear it looked like the Superman logo.

"Yes I can see it," I said. "Can you?"

He looked down at the pile of intestines. He was silent for a while, breathing heavily behind his mask. Then he at last he looked at me and spoke.

"That's what I have you for. Can you remember exactly what you see here?

We'll need to use this information later on in the rites."

"Well I don't have a photographic memory, if that's what you're asking," I said. "Why don't you take a picture?"

He said nothing for a moment.

Rosenberg laughed at that.

“I’ll do it my self,” he said. “But thank you for reminding me about your phone.”

He reached into his pocked and took out his own phone, then tapped the side to open the camera function. He framed up the shot and activated the flash.

In the dark cave, the sudden burst of light was blinding.

“Ravens, remove the lady’s phone from her jacket, please, and open up the photo gallery” he said to the men holding me.

The Raven on my right hiked up my robe, and fumbled in my jacket pocket for the phone, unnecessarily squeezing my right breast in the process.

“Stop it, you pig!” I objected. Rosenberg chuckled. So then did several others.

“Miss Auger, genuflection is ultimately a sign of sexual submission made into a societal custom. It’s an evolutionary vestige of our wild bestial ancestors.

The animals do it whenever they lose a fight, or whenever they don’t even dare to fight. It was first practiced by human tribes conquered in war, to obtain mercy from the victors. Then it was made a general sign of “respect” from slaves to their owners. Why do you think Muslims put their asses in the air when they submit to Allah?”

The Raven with the phone held it out in front of me while his partner now took control of both of my legs.

“What’s the swipe code?” the Raven with the phone asked.

“Huh?” he said.

He took off his white glove and tried to draw a 4 with his finger on the cover of the phone. It didn’t work. So he took off his mask and squinted at the phone in the torchlight. I saw that it was Drexella’s pimple-faced, greasy-haired son, Dennis.

I put all of my weight on my left hand and reached out to draw the swipe code on my phone with my right hand. I got in at once and then hastily put my right hand down again so that I wouldn’t fall forward. Even with the morphine, the muscle strain from hanging there and the pain from the injury was unbearable.

“Hey, the phone’s at 3%, boss,” Dennis said as he handed the phone to Rosenberg. “Want me to plug it in somewhere?”

“In a minute,” he said as he looked at the screen.

“Can I sit down now?” I pleaded.

Rosenberg nodded and waved in our direction, giving his ascent. Then he looked at the phone again and gasped.

“You already have a photo of raw meat on your phone. What is this for?”

“What do you mean?” I said. I hoped that I wouldn’t be struck by lightning for violating my oath to be truthful to him. I also hoped that my phone being almost dead would buy me some time before I had to give him an explanation. I didn’t know exactly what the relationship was between Rosenberg’s Mithras cult and Leopold’s Butchers, but if Rosenberg didn’t already know everything about the bull liver at Stratford Place, I wasn’t going to volunteer to tell him.

Any information gap between me and him, I thought, is a strategic advantage.

My hope was well-founded. With the phone at 3%, he couldn’t open up the image gallery to see the detail. The phone just shut down when he tried. He rebooted it, but it immediately shut down again as soon as he opened the gallery.

“Fuck!” he yelled, and almost threw the phone across the room. Then he stopped himself and handed it to Dennis.

“Plug it in,” he told the lad, no doubt regretting that this was the one room in the building where he’d decided, out of respect for history, not to put phone chargers everywhere (or, indeed, any electrical outlets whatsoever). He signaled to the boy at the piano, who began playing an unsettling line of notes in repetition.

The Ravens set me down on the ground with my feet out in front of me.

Then Dennis went out the front entrance to plug the phone in while the other Raven dragged me to the nearest of the fourteen pillars in the temple.

He sat me on the first stone bench on the right side and propped me up with my back against the pillar second from the altar, so that the altar was in front of me. Then someone else who I couldn’t see came up from behind me and wrapped a heavy iron chain around my body, fixing me in position. My arms were pressed tight against my sides, and my back was firmly against the pillar.

“So, Cryphius,” said Consivia, addressing me from behind the altar. “Part of your duty is to help us determine the correct order of operations for the rest of the rituals. We should not have to tell you what the purpose of the rituals is.

Which of the Archons should be we invoke next?”

Well, I didn’t get an answer from my telepathic informant, but it seemed only obvious to me. Events like this always start with an orgy of rape, followed by an orgy of murder involving even more heinous forms of rape. Erotic rites precede rites of sadistic violence, but the longer the preliminaries could be stretched out, the longer the murders could be postponed. That wouldn’t make the rapes any less difficult to watch, or make me feel any less responsible for what happened to the victims. But it seemed like the least harmful choice.

“Invoke first the Archon of Lust,” I answered.

“Yessss!” the crowd hissed, like serpents. Consivia nodded and raised her shepherd’s crook, then used it to gesture to the girl in the black laced veil, who, I now saw, was chained to the pillar opposite from me.

“Now, Luna, lay down upon the altar, within the carcass of this beast, and let your brothers make you pregnant with the seed of a new aeon!” declared Consivia.

A Raven came to unlock her chains. He unfastened her robe and let it fall to the ground, so that she stood there naked and shivering. Then he led her to the altar, where she obligingly laid down in her bed of raw meat, sobbing piteously.

The Raven then began wrapping the chains around the carcass to strap the girl to it. Her legs were positioned so that the chains held them open, with her vagina gaping open and easily accessible from the left side of the altar.

The black curtain was now covering the wall behind the altar once more.

Now one of the Ravens pulled it back again, revealing this time, instead of the taurtoctony, another curtain, made of red translucent linen, into which an inverted cross – the Cross of St. Peter—had been cut. Through the cross-shaped hole something else displayed behind the curtain could be seen mounted on the wall.

I recognized it as one of the broken pieces of the relief of Dionysus that had been found in the original mithraeum. This was the section with only his naked rear end. I didn't know it at the time, but I now realize that the image before me—of the backside of Dionysus seen through the inverted cross cut into the curtain—looked just like Man Ray's picture Monument à D.A.F. de Sade, which he used as a cover for his personal edition of Marquis De Sade's 120 Days of Sodom in 1933.

“Master of the Nymphi, come forth before the altar!” Consivia called to the back of the room.

There, seated on the stone bench at the back with several of the young veiled boys was the only grown man wearing such a costume: Crispin Martina. He rose and did as he was told, standing with tall, proud sensuality in front of the altar. The priestess watered him with lustrations from her aspergillum, then laid her hand upon his head.

“Aphrodite, Queen of Harlots, come now, and be joined in marriage with Our Father! Come into the body of this young man and enjoy the double pleasure of the Tanin'iver, the pole betwixt the serpents. Fuck and be fucked!”

“To you we will give the first taste of the flesh of our beautiful young boys of high birth, and of our virgin royal queen. To you we will also give the pleasure of penetration from the rod of Our Father. Lady Venus, you who were born from the foam of the phallus upon the waters of feminine desire, yet who burns with the fire of male ferocity, come forth and take your fill of the Distinguished Charity of Mete!”

That last phrase, if you’ll recall, came right out of my commissioned translation of Hammer-Purgstall’s Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum, where he wrote that he found it encoded on a former Templar site in Bavaria. No other published work besides mine had utilized that phrase in English.

My work is being used to write lines for elite rape rituals, I thought with horror. It was so unbelievable, yet it was happening before me.

Next, I saw a yellow-white ball of light emerge from within the well in the southwest corner of the room, which had, in the original mithraeum, been connected to the Walbrook River underground. (Little did I know at the time that the Walbrook had already been re-irrigated surreptitiously by Rosenberg and his friends, so it was presently floating back through the site we stood on down to the Thames once again.) The light ball then glided across the room, hovered over Crispin’s head for a moment, and then swiftly entered through the crown of his skull. I saw his face and neck become flush as sweat poured down his forehead.

Consivia took a step backwards, and Rosenberg stood before Crispin.

“Harlot, kneel before Our Father,” Consivia commanded.

The young man did so. Rosenberg split open his robe in front, then stepped forward and pulled the veil over Crispin’s head. He shoved his crotch in Crispin’s face, and was eagerly serviced by the man, now possessed by the goddess of love, or rather, “strange love.” After a minute, the “Father” pulled out and the priestess proclaimed:

“I now pronounce you the bride of the Father! Let us all enjoy the harlots of the temple in the spirit of the Archon of Lust. Come forth Nymphi!”

With that, all of the boys in veils stepped into the center of the temple.

There they were seized upon by the older participants. These men, and one woman, dragged them off to the stone benches between the columns on the sides of the chamber and had their way with them.

Only one of the ritual’s participants opted out of the child rape: Consivia.

She stood behind the altar with her eyes closed, praying in tongues and making the cross sign with her hands every few minutes. Marcia squatted with her robe hiked up over the face of a twelve-year-old. I had lost track of where Leopold was in the room, but I certainly didn’t see him standing on the sidelines. Miles seemed to have left the room. Almost everyone was fully engaged in either raping or being raped.

This included Rosenberg, who, after being formally “married” to his boyfriend in a bizarre rite of sexual subjugation, extended his hand as if in then emptied into two large Greek-style kraters that stood on either side of the altar about two feet away in front of it.

Wetzel and Rosenberg, however, pulled out before they got to that point, and gave themselves a “cold niptron” (Rosenberg’s words) from the amphora of holy water that sat next to the altar, cooling off their excited genitals. Rosenberg asked his friend to help wipe off his penis, and he seemed more than happy to comply. He then stood next to Crispin, rubbing his backside and promising him divine progeny as the young man pumped his semen into Philippine.

“You shall sire us a new god of love, a new Eros who will come forth from the egg of a new aeon. I shall name him Cupidonus,” Rosenberg cooed.

“Why can’t I name him?” said Crispin, turning towards Rosenberg as he finished his orgasm. “I want to name him after my father.”

“Silence!” shouted Rosenberg. Before Crispin could react, Rosenberg grabbed him by the throat, and pushed him back into the center of the room with the others. Then he pointed directly at me.

This time I was too sick and weary to think up a good answer. My first choice had been made strategically to save or at least extend people’s lives, hopefully long enough for someone to come along and save us. But now the first wave of orgies had passed and it was time for me to make another decision.

Rosenberg wanted me to used my sixth sense to find the answer, so that was what I decided to so. In the moment of relative silence he allowed me, I cleared my mind as best I could, and put out the question to the voice that had spoken to me before. I received an answer, which I repeated verbatim without thinking.

“Let Ares come forth to play bloodsport and enjoy the caresses of Aphrodite, as he is wont to do.”

There was a logic at work here. Each of the gods invoked so far had been baited with something they found irresistible. Ares (a.k.a. Mars) was a god of warfare, rape and pillage. He was also famous for fornicating with Aphrodite (a.k.a. Venus) despite her marriage to Hephaestus (a.k.a. Vulcan).

“Yes, let him come forth,” said Rosenberg. “I’ve always preferred the purity of hatred to love, and death to sex. Marcia, if you please, march yourself up to the altar here.”

From the right side of the room, where she had sat being serviced by boy prostitutes, Marcia Martina arose, with her Roman helmet still on, but with the visor up, so that her face was visible. She grinned from ear to ear, and stared lustfully at her son, who looked back at her with dread. Consivia sprayed her with the aspergillum, and a Lion wafted her with incense again.

Then one of the Ravens pulled away the curtain with the Satanic cross of St.

Peter and brought forward a curtain displaying a Greek-style tapestry. From my position I could see that it showed a number of ancient battle scenes, including soldiers spilling out of a large wooden horse.

The Trojan War, I thought.

I then understood that the curtain had been made to represent Penelope’s tapestry from Homer’s Odyssey, the one she supposedly never finished.

Rosenberg stepped into the center of the room and began bellowing out a speech.

“Lord Mayor Marcia Martina: for centuries your family has been the keeper of the holy buckler of our temple. It was this sacred object that the site where we now stand, Bucklersbury, was secretly named for, as only the initiates of our esteemed syndicate know. This powerful talisman is represented on your family’s arms, and reference to it can be found in the current incarnation of your family’s name.”

She nodded her assent, as if to say “This much I know.”

“As the patrons of soldiers, your family has lent your wealth to assist in many great pageants of honor and valor, of bloodshed and rape. Your gold has been spent to pour the Water of Life upon the Earth, and she has thirstily drunk it up. With your help Britannia’s enemies have been conquered many times, creating an empire where the Sun never dies, shielding her with your strength.

Even now, as the aegis of the empire has been occulted from the eyes of the profane, you and your kin have continued in this service.”

She nodded again, now with a bit of curiosity in her eyes, like she wondering where this was going.

Then a Raven pulled back the tapestry to reveal a display of twelve heavy metallic shields mounted on the wall, painted red, all of different shapes and sizes. One of them, however, was in the shape of the Superman logo. It was placed in the center of the arrangement. Rosenberg continued his speech.

“Now, Lord Mayor, if you are fit to be the scion of your seed, the one who shall wear the mantle of great Mars, the captain of all armies, please walk up to the wall and take up the buckler of your esteemed heritage.”

Marcia seemed confused at first, then scared. She turned around and looked at me for help. I looked at the ground and tried to blank out my mind. I knew what was coming, and I wasn’t about to save her ass. So she walked up to the wall behind the altar and started guessing.

It was like watching someone playing Plinko on “The Price is Right,” trying to guess the correct digit. First she gravitated towards the one that looked like the shape of the shield of the Rothschild coat of arms. This was in fact the one that looked most like every heraldic shield you’ve ever seen. Then she reviewed the field of choices again, and settled on a much smaller one, which looked like the small round buckler that formed the central jewel on the Rothschild arms. This is the one that actually represented the “red shield” of popular lore.

It was this symbol that Mayer Amschel Rothschild supposedly used as a logo for his currency exchange business in Frankfurt. This is what the family was allegedly named after, according to mainstream historians. But now I knew better. They were named after another object, some kind of “talisman.”

Bucklersbury, the old name for the intersection of streets where the mithraeum and New Court both stood, had been named after this object, probably long before the Rothschilds “officially” took residence there. I was certain that it took the shape of the Superman logo, although I had no idea what that meant.

So Marcia had taken the wrong shield from the wall, albeit the logical choice. But she didn’t possess the secret gnosis that I had been given quite accidentally. She would pay the price for this mistake eventually, but not right away. Rosenberg preferred to play with her first. She stood with her left hand inserted into the handle of the buckler and stared at Rosenberg.

“Now what?”

Rosenberg turned to Consivia.

“Priestess, please, invoke the Archon of War,” he said.

Consivia motioned for Marcia to come stand with her before the altar. Then she laid her hand upon the woman’s brow and spoke commands into the aether.

“Lord Ares, come into this vessel of power. Enjoy with us the fruits of incarnation. Feel the glory of killing in the flesh for yourself once again as you help us initiate the greatest bloodbath the Earth has ever known. You can be the general, and you can call out the first shot!”

Suddenly we heard the ringing of a cell phone with a “99 Luftballons” ringtone. Marcia, startled, fumbled inside her robe with her right hand and pulled out her phone. She then stared at it in excited astonishment.

“Oh my goodness,” she said, as if she had any goodness. “It’s the Lord High Admiral. He only calls when there’s a war on.”

As she spoke, an orange-red ball of light came up out of the well in the corner, just like the one before, and flew across the room, straight into Marcia’s skull. She then became possessed of a spirit even more demonically evil and sadistic than the one she already called her own. When she answered the phone, she spoke with a masculine, guttural voice.

Fire the torpedo. We’ll help you pay for the aftermath, like always. Don’t worry.”

She hung up and distractedly tried to hand her buckler and phone over to Rosenberg.

“Father, hold these for me please,” she said, staring wantonly at Crispin.

Rosenberg jerked his hand away in disgust and motioned for one of the Ravens to take the items instead. Hands now free, she ripped open her robe and her blouse, squeezing her shriveled old breasts. Then she grabbed Crispin and kissed him passionately on the mouth, rubbing his chest and grasping his limp penis between her bony fingers.

The young man seemed revolted at first. But, overcome with his lingering possession by the Archon of Lust, he succumbed to her caresses and began to regain his erection. Marcia then decided to sit down on the stone bench on the wall opposite from the pillar where I was chained. She laid back on the large cushion behind her and had Crispin kneel with his head between her legs. I had a perfect view. I couldn’t help but stare in horror.

The son dutifully began stimulating his mother’s clitoris with his tongue, as I suspected he had done many times before in less ritualized and divinely inspired circumstances. She admonished him not to be “too hasty.” Then she closed her eyes and let out an intense moan that turned into a growl. After a few minutes, she told him to stop. She regained her composure temporarily and issued a command to the other people wearing Roman helmets like hers.

The Soldiers all looked at Rosenberg, who stood next to the altar. He nodded his agreement. Obediently, they all grabbed bucklers from the wall behind the altar, and spears, which were mounted right next to them. (None, I noticed, chose the Superman-logo-shaped shield, perhaps because it was so peculiar.) Then they stood at attention in two rows with four men each. There was a row of men on either side of her bench, staring across to each other, awaiting instructions.

There was a moment of hesitancy. The men looked at each other from behind their masks. But it only lasted for a few seconds, as Rosenberg appeared to have no objection. To the contrary, he issued a complimentary command to the Nymphus whose job it was to play the drum.

“Give me a drumbeat please. Something appropriate for a soldier marching to war.”

The Nymph nodded and began tapping out a furious beat. One of the guys in the middle of the row on my right struck out at the man across from him. Then all hell broke loose between the two teams. Blood was flying everywhere. An ear got sliced off and landed in front of me.

Marcia looked on at the spectacle in satisfaction, and leaned back again.

Crispin resumed his work. Within a couple of minutes, four men were dead, and Marcia looked like she was about to climax. She was laying diagonally on the bench now, arching her pelvis up towards Crispin’s mouth as he slurped away.

“Now fight each other until there’s only one of you,” she gasped in a raspy demonic voice. Caught up in the frenzy of battle by this time, nobody questioned the order. It took a few more minutes for these more competent soldiers to be cut down.

During this time, Marcia had her son remove his mouth several times for a few seconds, and then resume his work. She seemed to be timing her orgasm until the last kill of the combat was made. When this occurred, she began jerking spasmodically, yelling “Hurrah! Hurrah!” while the victor stood before her with his spear held high over his head, panting and sweating nervously. He was obviously still terrified for his life, even though he’d won.

The drummer boy had just finished his set, but a new set of knocks was heard coming from the doors of the front entrance. One of the Ravens went to open it as Marcia stood up and closed her robe. It was Miles. He walked in and raised his hand to signal Rosenberg.

In so doing, he exposed his gun, which was holstered in his belt on the front of his body. Marcia, seeming to react on instinct, seized it on sight. Miles just stared at her, taken aback at her brazenness. She turned around and pointed the gun at the victorious sole surviving Soldier.

“Well done, you brave young man. You’ve earned some metal on your chest.”

And with that, she shot him in the left breast. He fell over, emitting vacuous gasps of air from the hole in his lungs as blood sputtered out of his mouth.

“Ah yes, that was great!” yelled Marcia. She began goose-stepping around the room happily. Behind her, Miles cleared his throat loudly and then spoke past her to Rosenberg.

“Father, sir, two of our brothers have arrived late unexpectedly, with a little one in tow.”

“Tell them to go home. We can’t be interrupted now,” replied Rosenberg.

“How rude and careless of them. Our elect ones should know better than that.”

“These brothers are very important,” Miles added.

“Oh, then who are these supposed VIPs?” he asked, laughing. “You know that Mithras is no respecter of persons.”

“The Duke of Rothesay, sir. And Baron Carrickfergus. And Little Saint George.”

A collective gasp went through the room. It seemed that everyone present was both familiar and impressed with the code names mentioned. It wiped the smile off Marcia’s face. She sat down on the bench next to her son, both of them now looking very serious. Only Rosenberg was unmoved. He walked over and took the gun away from Marcia, who handed it over without objection.

“Is that so? Well, that is impressive. Nonetheless, I’m not sure we can dispose of one form of decorum for another….”

Prompted by my telepathic informant, I interrupted, projecting my voice as far as I could.

"Let them come hither. For three kings are destined to bow down before the new Sun!"

Rosenberg turned and looked at me through his mask. He cocked his head to the side, confused. Then he walked up to me and whispered.

"But don't we have to finish the rite tonight first? I believe the hour is getting late."

"And these are the ones who have been called to finish the rite! Some of the actors you have chosen do not fit the role."

I spoke quietly, and I no longer sounded like myself. My voice took on a seething quality, raspy and inhuman, as if I too had a hole in my lung, just like the poor Soldier who gurgled out his last spit of blood on the floor in front of me.

Rosenberg took it all in, then nodded.

"Go ahead, Miles, let them join us. But see that the two brothers are properly suited according to their grades in the order. As for the little one…"

He looked at me, as if waiting for a judgment from me about what to do with "Little Saint George." Apparently, this was a child too young to be a "brother" in an order that admitted boys as young as seven. He had been brought to a place where young boys were subjected to repeated homosexual rapes and made to be complicit in ritual murder.

How can I prevent them from bringing him into this pit of hell and abusing him here? , I asked my telepathic informant.

There is no way to save this child, the voice told me. But let Miles sit with him in the main lobby for now. I repeated that last part to Rosenberg as a command from the realm beyond.

"Don't worry," said Miles. "They're already in their costumes. I'll take care of the child."

With that, he ducked out through the door, which he left slightly ajar. A moment later, two men in robes and masks, one a Sun, the other a Lion, came through the doorway, then walked down the hall, the Lion leading the Sun. The Lion had salt and pepper hair. The Sun had short golden hair with a bald patch on top. They both came and stood before Rosenberg in the center of the room.

“Well, brothers, it’s nice to see that you finally decided to show up. I thought you were too busy to come tonight, despite my insistence that it would be the most important rite we have ever conducted.”

“Yes,” said the Lion. “Well, it has been an eventful evening. My father received a call from this building a few minutes ago that has initiated a very dangerous sequence of events. This country is now in a perilous international crisis. The Russian sub that was just torpedoed in the Straight of Dover may very well set off a nuclear war if we don’t dial it back somehow.”

“So we came here to talk to the very persons we believe to be fomenting this crisis, to ask them to back off,” said the Sun-man, looking at Marcia and Crispin. “We ask not only as representatives of the crown, but as your brothers in Mithras too.” He nodded politely with reserved deference towards Rosenberg. It was sort of a half-bow, as if showing respect for the leader of the Order, but holding back full obeisance out of respect for his own position of authority. It reminded me of Barack Obama trying to bow to the King of Saudi Arabia without looking like he was bowing.

“Duly noted, Rothesay. Thank you,” said Consivia, nodding back at him.

So that’s the Duke, I thought to myself. The other one must be Baron Carrickfergus. I wonder if he got his barony from the same place Leopold did. I was trying to think flippantly, to bring some levity to the situation for myself, but my gut told me that this Duke and Baron were not pretending. In fact, I got the feeling they were each just using some of their more minor titles for this occasion.

Marcia now stood up, looking possessed by evil intentions rather than fear once again. She took what she thought was her family's hereditary buckler back down from the wall, and one of the spears, which she held in her right hand with the tip downward. Then she strode arrogantly over to where the two apparent aristocrats of high stature, self-identified as agents of the crown, were standing.

She addressed herself first to the Lion.

“You know, not only should you not interrupt a meeting in progress that you couldn't be bothered to show up on time for. The fact is, in this part of town, you're supposed to ask for my permission to cross the pomoerium.”

“Not if Regina's still alive,” he replied.

“I hear she isn't,” said Marcia, bringing her spear up and pointing it in his face. “And if that's true you're putting the kingdom in a very precarious position by coming here. Which means you're desperate. So what do you have to bargain with? Is that why you brought Little Saint George? Bring him out here. I love a Vienna sausage every now and then.” She gnashed her teeth at him.

“Show some respect!” said Rosenberg, grabbing the spear from out of the Lord Mayor's hand. Even possessed by the war god, the old woman's boney hands were no match for the strength of a man. He didn't even have to point the gun at her, and instead holstered it in his waistband beneath his robe before he took the spear. As her weapon slipped out of her grasp, Ms. Martina stumbled backwards and landed on her butt. I heard brittle bones snap.

Osteoporosis is a bitch, I thought.

“Actually what you’re holding is a trinket,” Rosenberg said sneeringly as he towered over her cowering body. “It’s for little boys and girls who like to dress up and play toy soldier. The real Hebrew talisman that turned Nathan Rothschild into the Leviathan of finance worldwide is something else entirely. But of course, you don’t have the subtlety of mind to understand that. Wetzel!”

“Yes!” The other man with the Sun mask stumbled out from the shadows and stood dutifully before his master.

“Let the Lord Mayor and her son have a look at the explosive headlines that just hit the international news wires,” Rosenberg instructed.

“Which ones?” Wetzel asked. The nuclear threats from Russia? Or the financial news?”

“No, first the one about the video you just leaked to your contacts at the BBC,” the Pater specified.

Wetzel reached into his robe and pulled out a smartphone. He pressed a few buttons, and then turned the screen out towards where Marcia sat on the ground, looking aghast. Crispin got up and walked towards the screen, staring at it in horror with his right hand holding his veil up on top of his head. Wetzel pressed a button on the side of the phone, and the sound became loud enough for us all to hear.

It was a familiar sequence of words and sounds—ones we had just heard coming from Marcia moments earlier. We heard again the moans of ecstasy as her son pleasured her. Then a male TV presenter’s voice could be heard, apparently narrating a series of clips.

Marcia pushed her heavy metal helmet off of her head, and it landed with a loud clang on the floor. The presenter continued.

“Of course, we won’t be showing you even doctored versions of that, as it does constitute child pornography and is illegal to possess. We’ve passed both videos on to MI5 for authentication.”

“I hope those shots were tight enough to conceal our location,” said Wetzel.

“Shh,” said Rosenberg. “Listen.” The report went on.

“But the most heart-breaking thing is that this film, and the first one we showed you, with Crispin Martina, were date-stamped with tonight’s date, from less than an hour ago. That means that this sick party, where children are being abused, is potentially still taking place right now. Scotland Yard has confirmed that they are on their way to Mansion House with a warrant for the Lord Mayor’s arrest.”

“Good God, Blake, you’ll get us all taken down. What have you done?” said Crispin. He reached in his robe, got out his phone, and began dialing a number.

“That is an extreme move,” said the Duke of Rothesay to Rosenberg.

“We’re all vulnerable when it comes to that sort of thing. It’s supposed to be the bullet that never gets fired.”

“Tell that to Jimmy Saville,” said Marcia, opening up her own cell phone now. “I’ll be damned if I’m going to let you hang me out to dry like that. My family won’t let it happen.”

“Your family will be too busy scraping up whatever assets they have left and fleeing the countries they live in,” said Rosenberg. “While you were in this chamber having your smegma-covered cunt serviced by your sniveling son, the value of your family’s wealth has evaporated. What good will mountains of gold do you when the volume of gold on the market has just been quadrupled literally overnight?”

There was a collective gasp in the room, then a few seconds of silence.

“That’s impossible,” said Crispin. “Our family holds over half of the world’s gold. There’s no way anyone could dump that much gold on the market without our participation. And we’re not selling right now.”

“That’s OK, ‘cause nobody’s buying,” Rosenberg retorted. “Did you forget that you’re talking to an alchemist?”

The eyes of both Martinas widened at the sound of that. They stared in disbelief.

“You can’t be serious,” said Marcia.

“He is,” said Crispin addressing his mother. “He made it from the urine we’ve been getting from the throne in Westminster. He discovered the tubes in the tunnels, remember?”

“Oh fuck,” she said, tearing her wig off and revealing the gray hear underneath, with a significant bald patch on top.

“And I’ve got a process that produces in much more abundance than what you and your ancestors have been doing,” said Rosenberg. “I know the true secrets of multiplicatio, not just confidence tricks!”

“Because you’ve been harvesting semen from all your employees here for over a year,” said Crispin, pacing back and forth frantically. “Through the robots and the glory hole in the Qaphqa. And from all of the orgies we’ve been having over at the Coffin House over the last year. And the blood and guts of the victims too. God, even the spinal fluids. I can’t believe I didn’t see what you were up to. I really believed you were looking for a source of free energy, to help the Earth.”

“Oh, what I’m about to do will give the Goddess of Dirt exactly what she needs, and a source of power that will be inexhaustible. You see, Crispin, what she really wants is to be reunited with her lover, the sky, and that is the kind of love that we are making tonight. It’s a strange love, a mad love, like the laugh of the hell-worm that will not die. Isn’t that right, Reverend Springhole?” He turned around and looked at Consivia. She smiled at him and nodded.

“What the Devil are you talking about?” asked the Duke of Rothesay.

“The Devil you don’t know, apparently,” said Rosenberg. “Never mind, you’ll find out soon enough.”

The Pater then turned back to Marcia and Crispin.

“So you see, Lord Mayor, you bitch of the parasitic, warmongering House of Rothschild: as much as I hate the sickly sweet love between low, plebian souls, I actually hate hatred too, even more. Certainly, we can do without the kind of revolutionary instincts that your family fosters to keep the war machine turning.

Because it weakens loyalty, quickens the pride, and stirs rebellion among the unworthy.”

He inhaled and exhaled deeply, pacing in a circle around the two Martinas.

He continued.

“In the new aeon, there will be no resistance to the Lord of Unrule.

Remember what Zeus once said to Ares in the Aeneid? To his own despised son?

He said ‘were you born of some other god … long since you would have been dropped beneath the gods of the bright sky.’ We don’t need a war god under the new Sun.”

Marcia turned to her son.

“Crispin, help Mummy up please.”

The young man reached down, grabbed the injured old woman’s arm and began lifting her to her feet. She leaned on his shoulder, putting her weight on him. But he reached out to Rosenberg for the spear, which his boss willingly handed over to him.

Then Crispin placed the spear upside-down with the tip of the handle pressed down onto the floor, and pushed his mother’s body towards the blade.

She fell upon it, and it went all the way through, skewering her through the heart.

There was only time for her to utter a single wheeze before she closed her mouth forever. Crispin let the body fall to the floor as it expired. Then he turned to Rosenberg, with a pleading look.

“Please just help me escape from this. I will be your most loyal servant, as I always have been. I’m willing to do anything. I’ll even. . . .” He paused to consider what he was agreeing to, staring off blankly at a far wall. “I’ll even let the Barber-Surgeons change my beautiful face, if it means I can be released from the life of infamy that now stands before me.” He looked like he was going to cry.

“Your beauty is fading in any case, dear lover,” said Rosenberg. “You’re far too old and your rectum is far too worn out for my taste these days.”

At this, tears were definitely welling up in the corner of Crispin’s reddened baby-blue eyes. Rosenberg continued his emotional torture.

“But don’t forget: I’ve got you on camera now too, diddling a twelve-year-old girl. So why don’t you give up now to avoid the humiliation. In the next aeon, a new catamite will be born to me with the beauty of Ganymede.”

He sighed at the pleasure of this contemplation, then reached in his waistband and pulled out the gun. He offered it to Crispin, holding it by the barrel.

Without a moment's hesitation, he put it his mouth and pulled the trigger, spraying his brains all over Consivia behind him.

The splatter reached the ceiling too, as well as the wall, and the altar where Philippine now lay silent and still on top of the rotting bull carcass. Some of the gore apparently sprinkled on the Duke's lion mask, even managing to penetrate the slit of the mask's mouth. He stuck his finger underneath the mask and we heard him lick his lips.

"Mmm, tastes like a Jew," the Duke said. Everybody in the room started laughing uproariously.

"Hey!" said Rosenberg in mock objection, chuckling underneath his Mithras mask. "I resemble that remark!" More cachinnation followed.

The Duke pulled off his mask, revealing his rat-like old face, proving that he was indeed the person I feared he was.

Here's one of the most crucial figures in the kingdom, I thought, standing there exposing himself to incrimination that could destroy the crown itself, not to mention the threat of assassination. Yet he seems so perfectly comfortable, as though he still trusts in the honor among thieves. This even after he just watched two other very important figures cut down in cold blood before him. Even after he himself has just been threatened with a spear by one of them. Despite the fact that Rosenberg has shown himself to be indisputably the most powerful person in the room, with a financial weapon in his arsenal of an unimaginable magnitude, and completely disloyal to his so-called "brothers", neither Duke nor Baron seem fazed at all.

"So, my liege," said Rosenberg to the Duke, "can you call off your dogs at Scotland Yard before they start combing through every building on the block?”

“Can you help me call off the dogs of war that the Lord Mayor unleashed?”

“Yes, but this first,” Rosenberg insisted. “If they don’t find the Lord Mayor at Mansion House, they will surely go looking at New Court, and eventually they’ll end up here.”

“That’s precisely why you shouldn’t have leaked that video to the press!

What were you thinking? Anyway, I can’t be seen to interfere on this case. Not with all the child sex charges still haunting Andrew. The order to quash must come from within Scotland Yard, or from within the Security Services. Don’t you have connections at Thames House?”

“I used to,” said Rosenberg. Then he remembered. “Wait, yes!” He got out his phone and pressed a button, then spoke into it.

“Yes, Miles? Please go fetch the man in the elevator at New Court and bring him to my office. I’ll meet you there. Thank you.”

While the Duke and the Baron stood casually mumbling to each other, Rosenberg walked up to me to whisper another demand for instructions through divination.

“So what’s next,” he asked. “How should we proceed?”

A voice from beyond seemed to take over my larynx in response to Rosenberg’s prompting.

I was ready for him. I had already received a message from my psychic informant.

“The seed of Venus was planted in the appropriate vessel corresponding to her sphere of influence. As for the others, let the three kings plant their royal seeds in her rose garden next door instead. Let the king with the highest rank have her first. Then let the Sun-Runner's horses plough her field too. This will open a gateway between the two gardens, causing the seeds to comingle and graft together in a manner more than natural. It will also free her mortal soul and complete the rites for this evening."

I really had no idea what these metaphors were about at the time. I think Rosenberg's understanding of them was vague and incomplete, or else he would never have gone along with the plan.

"Horses? Where from?" he asked, incredulous.

"Send a text with the Lord Mayor's phone to the Lord High Admiral," the voice said through me. "Tell him to come here with four horses and a chariot with standing room for two. He must inform none but his personal entourage where he is going, and may use only his most trusted assistants for this. He shall take the tunnels to be sure he isn't followed. Also, tell him to bring the device he uses for mating with horses."

"He has a 'device' for mating horses?" said Rosenberg, amused.

"Mating with horses," the voice I spoke with corrected him. "Most certainly. Just letting him know that you know about it will be enough to ensure that he gets himself here right away."

"And you want us to squeeze four horses and a carriage in here?"

Rosenberg said skeptically. "With all these other people?"

"No," I replied. "On the sky terrace at New Court. Make sure someone brings me another shot of morphine before we go." The informant's voice was confined to my mind now, allowing me to control my own throat again, but still feeding me the lines.

"So the Lion and the Sun-Runner whom I'd planned to use: what shall we do with them now?" asked Rosenberg.

“Continue to use the Lion as a servant,” I said, hoping as I spoke it was worth it to save Leopold’s life. “But not Wetzel. He’s finished his purpose. We shall add his blood to the Hellbroth in the Gradalis, and use his fat to make a flying ointment. Make sure it’s prepared before the next ceremony begins.”

I felt no remorse. Wetzel was a child rapist and an accessory to murder, just like everyone else in the room. Also, from what I could tell, he was slated for sacrifice at the end of the ritual anyway. I just assumed that most of us were. I was just moving up his execution date one day, I figured. These were the instructions I had been given by my psychic informant, and I saw no reason to deviate from the message in any way.

“Now, do the invocations before the Sun-Runner’s carriage arrives,” I was told to say.

“The Sun-Runner’s carriage?” Rosenberg said, second-guessing me. “You mean the Lord High Admiral’s carriage?”

“He will be bringing it, but it’s for the Sun-Runner’s use,” I said with telepathic prompting. “It is he who shall work those Starry Wheels. Have your servants outfit it with scythes for reaping.”

Rosenberg nodded. “Anything else?”

“Yes,” the voice continued through me. “Have them connect the Walbrook to the Rothschilds’ royal pissing conduit at Bucklersbury, so that the spirits of the Archons can travel to New Court with ease. There is a piping system sufficient in diameter for our needs that you can access behind a locked door in the tunnels there at that junction. It can only be opened with Crispin’s fingerprints—the right hand, and just the fingers of blessing. This pipe connects to the toilets in the Sky Box. Make an opening for them to get from the Sky Box toilets to the terrace below. It will serve as a divine portal for the rite, like the well that you have here.”

Again, I did not understand the meaning of the words I was speaking. I reached for a picture in my mind of how this was going to play out, but was given only a blank screen. After receiving that last detail from me, Rosenberg promptly pivoted on his heals and called out to the men in the black leather veils standing at the back of the room.

“Butchers! Please, take the bodies of these Soldiers down to the Gradalis room for processing. But leave the Lord Mayor and Crispin. Lay them down on the benches. We have special plans for them.”

“Wait!” said Baron Carrickfergus. “First, I’ve got to take a leak. Dad, what do you say?” He looked at the Duke and gestured towards the bodies of the two Martinas.

“Oh yes, splendid idea,” said the Duke. “My bladder is bursting. I’ve had a pint too many tonight.”

Both men walked up to the corpses, which had fallen within inches of each other, and opened up their own robes. Then I heard the unzipping of trousers and the splash of the urine as it hit its targets. The father and son walked in a circle around the two bodies so as to thoroughly drench each one. As they did so, they laughed.

“So you want my piss, do you?” said the Duke to the lifeless remains as he soiled them. “There you go, bean-counters. Drink your fill.”

“Oh, how I’d love to do this to the rest of the family,” said the Baron as the last of his urine stream sputtered out.

“You can,” said Rosenberg. “But it’s not necessary. They shan’t be bothering you much anymore, now that my economic plan is taking effect.”

“Still, I wish you’d have let me piss in their mouths while they were still alive, these two,” said the Duke, shaking off the final drops. “They were worst. I never understood what you saw in that boy, other than his pretty mouth and his tender arse.”

sign of life I'd seen from her in a while. Rosenberg continued his speech.

"And now, tonight, she is providing the material basis for the most ambitious magical working that any man has ever attempted. But I am inviting you, my lords, to aid me in this endeavor. Tonight, as part of this effort, Philippine will die in the midst of extreme pain and sexual degradation. The Lord High Admiral is already on his way here to lend some technical assistance. I would be much obliged if you two would play out the roles I have prepared for you."

"You know very well that we are already obliged to you, so of course we will accommodate," answered the Duke, closing his robe.

"Is she a virgin?" asked the Baron, now gently stroking his swollen member.

"Not as of an hour ago," said Rosenberg, with a slight hint of regret in his voice. "But the back door is what I'm going to hit. After you two, of course."

"Oh, but let my son have first shot," said the Duke. "He's very particular about these things."

"Of course, it's a deal," said Rosenberg, shaking the hands of both men in turn. "We'll be moving over to New Court for the next part of the operation."

He looked down at his phone, which had just received another message.

"But first, I must speak to one of my captives," he said in conclusion.

Then he addressed the Butchers, who had been standing there the whole time waiting for permission to take the bodies of the Martinas. He held up his right thumb, index finger, and middle finger.

"Take the first three fingers from Crispin's right hand and save them for me," he instructed. "Then take the bodies and put them in the Coffin House, in pods 1 and 2."

So the other building was intentionally made to look like a coffin, I discerned silently.

The Butchers complied with the orders. One of them snipped off the fingers with large meat shears. The others covered up the corpses with curtains (Crispin with the cross curtain, Marcia with the Troy tapestry). Then four more Butchers came through the main entrance and carried the bodies away on gurneys. Before they arrived, Rosenberg had already gone, presumably to speak with Chesterfield, whom I took to be his “captive,” the MI5 contact he bragged to the Duke of Rothesay about.

I swooned with exhaustion at the thought of what must still lay before us, before the night was even through, before I would be allowed to rest in the comfort of either sleep or, most likely, death, it seemed to me. Though it hadn’t really been that long, I felt like I needed another shot of morphine. Just when I thought I couldn’t take waiting any longer, Leopold showed up with the syringe in hand, giving me the only small comfort I would be permitted that night. Oh, and one other: he gave me a long draught of water from a stone amphora.

I wished I could have drowned in it at that moment.

Chapter 22: Archons Uprooted

And when We said unto the angels: Prostrate yourselves before Adam, they fell prostrate, all save Iblis. He demurred through pride, and so became a disbeliever.

—Quran 23:97, Pickthal translation

The rooftop terrace at New Court was positioned partially beneath the Sky Box where our evening began, with our rancid meal of raven meat and champagne. However, most of it was uncovered and sitting to the east of there.

The Sky Box was mounted unevenly on top of the two adjoined New Court buildings, as if a toddler had been lazily stacking up wooden blocks on the floor. It hovered, mounted on poles, mostly over one of the buildings: the one we'd initially entered. But part of it stuck out to the East over the other building, which had the terrace on top. And that is where we were now all assembled for the second part of tonight's ritual. The mysterious voice that had spoken through me told Rosenberg that's what we should do.

I had no idea how long these ceremonies would stretch on into the future. I was in so much pain, so tired, disoriented, scared, worried, sick, hungry, and in dread of the horrors to come that my only hope was to put to death soon, without more torture or degradation. But the hope felt empty. I also anticipated that there were even worse things to be concerned with besides just what my own fate was. The signs in the heavens were ominous.

The Moon was huge, now with a red mass that appeared to be swelling within it. Two of them had disappeared, but there were still four huge stars hovering around the Moon, even larger than before, with one significantly bigger than the others. Both the Moon and the stars were lower in the sky than before.

You might think that Rosenberg and the others would have been concerned about the possibility of others seeing us up there, especially when Scotland Yard was supposedly en route to arrest Marcia. We had actually seen, from the roof, police arriving at Mansion House next door to the northwest. Uniformed officers had gotten in position around the perimeter, preparing to perform some kind of action. We even saw a helicopter approaching in the distance.

For a minute, Rosenberg did appear worried, and alerted Chesterfield, who now sat next to me on the grass, handcuffed to my wheelchair. The spook had merely shrugged his shoulders, looking scared of retaliation for failure. But then the helicopter turned around 180 degrees and went back the way it came. The policemen all got in their cars and drove away. Rosenberg patted Chesterfield on the shoulder and went back to preparing the rest of the ritual.

The Lord High Admiral arrived with his escorts through the elevator. He was not wearing a costume initially, but came in a navy blue suit with a brown overcoat and a black derby. Wrinkled and decrepit, he stooped a bit, but not as much as you'd think a man his age would. His jaw quivered uncontrollably, though, and his bloodshot eyes burned with the fire of dementia on top of psychopathy.

In days of his prime, he would have been among the ones raping and murdering with zeal. Tonight, his job was merely to bring the horses and their gear, all of which arrived through the service elevator. This included the carriage, stood up on its back end to fit inside, and of course the "device for mating with horses." This latter item resembled the one used by Pasiphae, the wife of King Minos, to mate with the Cretan bull, made by Daedalus on the orders of Zeus.

This one, the Lord High Admiral bragged to us, had been made for the set of a Spanish film, 1978's The Coming of Sin (though you might know it under alternative titles like The Violation of the Bitch or Sodomia).

The terrace was designed along a grid of lines formed by stone and cement, arranged diagonally against the sides of the roof so as to form a pattern of rhombi. Within this grid were placed patches of grass, trees, and hedges enclosing larger rhombus-shaped paved areas, which were meant to be used as “outdoor meeting rooms.” Inside the largest of these, in the southeast corner of the terrace, the brazen horse was set up. It was put in the northeastern corner of the hedge, which was closed all around except for its northwest corner.

Three or four yards apart from this, in the center of the hedge, three velvet-covered throne-like wooden chairs—one yellow, one purple, and one black—were assembled in the eastern corner in a semi-circle facing the back end of the horse. The Duke of Rothesay was seated on the left side, in the purple chair. The Baron was ensconced in a yellow throne in the middle, looking down at his crotch, petting it gently with his thumb. Rosenberg sat on the right, in the black chair.

Like everyone else present, they still wore their robes and masks.

Behind the thrones, three standards, each about three foot by two foot, hung down from a horizontal pole held up by two others. Each flag had a field matching in hue to the color of the throne it flew behind. The purple one behind the Duke showed an old man in a toga vomiting up six planetary sigils and a red polygon: the Superman logo again. On the black flag behind Rosenberg there was a similar figure eating a human baby.

But on the golden flag behind the Baron, there was an image of the Sun inverted, with a pained expression on its face, surrounded by what appeared to be a pool of red blood. It reminded me of the Sun and the Moon on the Mete coffer.

“I think my flag’s upside-down” said Baron Carrickfergus to Rosenberg.

“It certainly is not,” Rosenberg replied.

The torches were lit, held now by the Lions standing at the three closed corners of the hedge, and the electric lights at the top of the New Court buildings were switched off. All of the Butchers and Ravens gathered in the southwestern corner, to the left of me, facing the three seats and the brazen horse. To my right in the southeast, aligned with St. Swithin’s Lane, beneath the low-hanging Moon with its juicy red center, another altar had been set up. It was the Cybele altar—the one that had been used in the castration ritual in 1956. Behind it stood Consivia, muttering prayers with her eyes closed. On either side of her were two Nymphi, with the one stage left holding a violin.

Above and to the left of the hedge, hanging from beneath the Sky Box, was a green plastic construction chute, about twelve inches in diameter. Normally used for removing debris from rooves and upper floors during construction projects, it had been hastily assembled by Rosenberg’s servants and connected through the bottom of the Sky Box, as per my orders. On top of the Sky Box, in the center of its eastern edge, Rosenberg had them erect nothing less than the London Stone itself.

The Stone had apparently come recently into his possession, being held in safekeeping for the City of London for a short term. It was supposed to be installed for public display the following week close to its original location on Cannon Street, right in front of the Walbrook Building next door to both New Court and Rosenberg Plaza.

About an hour earlier that evening, while things were being set up there on the terrace, and Wetzel’s body was being rendered into various products, Rosenberg had showed me the London Stone, which he had hidden inside the column that was holding up the altar in the mithraeum. He was showing it mainly to brag to me that he had it, and also to ask me if I thought it should be used as a ritual implement in the next portion of the ceremonies. I instantly saw in my mind’s eye that it contained the same red light I had seen at the end of the bull entrails I had been forced to examine. I then heard that same mental voice tell me that the London Stone held the answer to that other riddle which Rosenberg was demanding a solution for.

This Rock is the Egg that contains the Keystone, it said.

It seemed to me that my survival depended on giving Rosenberg the information he wanted to make his ritual successful from his perspective, whatever that meant. So on my instruction (acting on the inspiration that came to me from my psychic informant), Rosenberg had the Ravens post the London Stone on top of the very pylon that it was due to later be displayed on. I had him place it sitting on its side, taller than it was wide, unlike the way it was normally seen.

Consivia ceased her private prayers and it became deathly quiet. The only sound was coming from the four live horses, outside the hedge and beyond our field of vision. They could be heard clopping around and snorting, as the Lord High Admiral and two of his personal servants prepared them for God knows what.

The Duke of Rothesay reached into his jacket underneath his robe and pulled out a cigarette wrapped in brown paper. He pushed up his mask part-way and was about to light it with a Zippo. Rosenberg looked over at him and coughed. He threw it on the ground, put his mask down again disapprovingly, and slumped back into his chair.

One of the Nymphi started chanting in Latin verse once again, for just a few lines. The last was perfectly timed. It ended just as the bells of St. Paul’s Cathedral struck out, ringing eleven times. Clouds began to cluster around the stars and the pregnant Moon. A cold breeze stirred the air for just a moment, which had the effect of intensifying rather than dispersing the tension.

Next, having been told by me that the proper Archon to invoke next was Zeus (a.k.a. Jupiter), Consivia told the Duke of Rothesay to stand before the altar.

“Will the royal Lion on the purple throne come forth please?” she said, holding out her right hand in a beckoning gesture.

Then a man in a Raven mask approached the Duke from his right with a metal bowl containing a piece of cooked meat. It smelled like the same stuff served to us at dinner that night. In another hand, he held a metal goblet filled with wine.

“Eat, dear prince, the sweet livers of the birds who guarded thy kingdom.

And drink the ambrosial wine made from the blood of thine enemies.”

He cocked his head to the side, as if confused. Then he sighed and pushed his mask up a few inches, exposing his mouth. He grabbed the meat with his hand, quickly shoving it into his gob whole. I think it was just the bird’s liver “Mmmph,” he gagged.

A Nymphus began playing a raucous, violent tune on the violin. I watched the Duke’s mandibles masticating as he forced himself to eat it despite its awful taste. Then he took the wine and swallowed the whole mess in one gulp. His throat bulged as it went down. Sweat began to pour down his neck. Then he emitted a growl and broke into loud, heavy breathing as he handed back the dishes to the Ravens.

He stared at the Priestess with his arms at his sides, balled into fists. She pushed his mask back down and then laid her left hand upon his head. She used her right to douse him with her aspergillum as she intoned the following incantation.

Jupiter Feretrius,

On this rooftop come to us,

Use your thunderbolts to free

The trophy of your destiny

Let your flaming sword come fly

Down from your throne in the sky

Then the stony egg shall yield

To thy crown the true Red Shield.

So that from thine enemy

Whom we killed so valiantly

Spoils of war you now shall reap

Precious jewel that's yours to keep

I didn't tell her that the Rock was an Egg, I thought. How did she know?

Behind her, one of the four stars hovering next to the Moon in the southern sky unmistakably began—I swear—to droop down and come closer. It grew so large that it no longer looked like a star, but rather a giant purple ball of light.

This terrified me more than anything I had witnessed so far. All my life I had suffered from a recurring apocalyptic nightmare about seeing something just like this in the sky. I now realized that these were all premonitory dreams preparing me for this exact moment.

Everybody else gazed up at the purple ball in wonder, even Rosenberg and Consivia. The Duke seemed almost like he had been electrocuted in place as he stood like a statue staring at it, with Consivia’s hand still on his head. Baron Carrickfergus turned to Rosenberg and spoke, awkwardly.

“Oh yes, we saw something like this on the way over here this evening.

Looked like there was a star literally hovering over your Plaza, Blake. They were almost like guiding lights directing us to your doorstep.”

“Shh!” said Rosenberg, annoyed.

Clouds covered the rest of the sky all around us, like being smothered by a pile of freshly-sheared Gotland wool. They obscured everything but the purple sphere. Consivia handed the Duke a sistrum, as I had told her to. (This was a rattle used in ancient Rome to make a noise like thunder in rituals.)

“Juppiter Tonans! Shake your thunder-stick!” she commanded the Duke. He obeyed. The sistrum rattled, held high above his head. Then we heard a clap of thunder, and a bolt of lightning shot down—not from the clouds, but directly from the purple orb. It hit the London Stone on top of the Sky Box. The music stopped and everybody gasped.

The Stone immediately disintegrated, and chunks rained down on us. One of them hit the violinist in the shoulder, nicking him. Another one clobbered Philippine in the back, bruising her badly and causing her to crumple back down to the ground with more sobs.

But inside the oolite of the London Stone was a hidden surprise, revealed when it disintegrated: a gigantic shimmering clear crystal. It looked to be well over a foot wide and almost a foot tall, which meant that it had been taking up the majority of the space within its casing. about It landed with its tip pointing downward on the hedge right behind the altar, shining brightly even in the dim light as it fell. From the side, it looked exactly like the Superman logo.

From subsequent research, I have learned that this is actually the shape of the side-profile of a diamond that has been cut in the style called the “modern round brilliant.” This is currently the most popular diamond cut, designed to refract the maximum amount of light. What’s odd is that, as you might have guessed from the name, this cut is a twentieth century invention, created by Marcel Tolkowsky of Belgium in 1919. Yet this giant brilliant cut diamond had clearly been hiding inside the London Stone for hundreds of years at least.

Furthermore, the number of facets, and their distribution on this enormous gemstone in front of me turned out, as I soon discovered, to match the modern standard for a modern round brilliant cut. This consists of 33 on the crown, and 25 on the pavilion, for a total of 58. It was designed this way to refract the maximum amount of light.

Whatever the explanation for this, I knew it was obviously going to be something very unusual. Considering the strange things that had already happened, I was able to accept the presence of a modernly-designed gemstone concealed inside of a supposedly ancient and natural rock as another example of the mutability of reality.

After the diamond landed on top of the hedge, Consivia looked at the Duke and gestured at it as if to say "Go ahead." In response, the Duke nodded to her and walked behind the altar. He reached up to take the shining gemstone from the top of the hedge. When he got his elderly, shaking hands upon it, he almost dropped it. He pulled his mask up above his eyebrows and gazed at it with awe.

Its lustrous sparkles reflected in his eyes.

"What is this?" he shouted to Rosenberg. "This has been inside the London Stone the whole time? What's it made of? What's it for? My God, how much is it worth?"

Rosenberg exhaled in exasperation. "It is worth more than your mother's entire kingdom—not just because of what its made of, but also because of what it can do. And yes, the Lords of the City have had it keistered on Cannon Street this tire time. It's part of the reason why the City has always been more powerful than the monarchy, though almost everyone has forgotten that by now. Even the Rothschilds, the younger ones, don't know about it. They don't even know what their family buckler symbolizes, or why this place is named Bucklersbury."

"It looks like an actual diamond!" the Duke gasped, still fawning over it.

"But it's got to be ten times bigger than any diamond I've ever seen!" Rosenberg nodded, smiling.

"If my projections are correct," he said, "it should be 15.5 inches across the girdle, and 10.625 inches from the tip of its culet to top of its crown. That's four times bigger than the largest uncut diamond ever seen," answered Rosenberg.

"That was the Cullinan, which Edward VII had chopped up into over a hundred pieces, now all owned by your mother. But I reckon she's never seen one cut quite like this, or with the same properties."

The Duke turned it around in his hands, allowing me a glimpse of the octagonal "table" at the top of the crown. I realized that the geometry on the top of the diamond matched what I had seen found in the design of the sunroof for Rosenberg's main building next door.

"Yes, who would have done the cutting, if this thing has been around for hundreds of years?" asked the Duke. "I mean, it's a brilliant cut, right? 58 facets? I thought this design was invented by that Tolkowsky fellow in 1919."

"In my experience," Rosenberg replied, "most modern scientific discoveries are either rediscoveries or reworkings of ancient alchemical techniques.

Sometimes the inventors are ignorant of this, but sometimes they hide the truth too, just so they can file a patent. Take silicon on sapphire, for instance…” The Duke interrupted, to Rosenberg’s annoyance.

“The workmanship is fantastic! I’ll bet the fire it puts out is amazing. Shall I call up my man in Ghent to have it evaluated?”

Rosenberg rolled his eyes. “You are speaking as a mortal!” he said to the Duke. “A monarch-in-waiting, yes, and intoxicated with divine substance, but you still speak as a man. Let the Lord of Olympus take control of your mind and body completely. Let him experience the pleasures of being a man in the flesh through your own mortal flesh. Then you will remember what it is you hold in your hands.”

As he said that last sentence, Rosenberg looked up at the purple orb, now even larger and lower in the sky than before. He stood up and gestured to the Duke’s empty chair.

“Return to your throne here,” he instructed. “Soon the Ravens will bring you something that Jove himself could not resist.”

The Duke sat down with the enormous jewel in his lap, pointing upward.

The violin struck up again, and the Priestess called Baron Carrickfergus to the altar.

“Will the majestic Sun-Runner on the golden throne come forth please?”

He got up and walked to her with an arrogant swagger. She gave him the same preliminaries as the Duke had been given. He choked down his raven liver with disgust equal to that of his predecessor, but no greater comprehension of what he was eating. However, he really seemed to savor the intoxicating effects of the food and drink, which took hold immediately, with the characteristic sweating and heavy breathing.

After draining his glass of blood-ambrosia, he asked for a second, which he was given. When he had swallowed the last of it, he uttered a loud laugh of voluptuous exultation. Then he pushed down his mask again, pointed to the

“My dear Lion Prince, you know quite well that incest and pederasty is in your nature, not only because of your genetic predisposition, but because of the planetary archon that rules over you. He’s the ruler of a dying aeon who doesn’t seem to have noticed that his throne is slipping out from underneath him. You do remember, don’t you?”

The Duke’s body began to quiver as the boy came closer. To the right of us, over the sound of the Baron’s ecstatic moaning and the ridiculous violin solo, the distant crash of thunder could be heard, and the clouds above grew even thicker.

Rosenberg turned his attention to the light ball in the sky.

“Wouldn’t you love to sit in the throne of power again, the one which your own son supplanted you from, and be serviced by his son as a slave, turning his royal heir into your own royal cupbearer?”

These last lines were directed more at the spirit of Zeus than the man who was becoming possessed by him. Rosenberg was reminding the lord of Olympus how he had obtained victory over his father Chronos by pretending to be his “cupbearer.” This was a euphemism used in the ancient world for a catamite—a young male sex slave.

Zeus used his intimate position in his father’s royal court to obtain an opportunity to “poison” Chronos, a plot said to have been devised by the goddess Metis, whom Hammer-Purgstall identified with Mete/Baphomet. As you no doubt remember, this caused Chronos to vomit up the children he had swallowed, which included all of Zeus’ siblings, the gods of Olympus. They then defeated Chronos and the Titans, locked them up in Tartarus beneath the Earth, and then ruled happily ever after. Or, at least, that’s where the Greeks broke off their tale.

Come to think of it, I said to myself mentally, the Romans did imply that Apollo was the first-born son and successor to Zeus, or Jupiter, as they called him.

Apollo was the Olympian sun god, in contract to Helios/Sol, who played the role of the Sun during the "Golden Age" of Chronos/Saturn and the Titans. Most writers just chose to say that Helios/Sol became 'syncretized' with Apollo in later years.

But what if they were really separate characters? I wondered. What if Apollo supplanted Helios as the new sun, and the former sun he overthrew was locked up in Tartarus with the rest of the Titans? Maybe that's the meaning of the symbol of the 'black sun' that's 'in the center of the Earth.'

Then I thought about the fact that in the late Roman Empire, Mithraism finally gained support from the emperors by syncretizing Mithras with Sol Invictus, thus making a god already identified with Saturn/Chronos a solar figure as well.

And alchemists have consistently identified Saturn with the black sun, I thought. In the present aeon, which is the one that supplanted the rule of Zeus from Olympus, the Sun is the undisputed ruler of the current order. But Zeus used to play that role somehow, and before him, Chronos did it. But during that time, Helios was a separate entity, playing a different role than he does now. The Sun was not, back then, the central power. Or rather, someone else was playing the role of 'the Sun.'

Now the things that Rosenberg said to the Duke of Rothesay made sense to me. The Duke's body was being used to draw down Zeus/Jupiter into mortal incarnation. The body of Baron Carrickfergus was being used to draw down the spirit of the new sun, his successor.

Zeus was defeated by the new sun god, I thought to myself. I wonder when that happened exactly. The era of the worship of Jupiter gave way at the end of the empire to Apollo, Sol Invictus, Mithras, and of course … to Jesus.

And there it was. The answer to my question of when the aeon of Zeus/Jupiter had given way to that of the present sun was obvious: year 1

Anno Domini.

The transition marked by the collapse of Rome and the descent of the West into long-term intellectual darkness may not have been clear to everyone back then, I thought. But later it became connected with the advent of Jesus Christ, and it came to pass that the reckoning of time was started over from that point. So fate devised an appropriate way of marking the passage from the Aeon of one Sun to that of the next.

All of this came to me as I sat there in the wheelchair at the rooftop terrace of New Court, prompted by the comments that Rosenberg was making to the Duke of Rothesay.

Zeus is being enticed into the Duke's body, I realized , with the promise of having Apollo, his supplanter, serve in the humiliating position of cupbearer, as Zeus had once done in the effort to take the throne from his father. Also, pederasty with very young boys was a known proclivity of Zeus', going back to his kidnapping of Ganymede to serve as his own cupbearer.

My attention snapped back to the scene in front of me. Little Saint George was being guided by Miles to stand between the legs of the Duke, who handed the diamond over to Rosenberg . He looked at the man in the Lion mask with fear, clearly not recognizing that it was his own grandfather. Then Miles tapped the boy's shoulder, and he sank to his knees, obviously trained for the job ahead of time.

The Duke handed the red crystal in his lap to Rosenberg, who then handed it to a trusted Raven. I looked away, up at the sky, just in time to see something like a golden chain, appearing as thick as a tree trunk, emerged from the purple orb. It dangled down somewhere to the south, seemingly close to our location.

The bottom of the chain dropped down below my line of sight.

The Golden Chain of the Zeus, I thought to myself.

In Homer’s Iliad, Zeus says to the other gods: If you tied a chain of gold to the sky, and all of you, gods and goddesses, took hold, you could not drag Zeus the High Counsellor to earth with all your efforts. But if I determined to pull with a will, I could haul up land and sea, then loop the chain round a peak of Olympus, and leave them dangling in space. By that much am I greater than gods and men.

Here I was looking at such a golden chain, quite literally, with Spiga-style links (forged from ovals twisted to look like grains of wheat). It dropped down from the purple sphere like Rapunzel’s hair, hanging there for a moment between the sky and the Earth. Then it slithered down and disappeared from view, like it had been snipped from above.

For about a minute, I heard the zapping sounds of electricity arching, and everybody’s hair bristled. Then something that looked just like the purple orb in the sky, but about five inches in width, shot through the construction chute and hit the Duke on the top of his head. There it was absorbed, causing a ripple down the man’s spine. He convulsed, ripped his robe open, and then arched his pelvis upward, towards the boy’s head, which was already dutifully going down to its task.

Now, it seemed, what gods and men before had not been able to achieve with force for thousands of years, a wealthy businessman in London had done merely by offering the body of a powerful prince as the vessel through which to experience the carnal pleasures of pederasty. Watching it happen before my very eyes led me to a realization about a line from my favorite Welsh poet Robert Graves’ book The White Goddess.

This is what he meant when he said the priests of ancient Rome performed the ‘Rites of Elicio’ to seduce the gods of captured nations into serving the Empire instead.

As the Duke gave in to his proclivities and gasped with pleasure, possessed by debaucherous divinity, Rosenberg chuckled and encouraged him.

“What about the boy’s father?” the Duke gasped in a whisper, almost too overwhelmed with delectation to speak.

“Ignore him,” said Rosenberg. “He’s ignoring you.”

As if to create a barrier to blind the Baron to his father’s abuse of his son, Consivia stepped out in-between the altar and the thrones. She then beckoned the Ravens and men with leather veils, who gathered around the thrones in the space beside her, fulling covering the Duke’s actions from the Baron’s view. She sang another stanza to the incarnation of Jupiter before her.

‘tis so divine to rape your meat

The taste of pain is good to eat

And bliss sublime is all the more

When child of thy loins doth play the whore

The Duke moaned loader, and Rosenberg stepped in quickly, pulling the boy’s head away.

“Easy there,” he said. “Hold your horses. You’ve got a job to do here, don’t forget. This is just a warm-up exercise.”

Then he addressed Consivia. “Invoke the Sun, and have the Barber-Surgeons bring the girl!”

The priestess gestured towards two of the men in leather veils, both with waxing moon symbols. They nodded, then left the hedge to go fetch her. Consivia returned to her place behind the altar and held her arms aloft.

Sol Invictus join your bride

Shining queen who pulls the tide

Fructify the holy womb

Rape the goddess in her tomb

At that moment, quite suddenly, the Moon peeked out through the clouds, along with one of the other stars, which now grew until it was the very same size as the Moon. It was yellow like the Sun, but it did not light up the sky as the Sun does during the day. They stood next to each other, with the purple orb, slightly smaller, sitting beneath them, and the other, smaller stars nearby. Nobody else seemed to notice but me, Chesterfield and Rosenberg. All the others were too entranced by the sex acts, which they no doubt wished to join in on.

“And what the Hell is that?” Chesterfield whispered to me. “The New Jerusalem? Is this the end of the world?”

It was the first thing he’d said to me since he returned from selling out his country and helping Rosenberg cover up the Rothschilds’ child sex slave ring, which they had no doubt used to compromise virtually everyone with any power in the entire kingdom. I knew that his life had been threatened, and I knew I was guilty of things just as bad, but that didn’t mean I’d forgiven him.

“But William Blake said that London was Jerusalem,” Chesterfield noted, seemingly irrelevantly (or so it seemed at the time).

“Shut up!” the Duke snapped. “I was about to cum!”

“Not yet,” said Rosenberg, and he stood up quickly to help block the Duke’s view of the entrance to the hedge. The Duke returned to his preoccupation.

Poor Philippine, who could barely walk now, was brought in on a gurney by the “Barber-Surgeons,” which, by now, I had gathered, was the term for the men with the waxing moon symbols on their veils (the “Butchers” being those with the waning moon on their veils). They dumped her, awake again now and crying, on the pavement between the horse and human blockade protecting the pederast prince on his purple throne. Naked on top of a tall building in the middle of the night, Philippine was shivering severely. She rolled over on her stomach and emitted a high-pitched squeal.

At the sound of her cry, Baron Carrickfergus turned around sharply, separating from the boy as he did so. When he laid eyes upon the girl—I swear—I saw them flash with a golden glow for a brief second, visible through the holes of his sun mask.

Then the yellow orb poured out a yellow-orange stream of fluid. It seemed to fall close by, to the south of us, just where the golden chain had dropped down. It honestly looked like the sun-like object taking a piss. A few moments later, a miniature version of it was immerging from the construction chute, about the size of a basketball.

The mini-sun came and hovered over the Baron’s head, forming an angelic halo behind him. He looked up at it lovingly and smiled. Then it entered him, lighting up his body like a yellow glow stick as it traveled down his spine. Fully possessed now, the Baron grabbed his falling trousers with his left hand, raised his right hand to the sky and laughed excitedly.

“Ah yes! Finally, a female in this castle of faggotry!” He let his pants fall to the ground and then stepped out of them, along with his shoes. Consivia placed a horsewhip in his hand.

then smeared it on himself, as well as the girl's behind. The sun-like object above then began pulsating, its brightness flickering up and down to different levels at the pace of an excited heartbeat.

"Ooooh nooooo," Philippine droned dreadfully. Then she let out another ear-piercing shriek as the Baron penetrated her anus. Above, the sky darkened as the Moon and the golden orb, still pulsating, merged together half-way, forming a vesica pisces shape with a sickly yellow oval in the center. Inside of this oval was that round red splotch that the Moon had acquired, now tinted to appear orange.

Just then, the Duke used his shoe to kick Rosenberg, still standing in front of him, lightly in the back of the leg. Rosenberg turned around and looked at him.

"What?"

"I can't hold out much longer," said the Duke. "I'm ready to blow."

The Baron had fallen backwards a step on the horse mount, probably drunk from ambrosial blood-wine and, of course, archontic possession. He caught himself on the second step, and didn't fall all the way down. But he had to reinsert himself into his victim. Then he climaxed suddenly with a shout.

However, half-way through shooting his load, he pulled out, then went back in quickly to deliver the rest of it.

"Whoops, wrong hole there," he said, and laughed, slapping her behind.

Then he glanced over to his left and scanned the crowd, looking for the Duke.

"Daddy, she's all yours!" he hollered.

Just in time, Rosenberg pulled Little Saint George away from his task and into the shadows in the corner of the hedge behind us. Then I saw him hand the boy off to Miles. Meanwhile, Consivia grabbed the Duke and shoved him over to the brazen horse, forcing the crowd to part.

There was no time for more lubrication. The Duke put his penis in the young lady’s now-widened anus just in time to deliver the seed. But as his thrusts subsided, his relief turned to shock. A hand grabbed him from behind on the left shoulder and pulled him part-way out of what he was stuck in. Another hand brought the blade of a ceremonial harpe down swiftly on the man’s genitals, severing them in one clean blow.

It was the Baron. Rosenberg had handed him the weapon, then pulled the Duke backwards so he could make the cut.

The Duke screamed and fell backwards, blood pouring out of his crotch, which he covered as he rolled over in pain, hollering horribly.

“Auughh! Auughh!”

Then Baron put the harpe on the altar and picked up his horsewhip again, which he had temporarily placed there. Consivia stepped forth and shoved the cut penis and balls, which were still sticking out of Philippine’s rectum, all the way in.

The girl shrieked again, then sobbed some more.

“That will give your baby some extra nutrition tonight,” said the priestess, as she smiled psychotically in her clown make-up.

The Baron stood over the Duke, horsewhip in hand, as his victim continued to wail. He landed a blow on the man’s face, causing him to try to roll further away. Then he started shouting at the Duke, and pointing at Saint George, who was still cowering in the corner of the hedge, hugging Miles’ leg and burying his face.

“So you use my son to get your dick hard, because you can’t get it up for a girl anymore? Because you’re a faggot!”

He whipped him again.

“Because you want to mess up his head the same way you and Grandpa messed me up? Then you come and fuck my wife too!”

Another blow. The Duke, barely able to speak, managed to choke out an objection to the Baron’s delusional remark, brought on, no doubt, by the possession.

“That is not your wife!” he said. “That is a whore and a Jewess. Your wife is back at the Palace waiting for you.” The Baron hit him again.

“Do not talk about my wife like that!” he shouted.

“She’s not a Jewess,” Rosenberg said, intervening. He took away the horsewhip, which the Baron reluctantly allowed, and stared down at the Duke.

“You both may think she looks like a horse, but you have only your own genes to blame, not the Rothschilds.”

“What do you mean?” both the Duke and the Baron asked in unison.

“Crispin was the youngest son of the Princess,” said Rosenberg. “Your wife, the one you let your mother kill, Duke of Rothesay. Just as Oenomaus, the son of Ares, disposed of his daughter’s suitors with a faulty chariot wheel that sent twelve of them to their deaths.”

“That’s just a conspiracy theory,” said the Baron. “And she wasn’t pregnant with that Arab’s baby.”

“No, but she was pregnant with your father’s baby,” Rosenberg replied.

“They had recently engaged in an intimate encounter, despite their divorce. Isn’t that right, Duke of Rothesay.”

“How do you know this?” the Duke gasped, losing blood rapidly.

“Because the Barber-Surgeons were hired to cut up the body on your mother’s orders. And to deliver the heart to you, on your orders. But they were already working for me as well, and when they told me about what they would be doing with the Princess, I took the liberty of having the womb excised for myself.

Then I brought it to fruition with the power of my alchemy.”

The Baron’s head hung low as he took it all in.

“He was a fine boy, really. Intelligent and beautiful to behold. I let the Martinas adopt him, thinking that he would be well cared-for. But they just wanted to use his existence as leverage against the crown. They neglected his moral instruction. The influence of being raised by bankers turned him into a greedy, weak pantywaist, fit only for fucking. I thank you for helping me take him out of the picture. I don’t think I could have done it otherwise. I loved him like a son, in my own way.”

“Is it true?” the Baron asked his father, tears streaming out from under his sun mask. He had picked up the harpe again and stood holding it above his head.

The Duke took his own mask off and managed to get on his knees, crawling to the Baron’s feet, where he put his face.

“Is it true that you killed my mother,” the Baron continued, “and that Crispin was my brother?”

The Duke looked up, pleading in his eyes, which now appeared human again.

“I didn’t know he was your brother. And killing your mother was Regina’s idea. There was nothing I could do to stop it. But I loved her. That’s why I kept the heart. I’m sorry, son.”

The Baron looked up at the sky, and so did I. The sun-like object was separated from the Moon again, and no longer pulsating. The purple orb was drooping down below them, while two other stars hovered nearby. What's more, now there were two dark red circles in the center of the Moon, side by side, one darker and larger than the other, both bigger than the one we had seen before.

As we watched, the purple orb dropped out of the southern sky, straight down, as though into the river, causing all, even me, to gasp, even though I was kind of expecting it.

A sharp clanging sound brought my eyes back down to the scene before me. The Baron had dropped his harpe and turned away from his father, exhaling a sigh of exhaustion and grief.

"I forgive you," he said, and walked out of the hedge.

The Duke's face hit the pavement. He was dead.

Rosenberg rolled the body over with his left shoe and then used his face to wipe off some horse dung that was stuck to the bottom of his right shoe. Having now pulled his face away from Miles' leg, poor Little Saint George screamed as he finally recognized the man who had been wearing the Lion mask.

"Grandpa!"

Miles held him tight to prevent him from running over to his grandfather's emasculated and disgraced body. A pair of Ravens walked up briskly and covered him with the purple standard. Then two Butchers carried the body away on a pram like the others. A Lion, whom I thought to be Leopold, came forward with an antique box that I recognized: the Mete coffer. He picked up the diamond from the black throne, wrapped it in white linen, and placed it inside of the box. Then he followed the Ravens out of the hedge.

Seized with ferocity upon hearing St. George’s pitiful wailing, Rosenberg marched over to grab the boy by the arm. Miles actually tried to hold on to him for a moment before ultimately letting go. It was the first sign of resistance to either of his bosses that I had seen from him so far.

Rosenberg jerked George over to the side of the Brazen Horse. Philippine, bleeding profusely from her now-gaping rectum, was conscious still, but seemed to be near death. I was sure that the repeated anal rapes had already damaged her internal organs, and I knew that she would not last long without medical attention. But her suffering thus far was nothing like what she was about to endure.

Rosenberg told the boy to bow down before him. The child looked up, confused, like he didn’t understand the words. Tears were still pouring down his puffy red face as his protruding lower lip quivered.

“Kneel!” Rosenberg shouted at him. Saint George looked at Miles helplessly. Rosenberg looked at him too.

“Make him obey!” he yelled.

Miles reluctantly took out his gun and motioned for the boy to get down on his knees. I had thought that Rosenberg just wanted oral sex, which he did. But first, he had another demand.

“Do you promise to serve me as your master for the rest of your days, no matter what fate shall befall you?” he asked.

“OK,” the boy said between sobs. Of course, he didn’t know what was happening or what had just been said. But he knew how to do what he was asked to do next.

As this august personage and child of perfect innocence began his second round of forced fellatio in a twenty-minute period, two Nymphi and two Lions circumambulated both Rosenberg and Consivia, who stood behind the altar and aligned with Rosenberg on his left. They now locked eyes with each other while the Nymphi sprayed them with holy water and the Lions used their censers to fumigate them. The violin began playing again, but just for a few bars. Rosenberg took his Phrygian cap off and Consivia, about three inches taller than him, reached out to put her hand on his head. Thus began another invocation: Chronos, Saturnus, Sotomo, Satanas, Cutter of the crooked phallus!

Stercutus, Sator, Satre, Dispater,

Killer of the Cosmocrator!

Piercer of the Deathly Womb!

Raider of the Sacred Tomb!

Plow the fields and work the Wheels,

Crash the Pillars, seal the steal!

Consivia reached out to Rosenberg with her right hand and he bent over to grasp it. The hand hung there between them for a minute as the invocation continued.

Come back to thy bride Jerusalem,

The bloodsucking Lam, the Ericapaiam

Come back and join your true lover again Come back and join with your mother again Join with your daughter and join with your wife Let us pierce the sky with the tip of your knife!

Suddenly a laser-like indigo ray of light came down from the sky with no obvious source, dropping down close-by to the south of us, just like the emissions from the light orbs. Then a black sphere came out from the same place in the sky and travelled down the beam to the bottom, beyond my field of view. About two minutes later, that black sphere, now shrunken to the size of a soccer ball, flew out of the construction chute and onto the top of Rosenberg's head, which was exposed and ready to receive it.

At first, the only sign that the spirit had taken hold of Rosenberg was that he became more violent now with Little Saint George. He began choking him with his penis and grunting obscenities over the child's gagging, muffled screams. The jangle of chains caused me to look away from this abhorrent abomination.

Four Ravens walked in with three metal polls, some sandbags, and a pair of iron chains. They set them up swiftly in front of the altar, so that one beam was held up cross-ways by the other two, which had bases at the bottom and were about nine feet high. The bases were supported by the sand bags. The chains were hung from the cross-beam, each with a shackle at the end.

Consivia stepped forward from the altar, taking off her cork hat, and a shoulder-length braid of powdery gray hair emerged, falling down the back of her neck. A Raven then brought her a bowl of meat and a cup of the blood-wine, which she consumed quickly without visible reaction. She closed her eyes briefly and inhaled sharply.

When she opened her eyes again, a moment later, they were glowing with a piercing silvery light. Her new eyes scanned the crowd intimidatingly. She put her hands in the air, with her shepherd's crook held high in her left hand, and called out forcefully with a commanding voice, quieting all who were present in an instant.

Silence! Be still! I command you to listen!

For I am the Hen and the Egg in the Chicken!

It is me! Thy Lady of Perpetual Sprouting!

Sophia Subactrix, denying and doubting

Opiconsivia! Madonna Lactans!

Omnipotent Mete, with the world in my hands!

Spica Virginis and Magna Mater

Co-murderess of the Cosmocrator!

The line where she identified herself as "Opiconsivia" caused me to see the priestess in a new light, for it finally dawned on me where I had seen the Latin title Consivia before. It was from none other than my published translation of Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum, where Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall wrote that he found a "genuflecting idol," on the back of which were engraved words in Arabic letters that, transliterated and translated, spelled out:

She is exalted, Mete, Consivia. I and our race were seven.

My translator, I now recalled, had put in brackets that consivia meant "she who plants." It occurred to me that it was an appropriate name for Reverend Springhole, whose persona was clearly meant to invoke the role of the wife of Chronos/Saturn "the Sower." But it confused me.

If Mete was Metis, I mused , as Hammer-Purgstall had suggested, that means she was the wife of Zeus, not Chronos. That was Rhea, the one the Romans called 'Ops.' But they say that the mother of Zeus plotted against her husband to save her son, just as Gaia had done to save Chronos from Ouranos. Metis schemed with Zeus to poison his father, before she married him and got eaten by him. And some say that Chronos actually married his mother—that Gaia and Rhea were the same.

A chill went through me as all of these errant pieces snapped into place to form a picture in my mind.

I wonder if Metis and Rhea could be the same too. I wonder if it's the same goddess in every story, always playing the same roles with her husband and her children in each generation. The Greeks compounded Rhea with Cybele, making Cybele the mother of Zeus. But Cybele was also the mother of Attis, and look how she treated him…

I was abruptly snapped out of this contemplation as Reverend Consivia Springhole stopped humming and began stomping her right foot to an angry beat, which the drummer boy accompanied in perfect synch.

I am the stone of the Wisdom of Mete

I baptize my own with the blood from my teat I bring down the stars from the darkness of Heaven And cut off the heads of the One and the Seven

The Nine are within me as well as the Eight For I am the Mother of Love and of Hate

With Stercutus my Lord I shall consummate Destroy all but death and then regenerate A sweeping gust of wind came in from the southeast, blowing the robes around. Rosenberg pushed George away from him—thank God—and the boy ran off to a safer space near the hedge. Then came a dramatic drumroll from the drummer boy, off in the shadows behind me. I was unprepared for what came next.

The Ravens untied and pulled off her garments. This revealed the predictably boney body of an elderly Caucasian woman, with wrinkled, blanched skin covered in liver spots. But there were two unique features.

For one thing, the breasts looked like a couple of halved grapefruits sagging down at the bottom of previously-overstretched skin sacks. They were not real, and they had been implanted decades ago.

For another thing, the pubic region was completely covered with something like a free-standing athletic support cup, but with less bulge. This was removed, revealing that there was no vagina, but rather a white plastic stoma keeping a small hole open about a finger’s width and sticking out about a quarter of an inch.

This too was removed, so that now just the hole was showing.

That explains how Rosenberg could be partnered with a female even though he hates females, I realized. Because this is not a naturally-born female.

The Ravens picked up Consivia and put the shackles on her legs. They set her dangling upside-down from the crossbeam. I could see that the bowl was ancient, and it was covered in grotesque reliefs of semi-human figures contorting in mass congress.

As these things were being assembled, Consivia looked on with the most obscene harlequinesque grin on her face, and her eyes continued to shine praeternaturally as she seethed with enjoyment. This could be heard quite clearly when the music abruptly stopped. All was silent but her breathing, and the wind, now gentle but steady.

Rosenberg straightened up, put his hat back on, dipped his hand in a can of Lyle’s Golden Syrup that was offered to him by a Raven, and slavered it on his whetted, palpitating member. Then he used the first three fingers on his left hand to scoop up another dollop of lube, which he held in the Mano Pantea gesture of blessing towards the priestess, like a sacred offering.

Another Raven brought the three-step horse mount over and placed it behind her. Rosenberg ascended with a hop, putting his pelvis up within reach of Consivia’s backside. He wrapped each of his arms around one of her legs, and two Ravens raised her up so that her torso, neck and head were now horizontal.

As Rosenberg inserted his syrup-laden finger into her urethra hole, she inhaled sharply, then exhaled with a lilting, blissful sigh. Then he held the first three fingers on his right side out to his left, and a Raven took the cue, giving him more Lyle’s syrup. Rosenberg used it to lubricate Consivia’s ancient anus, stretched out and grotesquely protruding due to decades of abuse. This caused her to sigh again. These sighs were the only hint of Consivia’s sexuality that we had so far seen. Throughout the orgies until that point, she had been the only chaste participant.

But now, possessed by what appeared to be the true consort of Saturn, she gave herself to the host of that spirit with gusto. Rosenberg’s entrance into her rear caused the most peculiar ululation to come from Consivia’s throat. As they copulated, he continued to stretch out her urethra hole, until he was able to insert two fingers, thrusting them in and out vigorously, to her intense enjoyment. In-between moans, they both chanted lines from William Blake’s Jerusalem, clipped and assembled out of context:

The Stars in their courses fought, the Sun, Moon, Heaven, Earth Contending for Albion and for Jerusalem his Emanation A brooder of an evil day, and a sun rising in blood A sun of blood-red wrath surrounding Heaven on all sides around, Glorious, incomprehensible by Mortal Man, & each chariot was Sexual Twofold

The sound of them both droning these lines in absolute perfect unison while joined in flesh so bizarrely, looking and sounding like a single monstrous being, was quite chilling. Then suddenly Rosenberg rammed his rod further in, with more violence, growling like a ferocious bear.

“Ah! Oh! Paternoster! Paternoster! Oh! Ah!” Consivia screamed.

Just like the others before him, and as I suspected he would, Rosenberg pulled out from her before ejaculation, and shoved himself into the back of his adopted daughter, who barely reacted to the entrance this time. She was still breathing though, I noted. I also saw that, above us, the Moon had been half-eclipsed by darkness. As the semen poured in, and his pelvis quaked, he uttered a moaning, gasping mantra in Latin, with his eyes closed, and his hands clenching the back of the brazen horse.

Dixit ei Spiritus Sanctus superveniet in te Dixit ei Spiritus Sanctus superveniet in te Concipere in ano est

Concipere in ano est

Concipere in ano est

Consivia now joined in as well, now hanging straight upside-down from the chains again. As she chanted with her pupils rolled up into her eyelids, Lyle’s Golden Syrup dribbled from her buttocks down onto the ground.

Dixit ei Spiritus Sanctus superveniet in te Dixit ei Spiritus Sanctus superveniet in te Concipere in ano est

Concipere in ano est

The first two lines I now, with subsequent research, know to mean “The spirit of God shall come upon you,” a quote from the archangel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary found in Luke 1:35. This had been joined with a Latin phrase meaning

“conceive in the anus.”

I glanced up briefly at the Moon and noted that it was full again, unobstructed from view, and that the larger red spot in the center was actively growing bigger before my eyes. Just as the last drop of Consivia’s semen was squirted from the turkey baster, a Nymphus tooted six annunciatory notes on his trumpet, and the clopping of horse hooves could be heard. I looked and saw the Lord High Admiral leading in one of the horses through the entrance to the hedge.

Then I looked back at Philippine. A Raven was daubing her with yet another sticky substance onto her back end at both openings.

For a moment I thought it might be the “flying ointment” that I had ordered, prompted by my unseen informant, which was supposed to be made from Wetzel’s fat. But then I saw the stallion rear up and break away from his master. The Lord High Admiral let go of the reigns, then started clapping his hands with excitement as he watched what happened next.

Horse hormones, I thought to myself. Oh God.

I looked away. Philippine shrieked repeatedly, for a few seconds. Then she didn’t make any more sounds. I looked down at my side and my eyes met Chesterfield’s. He looked ten years older than he had when I met him, and in those eyes I saw that a part of his soul had died that night. Then his eyes dropped down, his mouth parted, and a single tear rolled down his cheek. He put his deformed hand on top of mine and squeezed it.

That horse was led away, and three more were brought forth in succession, each with a trumpet blast. I kept my eyes in the other direction. I only saw the horses arriving and departing. When the last horse left the hedge, the Nymphus blew his trumpet once more, and then we heard the bells of St. Paul’s Cathedral chiming twelve times. As the chimes rang out, Consivia softly sang a song made from a set of lines I recognized from Fulcanelli’s alchemical treatise The Mystery of the Cathedrals.

At midnight a Virgin mother

Brings forth this shining star

At this miraculous moment

We call God our brother

I looked up at the sky. The clouds around us were dissipating rapidly. Now it could be seen that there was only one small light still hovering next to the Moon, which had gone mostly dark, and was no longer white at all. There were now three red spots in the center, one bigger than the others, and they actually seemed to be glowing. It was as if this light—not a reflection of light from the Sun—was spreading faintly from there to the outer edges of the lunar disc. The rest of the Moon was cast in a gradient fading from old mauve to brownish-red, and then to black.

I know they call a lunar eclipse a ‘blood moon’ because it turns the Moon red, I thought. But there isn’t supposed to be an eclipse tonight, it’s just the night before the full moon. And there aren't supposed to be red lights glowing from inside of it.

I also noticed another thing: the appearance of the craters on its face seemed to be upside-down from the way I remembered them being.

"Where's that thing that looks like a sun?" Chesterfield asked.

As he said that, we both saw it moving northeast across the sky. The whole congregation began running out of the hedge, trying to follow it. Chesterfield jumped to his feet and ran behind them, pushing my wheelchair along the way.

When got out of the hedges, we turned, like the others, towards the northeast and looked across the terrace to the yellow orb in the sky, which had come to a halt. There was the Lord High Admiral, hitching the last of the four horses up to his black chariot. The other three had already been hitched. They looked quite satisfied. Their undersides were covered with blood. I noticed that the chariot had been outfitted with a sharp scythe sticking out of each side.

Baron Carrickfergus was standing there solemnly before the horses with his sun mask in his hand beside him, and his head dropped down. Little Saint George was inside the chariot car on the right side, leaning against the side and staring at the air in front of him, traumatized into catatonia. Suddenly out of the hedge we had used for the ritual came a procession, led by the Lions with their torches and censers.

Next came the Ravens, the first of them carrying the silver casket from the mithraeum, swinging on a chain. This was the vessel that had been used in the Easter Sunday film to hold the hallucinogenic ointment that lubricated the Bosse of Billingsgate prior to the rape. Undoubtedly, it now held the flying ointment made from Wetzel's fat.

The Ravens were then followed by the Nymphi, the Butchers, the Barber-Surgeons, and finally Rosenberg. They all marched solemnly to the chariot and then gathered behind it. Chesterfield walked closer, slowly, pushing me along, so that we could get a clearer view.

The lead Raven with the casket anointed the chariot wheels, the back of the car, and each hoof of the horses with the foul salve. Meanwhile, Rosenberg walked up to Baron Carrickfergus and whispered something to him. The man raised his head and seemed to take whatever he heard into consideration.

From the hedge, Consivia had emerged, with her vestments on once again, and looking no worse for the wear. She spryly strode up and stood next to her partner the Pater.

The Baron took a long, mournful look at his son, who didn't look back. Then he put his sun mask back on, and bent down on one knee in front of Rosenberg, like one about to be knighted. However, this wasn't good enough. Rosenberg wanted a much greater sign of submission.

"Not quite!" he shouted to the man on the ground in front of him.

"Genuflect to me in toto, Heliodromus!"

The violinist played eight long, droning sonorous notes. Consivia raised her shepherd's crook and chanted:

Et procidens adoravit eum.

Et procidens adoravit eum.

(That is, "And they worshiped him.")

“Give me the FULL obeisance!” Rosenberg ordered.

Slowly, the Baron got down on both knees and then prostrated himself completely. His head was on the ground, and his rear end was in the air. Then Consivia turned to the congregation with her arms spread out wide before her, and sang.

Omne genu flectatur

caelestium, terrestrium et infernorum

(That is, “Every knee shall bend, in Heaven, on Earth, and in Hell.”)

Everyone else got down on their knees also, genuflecting in the same fashion. Seeing this, even Chesterfield did it too. I was hoping I would get out of this requirement for being in a wheelchair with broken legs. It didn’t matter.

Rosenberg didn’t even look our way. He was also droning in Latin, his hands stretched out to the sky in a grabbing gesture, savoring the moment.

Two Butchers brought out Philippine’s bruised and besmirched body. She was motionless. I did not see if she was breathing because she was now covered in the folds of a black robe. They lowered it to the ground and arranged it in the same genuflecting position as the others—not unlike the position she took inside of the Brazen Horse as she was raped repeatedly.

Somnium quasi solem et lunam et stellas adorare me Sed non est somnium somnium

(That is, “I dreamt that the Sun and the Moon and the stars bowed down to me. But it was not a dream.”)

In unison, all of the Nymphi began to hum ominously. The drummer boy gave a drum roll. A Lion—Leopold, I think—walked out holding a staff before him.

It was one I had seen before—the one with the mummified human penis on the end of it: the Bosse of Billingsgate.

Two Ravens came and lifted up the back of the Baron’s robe, then pulled down his trousers. Another greased both the Baron’s backside and the Bosse quite liberally with Lyle’s Syrup. Rosenberg took the Bosse from Leopold and aimed it at his target with relish.

As the shaft was inserted violently, repeatedly, Baron Carrickfergus pushed his mask up over his head and tore at his hair. He grunted in pain, but he didn’t scream or cry. He kept that dignity. Yet when Rosenberg finally stepped back, satisfied with the humiliation, the Baron raised his head up a bit, displaying a grimace with his open mouth formed into an O-shape, a tunnel of darkness leading to an empty void. It was a look of total shock at the outrage against his majesty.

I recognized the look on his face. For a moment I couldn’t place it. Then I remembered the golden flag behind the thrones in the hedge. The countenance of the inverted Sun depicted there had borne the exact same expression. Behind him, I noticed the sun-like object had dipped lower in the sky, as if it too were lowering itself in submission to the incarnation of Saturn. A bit to the south of that, the Moon had dipped lower as well.

Then I heard a retching sound, and a ghastly smell, a horrid mix of feces and vomit, pervaded the air. I looked down and saw that Baron Carrickfergus was emptying the contents of his stomach—and, judging from the odor, his intestines as well—onto the ground in front of him.

Fecal vomiting? I thought to myself. Caused by rupture of the intestines, and/or plugging of the anus at the time of an attempted bowel movement? I wonder if sodomy was the 'poison' that Zeus administered to Chronos as his cupbearer.

"You may rise," said Rosenberg.

"All rise!" said Consivia.

Everybody in the congregation stood up again. After a few seconds, Baron Carrickfergus regained his composure, replaced his mask, and stood up also. As he did so, the sun-like object behind him rose up in the sky again to its previous position before the Baron had prostrated himself. When two Ravens picked up Philippine and tied her with ropes onto the back of one of the horses, the Moon moved closer to the sun-like object, and somewhat behind it.

Baron Carrickfergus didn't bother to fasten up his pants. He just grabbed his belt and let his disheveled robe fall down over him haphazardly as he waddled to the car of the chariot. When he had climbed in, Rosenberg had the nerve to approach him for a handshake.

"Thank you for living up to your part of the bargain," he said.

The Baron shook his hand, letting go of his pants, which fell to his feet.

Consivia handed him the horsewhip again, this time for actually whipping horses.

Then he took the reigns. Little Saint George grabbed on to him, frightened, as the horses took off trotting.

I knew what the 'bargain' was. He had taken the rape from the Bosse of Billingsgate so that his son wouldn't have to endure it. That's what he had been threatened with, so it wasn't a bargain at all, just like all of Rosenberg's "deals."

The Baron drove the horses in a circuit around the perimeter of the terrace three times, each time whipping them once to get them to speed up. As they went around, Rosenberg and Consivia chanted the Sator Square repeatedly in unison:

SATOR!

AREPO!

TENET!

OPERA!

ROTAS!

SATOR!

AREPO!

TENET!

OPERA!

ROTAS!

SATOR!

AREPO!

TENET!

OPERA!

As he approached the southeast side on the third circuit, he drove closer to the wall. Everyone got out of the way, except the Lord High Admiral, who just stood there, right where they are headed, senile and oblivious, rocking back and forth on a cane. The Baron deliberately drove the horses right at him.

When they got within a few feet of him, the Baron lifted the reigns up a bit.

But the horses did not slow down. Instead they began—I swear—to lift up off the ground. The “flying ointment” was doing its magic. It was the same substance—made from human fat—that witches once used to make their broomsticks fly to the mountaintops for secret nighttime sabbats with the Devil. Now, right before our very eyes, right there on that cursed high-rise rooftop terrace crowning the empire of a dynasty of financial sorcerers, the ointment caused four horses, a man, a boy, and a chariot to fly up into the sky with no other means of suspension or propulsion.

As they began their lift-off, the horses knocked down and trampled the Lord High Admiral under their feet. He tried to look up from the ground, just in time for his head to be chopped off by one of the scythes, sending it scuttling across the pavement. Then the horses and the chariot soared up over the rooftop railing, like Santa and his reindeer, over St. Swithin’s Lane. Most remarkably, the sun-like object along the sky as well, mimicking the trajectory of the chariot.

From there, the carriage took a swift right turn over King William Street. It was headed south, it seemed, in the direction of the Thames. The yellow orb followed in its own way up above. Meanwhile, Consivia and Rosenberg chanted more lines from William Blake's Jerusalem: The Sun shall be a Scythed Chariot of Britain The Moon a ship in the British Ocean

Then something even more dramatic happened, as we all scuttled around the terrace trying to follow their movements. Little Saint George tried to grab the reigns away from his father angrily, and pushed him. The Baron fell out the side of the chariot, but his pants, still around his ankles, got caught up in something on the outside of the chariot. He hung there upside-down for a few seconds, flailing, while his son tried unsuccessfully to control the horses. As this was occurring, the glowing orb above behaved sympathetically in tandem, jumping about in an erratic, herky-jerky manner.

The chariot took a sharp left, heading northwest, over the Walbrook Building, towards Rosenberg Plaza, the sun-like object and the Moon mirroring this above. Then, as the horses, the chariot, and its occupants suddenly lost their aerial volatility. Everybody ran to the south side of the roof to watch the horror unfold.

It was just like when Wile E. Coyote runs off a cliff, and doesn't fall until he looks down. The chariot plummeted, crashing through the sunroof at the main building of Rosenberg Plaza. The air was filled with the sound of the glass cracking and the final screams of the boy, man and horses.

I knew that, due to the way the building was designed, nothing would stop their fall until they hit the "Vortex" over the lobby. I assumed that was where they probably landed. So too did the architects of the ritual, Consivia and Rosenberg, for they must have planned it all ahead of time somehow. As the chariot crashed down, they sang out in unison another line from Jerusalem: Albion the Vortex of the Dead!

I looked up. The Moon was there, at the very top of the arch of the sky, still transformed in appearance. The sun-like object was no longer visible.

There was a moment of silence. Actually about three minutes, probably.

Everyone was shocked and amazed at what they had just seen. Nobody knew what to say, or if they were allowed to speak. Finally, Rosenberg spoke up. He turned around to face the congregation, and announced that we would all be heading back to Rosenberg Plaza through the tunnels immediately.

“I will select a core group of helpers to assist me in inspecting the damage and cleaning up the bodies at the main building. Most of you can take the tunnels over to the Coffin House. There are rooms with soft beds waiting for you there.

Tomorrow is Shabbat, a day of rest. My servants, both human and electronic, will make sure you receive all you need to relax and recuperate. The rites will resume at dawn on Sunday.”

There was an audible, collective sigh of relief that passed through the crowd in a wave.

I guess even the most evil people in the world get tired after a six-hour orgy of rape, murder and fantastic supernatural events. We were all beaten up (me more than anyone still living), and even though I knew my death could not be far away, I welcomed the thought that I might be able to sleep until then at least.

But it was not to be. Rosenberg walked straight up to me and Chesterfield as the others piled into the elevators.

“You two will have to come with us to the main building. I need you, Ms.

Auger, to assist me once more tonight. Then I’ll arrange for someone to work on fixing up your legs. Agent Chesterfield, please push the wheelchair and accompany us.”

Rosenberg turned around and began talking to one of the Ravens. I looked at Chesterfield, who was wincing at the thought that our torture was to continue onward tonight. He pushed my chair towards the elevator, and I closed my eyes, hoping I could make myself sleep on the ride over. But I couldn’t. The morphine was wearing off again.

Chapter 23: Prison Coffin

…The womb, breeds, whereas the Eye of Horus does not; or, if it does so, breeds, according to the Turkish tradition, a Messiah.

— Aleister Crowley, The Book of Lies The sight that awaited us as Castle Rosenberg was as amazing as it was disturbing. The boy, the girl, the chariot and the four horses had plunged down into the Vortex between the first and second floor. However, they had only broken through the glass on top, and hadn’t fallen through the bottom. The rest of the feature remained intact, full of its mysterious fluids which, whatever they were, stank to high heaven now that the top of the container had been broken.

The sight of the dead child and horses floating in the vat of sewage soup was heart-wrenching to me and Chesterfield. But it was the stench of the Vortex that brought tears to the eyes of all who were present.

We, the select group of twelve (including me, Chesterfield, Rosenberg, Miles and Leopold, among others) walked up the ramp, all the way to the top, so that we could get a good look at the rest of the damage. Right away, from the second floor, we could see Baron Carrickfergus hanging from the ceiling, suspended horizontally with his front pointed down. As we got closer, I could see that he’d gotten hung up by his own clothing on the rafters of the ceiling beneath the broken sunroof.

His top half was hanging by his robe, due to the way in which the fabric right between his shoulder blades had gotten torn and hooked to one of the rafters. His arms, stuck in the sleeves, jutted out sideways from his body. His bottom half was hanging by his trousers, which were still around his ankles. He was nude from his ankles to his armpits, since he hadn’t been wearing underpants.

As I stared at the body of the man hung from the ceiling, I noticed that, when looked at from directly down below, it formed a perfect lower-case “t” shape. His sun mask had been wrenched around to the back of his head. His eyes were wide-open, unblinking, almost plastic-looking. Bruises and cuts could be seen all over his exposed flesh. Behind him, through the round broken sunroof, that strange-looking Moon was framed perfectly.

One of the Ravens, who apparently worked for Rosenberg’s company, took off his mask and robe, revealing a light blue business suit. Prompted by his example, everyone else began doing the same. He then went into one of the few closed offices on the upper floor. A few moments later, he emerged with a drone mounted with a camera and some other equipment, which he flew up to the ceiling to inspect the Baron’s body. It featured a small medical robot on-board, which was able to scan him for vital signs. Shortly after the inspection, the guy flying the drone announced that the Baron was not entirely dead.

It’s hard to say which, of all the bizarre things I observed during this adventure, was the most odd and bewildering. But at that moment, the strangeness of how the body was arranged, and how it had gotten there, was overshadowed by what Rosenberg ordered his Barber-Surgeons to do next. The drone was brought down, and then the Barber-Surgeons—now without their robes and veils—began outfitting the robot medic with tools and medicines. They supplied it with a variety of tubes and vials of fluid mounted into on-board injector guns. Leopold was in charge of this, and instructed them on what to do.

The drone was flown once again to where Baron Carrickfergus was hanging.

The injector guns shot their contents into his barely-breathing body. Then a tube was inserted into one of the arms—gently, without causing the fabric that the body was hanging from to rip any further. Then the tube was slowly unraveled from the wheeled dispenser that it was mounted on, as blood began to flow through it. It was strung up over one of the rafters, and then brought down to the top floor, where it was inserted into a foot-tall, bulb-shaped glass bottle without spilling a drop.

This process was repeated again. This time, a tube was inserted into the urethra. A much smaller amount of fluid—yellow urine—was collected from this tap into another bottle. We watched it all unfold, mesmerized, from a set of couches that formed a "meeting area" on the top floor.

Chesterfield fell asleep on one of the couches next to me. I was starting to doze off in my wheelchair, despite the increased pain in my legs, when Rosenberg and Leopold approached me. Chesterfield didn't stir.

"Let this man take you to a room at the Coffin House where he can give you a bit of medical attention," said Rosenberg. "He will ask you some questions when this is done. Be as truthful with him as you have been with me. The stakes are just as high."

He called him 'this man,' I thought to myself. So he still hasn't figured out that I already know Leopold. And Leopold knows this now, but has chosen not to point it out.

I thought about what had happened since the Butcher meeting at Oriental Club was interrupted by the police. Leopold had disappeared from custody while in a highly unusual private interrogation by Director Pindar himself. Chesterfield, Paris and I had all assumed that Leopold had kidnapped the Director, then later murdered him at Temple Bar in Paternoster Square.

After all, we already knew he was a "Butcher," a kidnapper, and a known liar running an organized criminal enterprise, supposedly. We already knew he was involved with a secret society that committed bloody sacrifices in secret tunnels underneath London. Yet we didn't know anything about Rosenberg then, and therefore his potential connection to the events had not been taken into consideration.

For those few minutes after we heard that Leopold and Pindar were missing, we all thought that Pindar was corrupt, and had helped him escape somehow. But once we knew about Pindar's death, it seemed more likely that he had been kidnapped and murdered by Leopold as part of his escape from police custody. When we learned about Rosenberg, we all began to suspect that he might be involved as well.

When Leopold showed himself during the ritual at the mithraeum, I had proof that they were working together, and that Miles was working for Rosenberg too. Whatever he told them to do, they did. Everyone seemed to treat Rosenberg that way, even the most powerful men in the kingdom, whom I had seen murdered tonight. Baron Carrickfergus being apparently vegetative and legally dead (although there may be exceptions in British law for a man in his position).

So what does it mean, then, I thought, that Leopold hasn't told him that I was the reason he got arrested in the first place, and the reason he was being interrogated by Director Pindar?

It means there's hope, that's what, I thought. It means it's possible that Leopold isn't entirely on Rosenberg's side after all. Maybe he's just cooperating under duress, like so many of Rosenberg's other 'partners' in crime seem to be doing.

I recalled that the Butchers at Oriental Club seemed outraged somehow by Rosenberg, although I didn't know it was him they were speaking of at the time.

They said that he was trying to do something catastrophic and dangerous out of personal greed and ambition, to which they objected: "collapsing the Pillars of Heaven." Chicken Little? Yes. But after all I had seen tonight, , and the things I'd heard both Rosenberg and Consivia say, I couldn't afford not to take the accusation seriously.

Then I heard, for the first time in a while, the voice of my psychic informant counseling me in my head.

Go with it, the voice said. Let him help you.

As Leopold wheeled me down the spiral ramp and over to Coffin House through one of the sky bridges between the two buildings, I drifted off to sleep.

The next thing I knew, I was waking up from a deep sleep in a hospital bed, inside of an empty office that had been set up as a makeshift operating room.

There was bright sunlight coming through a large window across the room from me and to my right. I was stretched out on a hospital bed, and the pain in my legs had taken on a new form. I looked down and discovered why. Both of my feet and ankles had been amputated.

I screamed when I took the sheet away. The realization of what had been done to me filled me with such grief that I cried for twenty minutes. Then the pain in my legs prompted me to punch a red button positioned on a box sitting on a nightstand next to my bed. As I did so, I began to vaguely recall being told by Leopold what that button was for, before I went to sleep there. We had talked for a few minutes, I remembered. I couldn't educe what about yet.

But I did remember him giving me an anesthetic injection. He told me to push the red button as soon as I woke up. I asked him what he was doing this for.

As I fell rapidly into deep oblivion, I recalled, he told me that my legs "[needed] to go." He suggested that if I somehow survived this ordeal, I should try to stick around the UK for a while so I could get prosthetics and physical therapy through the National Health Service.

Promptly, Leopold showed up with another shot of morphine, a cup of coffee, and a jellyroll. Actually, two coffees and jellyrolls. One set was for him. He sat on a chair against the wall next to me and we both ate in silence. I didn't care anymore about what kind of gross things might be hidden in the food at this cursed place. I went into waves of sobbing every few minutes. He made no attempt to comfort or distract me, but merely looked away uncomfortably.

Finally, he spoke.

"I have some good news for you. Miles and I discovered a friend of yours sneaking around in the mithraeum as I was gathering up my equipment. We were able to smuggle him over here without alerting Rosenberg. Sure, everything he does is being caught on camera, but unless his security robots alert Rosenberg to suspicious activity, most likely nobody will review the footage. If the robots had issued any alerts, I think I would have found out by now."

“Who is this friend of mine?” I said. “The only people I know here in town are you and Chesterfield, and Miles, and now Rosenberg’s sick gang. And clearly only Chesterfield is my friend.”

Leopold looked hurt. “Hey, I know we’ve done things you don’t approve of.

And you think you’re in a position to judge us morally. But you don’t understand why we have done these things. And surely you know that I have risked my life repeatedly to try to help you…. To try to save us all from what may come of this experiment in psychopathy.”

As he spoke, some of the previous night’s conversation came back to me.

Yes, now I remember, I thought silently. He is on my side. Or so he says.

He had told me the secret truth that he and others in the Worshipful Society of Butchers had just discovered, with help from me: that Rosenberg’s Mithras cult had been operating behind the seats of power within the kingdom for years. This was because of his wealth, along with his seemingly magical ability to manipulate stock, bond, currency, and precious metal markets. It had something to do with the Niptron Terminal, (which, Leopold admitted, he himself didn’t fully understand and therefore couldn’t explain.) Rosenberg controlled vast numbers of media companies that repeated his propaganda. Through his contacts in the police, intelligence, and security sectors, he had acquired blackmail material on just about everybody.

More than that, as we had seen demonstrated in the mithraeum with Marcia the night before, Rosenberg did not observe the “honor among thieves” decorum as expected. The whole idea behind the surreptitious videotaping of child rape and murder parties/rituals was mutually-assured destruction. Everyone knew that the others present were guilty of the same atrocities. Therefore, nobody ever dared carry out any of the unspoken threats that kept each individual operator in the oligarchy from trying to dominate the others.

But Rosenberg didn’t hesitate, giving him leverage over the Rothschilds, the royal family, and many others. Because of his influence on them, he had de facto control of populations the world over.

“Then he began searching for a higher realm to rule over,” Leopold had said.

Upon remembering that part, my memory became blurry again.

“So where is the ‘friend’ of mine that you found?” I asked.

“He’s with his partner, Chesterfield,” he answered. “They’re in a room across the hall. I’ll bring them in soon, when I feel it’s least risky to do so.”

Agent Paris? I thought. I wonder how he got inside.

There was a knock on the door. It was Miles, and he was, for once, not brandishing a gun. He also had a softer look on his face than I’d seen before.

Were they really just acting the part of Rosenberg’s loyal henchmen last night? I thought to myself. Is it possible that they not only stood by but actively participated in everything that happened—Leopold helping him with the butchery and the medical aspects, Miles standing guard this whole time, preventing us from leaving—with the ultimate intention of finding a way to stop him? It was all very confusing and frightening.

Then there was the fact that they had taken my feet from me, a harsh truth that I confronted once again when Leopold and Miles picked me up from the bed to wheel me over to the window while they switched out my bedpan.

I guess the privilege of having my decency spared by the Butchers Society has now been forfeited, I thought, remembering how they had been kind enough to have me bathed by a female at the Oriental Club. I wonder if they're going to give my urine to Rosenberg to do alchemy with.

The window was tinted on the other side, which let the perfect amount of light in while filtering the glare. I noted that my room seemed to be very high up, probably on one of the upper floors of the ten-story building, and that we were on the southeastern corner, at the intersection of Cannon Street and Walbrook. I sat there, watching the giant orange sun rising behind the southeastern edge of the Walbrook Building across the street, and thought about my current status as a cripple.

They intentionally broke my legs, I reminded myself. And Leopold himself made the cuts last night, supposedly for my own good. But why should I believe him?

I didn't want to look at either Leopold or Miles. I could not forgive Leopold for suckering me into this situation with his lies, nor for consorting with this network of rape-and-murder clubs in the first place. This was secondary to the fact that everything about his public persona was a lie.

I don't care what side you're on now, I thought. You got yourself into this mess, but you got me involved through fraud.

I was glad when they both took their leave of the room. But that left me alone, with nothing but my traumatic memories and the realization that I would never walk on my own two feet again. So I was also glad again when Miles returned a few minutes later, this time with Paris and Chesterfield. Then Miles ducked out to give us some privacy, saying he'd be back in twenty minutes.

Paris and Chesterfield were both wearing very expensive-looking black suits, with the collars open and no ties. These were undoubtedly provided by the house. Neither of them could afford such clothes. They both looked like they had bathed, a condition I envied. But thinking about that made me aware of the fact that Leopold had at least washed the bull blood from my hair, face, and neck, for which I was grateful.

It seemed they both had been told about the loss of my feet. They didn't look surprised, really, but horrified when they actually laid eyes on me.

Chesterfield tried not to show it, but Paris stared for a while before he spoke.

"I'm sorry," he said. "I wish I could have gotten here sooner. I wish I could have stopped them from doing this to you."

"They killed a twelve-year-old girl last night. After raping her for hours. And a little boy, after abusing him. And they raped dozens of other children. And the little boy they killed, I'm pretty sure, was…"

"He knows," Chesterfield said, as if to shush me, as if it was something so horrible, so dangerous to the kingdom that it shouldn't be spoken aloud.

"They wiped out almost the entire line of succession," I said. "And they did it to each other. Both the Baron Carrickfergus and the Duke of Rothesay. They both hurt so many children, including their own little boy."

"He knows," Chesterfield repeated, sounding angry.

"Yes, I know, said Agent Paris, staring blankly out the window at the sun.

"I know what they are capable of, that family. They compromised the kingdom, which is now totally in the hands of a complete psychopath, thanks to them."

"And do the British people know what's happened yet—to the Duke and the Baron?" I asked.

"Not last time I checked. I don't know what's going on anymore. That Thomas Weir guy took our phones. Said it was for our own good, to keep us from getting caught. He claims he wants to help us, says he's running some kind of undercover op on Rosenberg. But he can’t tell me who he’s really working for. Yet it seems to me that he and this ‘Miles’ guy are the ones keeping us from leaving.”

“How did you get in here in the first place?” I asked.

He sat down on my bed, and continued to stare, now at the wall. He explained what had happened slowly, as if lost in his own thoughts.

“My meeting with Miss Equitone and Scotland Yard was pro forma and utterly meaningless,” he said. “Afterwards, I spent some time researching in-house files about the history of this site: Bucklersbury, the mithraeum, etc. I looked at more permit applications for Rosenberg Plaza and realized that he’s constructed a well that leads down to the old Walbrook River underground.”

“That well connects to the Walbrook?” I said in surprise. “I thought the Walbrook was dry?”

“I thought so too,” said Paris. “I’ve seen for myself that it certainly isn’t.”

Then he spaced out for a moment, lost in memories.

I thought about the well in the corner of the mithraeum, out from which the orbs containing the souls of Venus, Mars, and the Moon had appeared. Then I thought about how, while outside on the rooftop of New Court, we had seen Jupiter, Saturn and the sun-like object appear to eject certain “essences” down below, in an area to the south of us, quite possibly right where the River Thames was. These ejections took the form of a golden chain, a blue ray, and a yellow liquid. Moments after each ejection was made, a ball of light resembling the orb that made the secretion would come out of the construction chute hanging below the Sky Box. This was connected to the Rothschilds’ secret royal pissing conduit, and to the Walbrook, which was itself connected to the Thames.

Did the souls of the first three planetary Archons travel upstream from the Thames, through the Walbrook, and into the well in the mithraeum? I wondered.

Did the others travel up to the rooftop terrace at New Court via the conduit and the construction chute?

Also, I thought to myself, why had he only invoked six? What about Mercury? And what entity did Consivia invoke into herself? Was it Mete? If so, what does that mean, exactly?

My meditation was interrupted when Agent Paris halted his own reverie and continued his story.

“Then I spent the next few hours pouring over files about the old underground rivers here in London. Not computer files, but the physical files in the old vaults of Basement Level 1.”

“I’m surprised that didn’t arouse suspicion,” said Chesterfield. “Nobody ever goes there.”

“It did arouse suspicion,” said Paris. “But anyway, I figured out how the culverts that were built for them intersect with various other subterranean structures. There are so many abandoned subway lines, including all the ones that used to be run by the postal service. If you know what you’re doing, you can actually travel almost anywhere in Greater London without coming up for air and without using public transportation.”

There must be loads of nefarious deeds going on underground here all the time, I thought.

“It’s all illegal, of course, but I’m doing an investigation on Her Majesty’s Service, so I figured I had the right. I thought I would just see how far I could get.

So I started at the entrance to the River Tyburn, which runs right between Thames House and Millbank Tower. There's a tunnel there that can be accessed from a sewer hole in Basement Level 2 of Thames House."

"Wow," said Chesterfield. "You found documents on the secret tunnel entrance at Thames House in the file cabinets?"

"No," said Paris. "Miss Equitone told me about it. She walked in on me ransacking the files. She told me I needed to go to the mithraeum and rescue Chesterfield right away. But she said I would have to go alone, and that I should travel underground to avoid being seen. Then she urged me to hurry up, and practically shoved me in the elevator to go down to the second basement."

"Oh my," said Chesterfield. "There must be nobody in the whole service that she trusts. The whole bloody country, taken over in one night…" He trailed off. Paris continued.

"I found my way from there. Or at least, I found some tunnels underneath the mithraeum. Then Thomas Weir discovered me a couple of hours ago, as he was walking down the hallway with a wheelbarrow full of human body parts. And he brought me here to Chesterfield's room, where I've been hiding out, catching up on recent events at Rosenberg Plaza. Tell me Pamela, have you been to the lavatory yet?"

I became embarrassed.

"No," I said, "I have a bedpan. And I'm not really eager to see myself in the mirror right now."

"Well you should at least look through the little sunroof. There's one in Chesterfield's lavatory. You probably have one too."

Chesterfield was already in the bathroom, checking it out.

"Yup, she's got one," he said. "Come look, Pamela."

“At what?” I asked.

Paris wheeled me in there. Sure enough, there was sunlight coming through a nine-inch glass-covered aperture in the ceiling. After being positioned directly beneath it, I looked up (carefully avoiding the mirror), and saw what looked like the Sun at its zenith—the exact same place in the sky that the Moon had been in the last time I’d seen it the night before. This made no sense, of course, at least when I first saw it.

“How can the Sun be up there when it’s rising in the east behind the Walbrook building right now?” I asked. “I just saw it through the window!” I continued staring at it in awe, with no ill effects on my eyes.

“Yeah, my watch says 9:10 am,” said Chesterfield, showing me the face of the black Citizen Eco-Drive Perpetual Chronometer strapped to his wrist.

“That’s right,” said Leopold, as the door opened suddenly. We all turned around to look at him, quite startled. He wheeled in a tray with a tea kettle and three cups with saucers underneath them.

“Sol is stuck at his meridian for the time being,” he continued as he poured out three cups of tea. “He’s also lost most of his luminosity. But Sol Novis is on the horizon.”

“What do you mean?” the three of us asked him simultaneously.

“Because there are two suns presently competing for supremacy. And the final battle won’t play itself out ‘til Easter Sunday,” he answered.

That is the craziest thing I’ve heard yet, I thought, as Paris wheeled me back into the main room. As I was pushed past the window, I noticed that the sun’s disc was no longer in view from there. Paris and Chesterfield both sat down on my hospital bed and looked at Leopold with hostility.

“So you’re telling me it’s going to stay like this until tomorrow?” I said.

“Won’t people be panicking in the streets?”

“I don’t think most of them have noticed it, and most of them won’t,”

Leopold replied. “Something seems to be having a soporific effect on the populace.”

“So how many other people are here?” I asked.

“You mean in this building?” said Leopold.

“Yes,” I said. “In the Coffin House. I know that all the folks from last night’s ritual were told to sleep here last night. Are they still here? Is there anybody else here?”

“This building’s listed as unoccupied right now,” said Chesterfield. “There aren’t supposed to be any tenants yet. But obviously, there are.”

“There were 729 occupants in the beginning,” answered Leopold, “when they contracted Pindar as their lead victimarius, almost a year ago. He was a member of the Butchers, but we didn’t know he was doing this. The victims were all orphans or children taken from troubled homes. He’s killed off two per night, one male and one female, every day since, after having them raped, of course.

But these were all just preliminary sacrifices leading up to the main season of festivities, which started last Tuesday on the equinox. They are now culminating with this weekend’s Supreme Rite, which began last night. And it will continue through Sunday.”

We sat slack-jawed staring at him, horrified anew. He continued, looking out the window with weariness.

“We got wind that someone nearby was doing a working to collapse the Pillars of Heaven. But we didn’t know who, or what exactly was involved. That’s why we brought you in, and you helped us figure out who it was. But Pindar had already betrayed Rosenberg to the Security Services. So Rosenberg had him kidnapped, and me. I pretended to be interested in working with him, and I got the Butchers and Barber-Surgeons to play along. That way we can subtly sabotage him, although we must be quite careful that he doesn’t figure out what’s really going on.

“So now you’ve got a company of ‘Barber-Surgeons’ too?” interjected Paris. “What a bunch of baloney. The Barber-Surgeons were phased out as a livery company in 1745. I don’t get my hair cut by a doctor. This is just as fake as your bullshit Company of Butchers, and your hoax barony.”

“You know so little,” said Leopold between clenched teeth, glaring icily at Paris, “about the way things actually work.”

“Rosenberg he wouldn’t have contracted Pindar to do this kind of stuff unless the Butchers and Barber-Surgeons were already doing it before,” I said. “I saw you kill the bull. I saw Butchers and Barber-Surgeons raping kids last night.

But you say you’re on our side? If you want to stop murdering and raping, just stop. Help us leave here, kill Rosenberg, and set the other captives free, if there are any. Just do the right thing finally!”

He stood there stiffly looking away from everyone for a moment longer.

Then he turned around to face us.

“The blood and tears of so-called ‘innocent children’ are the glue that holds this society together. Any society throughout history, in fact. The goddess wants blood. She wants brains. She wants skin, and fat, and testicles and eyeballs. She wants to fuck and fuck and fuck! She wants to fuck kids and cows and the King of Spain and the Chairman of the Federal Reserve! And if she doesn't get what she wants, everybody pays the price. These are just some of the things you three don't understand about power, and never will."

Leopold's face had turned red and his voice trembled with emotion when he spoke, as though he was really making a profound philosophical statement.

By what criteria, then is he calling Rosenberg a psychopath, if this is his own mentality? I wondered. Leopold continued.

"It takes humility to approach the altars of the gods. You must know that your puny peasant morality is not theirs. You must understand that the food chain of the universe cannot be denied."

"So what's Rosenberg doing wrong, in your estimation?" asked Chesterfield. "He's killing and raping for the gods too."

"Not at all! He is killing and raping the gods themselves, can't you see? He's trying to defeat them! He's trying to bring down the host of heaven, and take the place of the immortals himself. With each planetary archon that was killed last night, he climbed another step up the heavenly staircase. When he gets to the top, two things will happen."

We all looked at him silently, spitefully, waiting to hear the two things.

"Either he will become the new chief of the Archons, ruling us here below with omnipotent power from the realm beyond, or he will snuff us out, and start another universe to rule over. Or he snuffs out everything all at once, accidentally, by causing the layers of existence to crash down on one another catastrophically."

"That's three things," said Chesterfield. "And they all sound ridiculous."

"The layers of heaven have already started to collapse," said Leopold. "It's happened quickly, yet so smoothly that you didn't recognize it for what it was.

You just thought there were large orbs of light in the sky. You didn’t realize that divine, august immortals were being enticed to lower themselves into physicality, then forced to bow down to an arrogant thug, who didn’t even have the decency to spare their lives after they submitted. Now they’re all dead except for the Sun and, at least in part, the Moon. He’s going to torture them both ‘til tomorrow, when the womb opens up, and then he’ll have a new victim to torment.

“What womb?” I said. “What’s going to open up?”

“Oh no, not again,” said Agent Paris to Leopold. “You’re keeping the womb alive? Another posthumous royal birth?” The agent’s eyes looked crazed. Leopold looked at the door.

“I have to go do something for Rosenberg,” he said. “I don’t want to raise any alarm by being tardy. I’ll be back later.”

“You know what I’m talking about, don’t you, Butcher!” said Paris as Leopold put his mangled hand on the doorknob.

“Shh!” said Leopold, finger to his mouth. “Don’t get caught. I’ll see you when it’s time for her next morphine shot.”

The door closed behind him. We tried it. It was locked.

“So what were you talking about, Parvin?” said Chesterfield. “What did you mean by ‘not again’?”

He cleared his throat and then took a deep breath, preparing to tell us another story.

“When my dad was working for SIS, he found out that Mossad was blackmailing the royal family. They knew the truth about the princess who died so tragically, and the baby she was carrying.”

Paris cocked his eyebrow at his partner, curious about what he was referring to. But he didn’t stop his storytelling to ask. He continued.

“Now I don’t want to bring the princess into disrepute. She was a victim of rape. But in the traditions of our ancestors, the victim of a divine rape was always blamed for it. The idea is that they have somehow enticed a sacred spirit into denigrating his holiness for the lusts of the flesh. That’s how Perseus justified his murder of Medusa after she was raped by Poseidon in Athena’s temple. This is what conceived Pegasus. But he didn’t come out of her body until Perseus gave him an opening….”

His voice got softer. He lost his train of thought for a moment as he seemed to mutter to himself. Chesterfield and I both leaned in closer, straining to hear, wondering what he was getting at.

“The Princess was raped by her former husband, who was possessed by a god at the time, my dad said, during a ghastly ritual beneath the Palace.

Afterwards, they cloaked her memory. She had no recollection of it. She thought her boyfriend had gotten her pregnant. Three months later, they offed her. But they harvested her womb.”

The story was so far synching up entirely with what Rosenberg had said to the Duke of Rothesay about his ex-wife, the mother of Baron Carrickfergus. But Paris had added some much-needed detail. He continued.

“Someone else took the womb, he said. Not one of the family. But they had obviously orchestrated the conception rite as well. And this group performed another ceremony, six months later, which Mossad was able to spy on also, according to the reports.”

“Reports that your dad wrote from SIS?” Chesterfield asked.

“Yes,” Paris replied, “about reports he had seen in Mossad’s own internal documents. Anyway, during this ritual, the womb, which had been kept alive somehow in an incubator, was hung from a ceiling by a couple of meat-hooks through the fallopian tubes. It was meant to look like the head of a bull, with the tubes resembling the horns. They put a severed bull’s head on the altar behind it to emphasize this point.”

He took a drink of his now lukewarm cup of tea. Then he went on.

“They had a special aperture in the ceiling for admitting lunar rays. When the Moon reached the right position, and the light hit the uterus, the baby came out, miraculously without defect, and landed on a bed of straw positioned beneath the exit of the womb.”

“I don’t know what happened to the child after that,” Paris concluded, “or even what sex it was. And I don’t know how the magic of the ritual worked. But I believe my father’s story. And I think the baby must have lived on, because Mossad blackmailed them for years after, at the very least.”

“Well, we do know what happened,” said Chesterfield. “The baby was adopted by Marcia Martina and her husband. He was Crispin Martina, Rosenberg’s catamite and errand boy. Now he’s dead.”

“Oh yes,” said Paris. “I know he’s dead. I saw his head sitting on top of a wheelbarrow.”

Suddenly we heard a click. A single click. Coming from the door.

Now what was that? I wondered.

Try the door, came the unexpected reply from my psychic informant, speaking inside of my head once again.

Of course, I thought to myself. I should have asked you sooner.

I repeated the suggestion about the door to my friends.

“OK, said Chesterfield. He walked up and turned the handle. The door opened.

It’s been unlocked! I thought. Remotely!

Chesterfield immediately closed it again, except for a tiny crack, in which he stuck his finger. He turned around and looked at us.

“What should we do?” he asked.

“Stick your head out and see if there’s anyone in the hall,” said Paris. This he did.

“Not at the moment,” Chesterfield replied. “But where do we go from here? All three of us?”

“No, you’re right,” said Paris. “Let me go alone. I’ll see if I can find us a way out.”

And so, after a brief reunion, we let Agent Paris slip away from us. We left the door open slightly, but we stayed inside, terrified of being caught trying to escape. We knew the only reason we had been kept alive was because we each were still perceived as somehow useful to Rosenberg. I knew he needed me for something in regards to the next ritual the following day. And Chesterfield was his means of keeping MI5 under wraps now.

But surely we will both soon outlive our usefulness, I thought.

We didn’t see Paris again that day, or Leopold. After an hour, when Leopold didn’t return, Chesterfield decided to sneak back across the hall to his room, so that nobody would know Leopold had let him in there. Before he left, he helped me back into bed.

A while later, when the drugs were wearing off and the pain in my legs was once again almost beyond what I could bear, a black female servant that I didn’t recognize came to change my bedpan again and to give me another shot, along with a turkey sandwich and a packet of tea biscuits. She put me in the wheelchair again so that I could eat sitting next to the window with the food tray beside me.

The color of the sunlight and the shadows that it cast indicated late afternoon to me.

I sat there staring at the street below for a couple of hours as the sunlight faded away. I didn’t see any people go past, not even in cars. When it was completely gone, and night had fallen, I noticed a reddish tinge to things that were illuminated by the light now coming from the buildings and the street lamps. I looked at the bathroom and noticed red light descending from the ceiling.

I wheeled myself in there, still not letting my gaze fall upon the mirror, and looked up at the little sunroof. Now, in the exact place where “Sol” had been earlier, there now stood the Moon. It was in the same condition it had been in before, but was fuller and larger. This last part seemed appropriate, since it actually was supposed to be the night of the full moon. But of course, the coloring was completely abnormal.

The Moon appeared sickly. It was still dark red, fading to brown and then black at the edges, with three bright red circles shining within it, one larger than the other two. The glowing circles in the middle were brighter and bigger than the night before. The craters on the face were again inverted from the way they normally appear in the northern hemisphere. Also, of course, the Moon does not usually just suddenly appear at the very top of the sky right after nightfall, as it had that night.

Just then, a burly white male servant came in and served me dinner: roast beef with mashed potatoes, gravy, and asparagus. He helped me get to the toilet, waiting outside the door for me to finish, which was much less humiliating than using the bedpan. I desperately wanted to ask him what was going on with everybody else in the building, but I didn’t dare. I just prayed, to which god I knew not, that Chesterfield had made it safely to his room, and that Paris had found a way out of the building.

Maybe he’s bringing help now, I thought, trying to cheer myself up.

Only God can help the three of you, said the voice of the psychic informant.

Who are you anyway? I said mentally to whoever it was.

Why don't you come and see for yourself? was the reply I received.

I heard the clicking sound on the door again.

Try the door, the voice said.

I wheeled over to it, grabbed the knob, and pulled it open. It was indeed unlocked again. I held my breath, listening for anybody. I heard nothing. So I turned my chair backwards and maneuvered myself through the doorway, not without making a little racket, which worried me immensely. But when I got out into the hallway, it was still dark, empty and silent, just a long corridor full of locked doors. Then the lights came on above me.

The digital ceiling, I thought. You sensed me. Fuck you.

Don't worry about that, said the voice. It's the security robots you need to watch out for. And only if they think you're suspicious. Rosenberg's asleep. The rest of the group is so compartmentalized nobody knows if you're supposed to be out of your room or not. Keep your own eyes open for danger. But let me guide you. I have so much to show you.

I had practiced divination many times before, mostly on the Ouija board. I had never had such a clearly-spoken entity dictate to me in my head like this until it started spontaneously the previous night. I had spoken to gods, demons, servitors, and disembodied human spirits on the Ouija board. The gods and demons all had very unique, poetic, and eloquent ways of speaking. But the people all talked like people.

This voice had tried to come off as god-like or demonic in the very beginning, when it was dictating how the rituals should go. But now its choice of words sounded more human. Yet I felt sure it was the same voice.

So where should I go now? I asked the spirit.

This is the Day of Rest. Come to the Room of Rest, it said. Mind your Ps and Qs.

Which way? I said in my head.

Get to the Sixth Floor the voice said.

I looked at the door of my room.

729. That was the same room number I'd had at the Regent Palace, I thought. And Leopold had said 729 children had been held captive here at Coffin House, murdered over the course of the last year. It means something. I've read about it recently. I just … can't remember.

I saw an elevator up ahead. I wheeled myself over to it and pushed the down arrow button. But then I heard something down the hallway, around the corner. I ducked back into my room, which I had sensibly not closed the door to completely. I still kept it open a crack so I could get out again, and I waited.

I heard something, a motorized vehicle, moving down the hallway.

A security robot, I thought.

It paused in front of my door, no doubt alerted by the fact that the lights in the hallway were on. But it didn't seem to notice that the door was ajar, because it eventually moved on. I watched its shadow travel down the hallway and around the corner through the slit between the jamb and the slightly-open door. Then I heard the elevator ding.

It may be a digital super-building, I thought to myself. But the elevators are slow as snot.

I quickly wheeled myself out and into the elevator just before the doors closed. It was already on its way down to the second floor. So I hit the 6 button, hoping I could just get off on that floor without running into anybody else.

When the elevator opened, I was at first relieved not to see anybody standing in front of it. I had turned my wheelchair around backwards, and was using the mirrored walls to check what was behind me. Then I pushed myself up and arched backwards to peak down the hallway both ways.

Nobody here, I thought. Phew!

Just then the elevator doors slammed against the sides of my chair. They opened again automatically, but it was a bit of a struggle to get the rest of myself through the opening before they closed again. They almost smashed into the swollen and still-bleeding stubs of my legs, but I managed to pull through before that happened.

Now, said the voice in my head , follow the trail of blood.

What? I thought. But I looked down, and sure enough, there was a trail of dark brown spots on the white carpet, leading from the elevator down the hall, then off to the right at the fork. I followed. As I rolled along, segments of the ceiling switched on to illuminate the path ahead, while the ones behind me shut themselves off.

This brought me to one of the sky bridges that linked the Coffin House with the main building, with walls of translucent glass. Looking out, I noticed that the City appeared to be cast in a strange purple light, and everything looked very queer. I couldn’t tell if this light was actually coming from outside, or was radiating from some source inside that I wasn’t able to perceive, coloring my view of what was outside. Inside the sky bridge, this light caused the white carpet to gleam brightly, while the blood trail now looked dark purple in some places, black in others.

I rolled across the bridge, which was about twenty feet wide, over to the other building. The corridor ended quite strangely. It looked like a single glass door until I got up within five feet of it. Then, for a moment, it took on the appearance of a mirror, causing me to stop quickly to avoid running into it. When I got two feet closer, where the blood trail ended, I could see that it was a transparent glass wall with three different “slots” you could go through, each leading to a different part of the trefoil ramp that ran through the main building.

According to the signage you could go down through the left to get to the “Rrecycling Center,” down through the right to get to the “Rrosenberg Privy Chamber,” or up through the middle to get to the “Executive Rrestroom.”

I looked behind me quickly to make sure nobody was coming. Then I closed my eyes and attempted to clear my mind for a second.

Which way should I go? I asked my unseen informant.

Now follow the light, it said.

I looked through each of the slots. Only one had a path that was illuminated at all: the one in the middle. I could see a path ahead there, lined with two bright yellow-green stripes. Whatever was behind the other two slots was completely dark. I went through the center slot and rolled my wheelchair up the incline.

At first I thought that these glowing yellow-green strips were just artificial lighting to illuminate the path, like the colored strips that light the aisles of movie theaters. Then I realized that these were the tubes that ran throughout the building, which I had seen the day before flowing with a pale yellow substance. It looked like urine yesterday, and I had assumed that these tubes were emptying into the Vortex. Now, for some reason, the fluid inside was fluorescent. The area was bathed in a purplish light that seemed to be coming from above, like what I had seen lighting the City when I was on the sky bridge. But here it was more intense. Other than this light, the place was completely dark.

Blacklight, I thought. That's what's making things glow. But where's it coming from?

Then it came to me. I realized that I was at the top floor of the main building, towards the middle.

That means I'm underneath the big sunroof, I thought to myself. And underneath Baron Carrickfergus.

I looked up. Sure enough, there he was, with the purple light coming in from behind him, through a clear plastic tarp (perfectly clear, like Saran wrap) that had been placed over the broken glass panels. The exact source of the strange light was still unclear from my perspective. It made his pale, white, mostly-nude body gleam brightly, as well as a circle with a dot in the middle—the alchemical symbol for the Sun, or gold—that had been painted over his navel with something that glowed bright red.

The Baron’s middle had drooped down quite a bit. The legs and neck had now been secured to the rafters with black wire. The effect was that his body now formed a circle, curled backwards on itself, just like the headless body of Pindar hanging from the ceiling at Temple Bar. But Baron Carrickfergus still had his head, now almost touching his feet, up above his drooping belly. His head had been positioned so that it faced straight up at the ceiling. The bright red sun symbol on his stomach moved up and down slightly. He was still alive.

Further proof of life came from the erect penis which also hung down beneath him, attached to what seemed to be a sort of penis pump, which itself was attached to a tube, like the ones I had seen inserted directly into his body earlier. It was again connected to a small, thin glass vessel, this time held below by a drone that hovered directly below him. The pump was moving up and down, much like the pistons of a cow-milking machine.

The purpose was presently ascertained when the Baron’s body began to quake. Sperm shot out in globules that just glowed bright green, dripping down and filling about three quarters of the bottle. Then the drone pulled the tube out of the bottle, sealed it with a cap, and retracted the penis pump. It flew down to the top floor with its cargo, right past my head. I couldn’t figure out why the sperm was that color, or why it was glowing so brightly, but it allowed me to follow the drone with my eyes in the darkness.

The drone then traveled to a door on my right and seemed to insert the bottle into the wall, about five feet up from the floor. There was a sucking sound, and the bottle disappeared. Apparently, it was a pneumatic tube system.

I looked at the door next to it, which from what I could tell was painted a dark color. There was a strange plaque on it, about six inches square, appearing hot pink in the UV light, and adorned with characters that glowed neon green.

There was a three-be-three grid displayed on it—a tic-tac-toe board, with two solid circles in the middle square. This, I knew, was the alchemical symbol for zinc.

I noted to myself that zinc is used most often in making fluorescent pigments and plastics.

Inside of each of the other squares on the grid were other sigils. These included two Uranus symbols like the one at the top of the message left with Pindar’s body. There was one in the upper-left corner, and one on the bottom right, both with their arrows pointing towards the bottom right. In the middle square on the right was a sign for Pluto, and in the middle left, a symbol for Saturn. In the upper right and lower left squares, I recognized the alchemical symbol for arsenic, and in the top middle, the alchemical symbol for platinum, which consists of the symbols for the sun and moon squeezed together. In the bottom middle was a representation of the diamond, with eight facets delineated on its face.

I recalled the voice’s cryptic message: Mind your Ps and Qs. I realized that the way the arrows were pointing on the Uranus sigil made them look like the letter Q. The arsenic signs looked somewhat like the letter A. The Pluto symbols resembled the letter P. The Saturn insignia look like an H. Therefore, the characters in the right and left columns spelled a word.

This must be the Qaphqa, I thought. This is the secret private bathroom for Rosenberg’s special employees. And I’ll bet I know what the invisible ink on the door is.

Suddenly, the blacklight disappeared, and so did the characters. I could see almost nothing. But the drone was still shining its headlight as it flew away and descended into the shadowy depths below.

Maybe I’ve been still for too long, I thought. Maybe if I move around the digital ceiling will strike up the blacklight again. Or any light. Though I must admit I prefer the blacklight. It’s easier to hide in.

Then, just as suddenly, and again for no obvious reason, the blacklight returned. I looked up. I was certain now that it was streaming in through the sunroof, where the purple glow was concentrated.

But from what? I thought. Something on top of the building?

I rolled up to the door, pulled my sleeve over my right hand for sanitary reasons, and tried the handle. Unsurprisingly, it didn’t open.

How do I get in? , I asked my invisible friend.

You have to pay a token, said the voice.

Where do I get one of those? I said mentally.

Look inside your pocket, said the voice.

I reached down into the pockets of my hospital gown. Indeed, in the pocket on the right side there was a single coin, about the size of a quarter and made of glowing green glass. impressed with a picture on each side.

Vaseline glass, I thought. Uranium. It glows green in the UV light.

On one side was the Uranus symbol. On the other side was the image of a king with a beard on a throne. A young man was standing in front of him, bent forward, as the king prepared to swallow his head whole into his mouth.

Then I noticed that in-between the two circles in the center square of the plaque on the door was a slot, barely visible to me, which I thought might be big enough for the coin to go through. I inserted it, and heard a clunk, then a click.

The door opened.

It was dark inside, but here too it was illuminated in blacklight. I could tell because body fluids spritzed all over the room gleamed brightly, but of it a yellow-green color, like the tubes lining the ramp. There were also stains that glowed more faintly with a light blue appearance. I figured that the yellow-green stuff was urine, and the light blue substance was probably semen. Much of the latter was concentrated around one particular area of the wall opposite the door, and also on the floor near there. There, about waist-high on the wall, were two Latin words painted with a fluorescent green pigment: CUM DEO.

I pushed my chair through the door and rolled into the blackness towards the glowing words. I heard the door shut behind me. I turned around and tried to open it back up. But I could not. I was trapped.

So you told me how to get into this room, I said mentally to my informant.

Now tell me why. And tell me how to get out.

All will be revealed momentarily, it answered.

I looked up and saw that the room had a roof that was clear glass, faceted in such a way that the blacklight coming through from above gave it the appearance of a purple rose. I felt around for a light switch but couldn’t find one.

All artificial light is automatically controlled by the digital ceiling, I remembered. So the UV light that’s coming through the sunroof is tricking the system into thinking its daylight. I wonder if it’s damaging my eyes.

Just then, I head footsteps approaching. I pushed myself as far back into the farthest corner as I could. I heard the person step up to the door, and then a series of clicks. The door opened. With only blacklight coming from above, I couldn’t make out anything. But luckily the person couldn’t see me either.

I heard the person grunt. It sounded male–a safe bet in a place like this. The door shut behind him. I head him unbuckle and unzip his pants. The buckle clanged as it dropped to the floor. Then I heard the flick of a plastic cigarette lighter, and saw the flame.

As my eyes adjusted in that brief second of additional light, I could make out the person in front of me lighting a cigarette. It was Dennis. His teeth and the whites of his eyes glowed white in the blacklight. Luckily he was staring straight ahead at the wall opposite the door, away from me. He was staring at the words CUM DEO. When the lighter was lit, I could see that they were painted in fluorescent green on a small circular metal door in the wall.

Dennis approached this wall, waddling with his pants around his ankles, slouching backward. He held his short and thin but erect member casually in front of him as he flicked it around. Then he touched something on the wall, and the

CUM DEO door slid open, revealing a round hole cushioned with a soft plastic material resembling the stuff that stress balls are made from. It looked pink in the ultraviolet light. Dennis grunted again, and the wall began to emit a soft hum. He threw his head back and closed his eyes.

As he spent the next 68 seconds or so being satisfied by the automatic glory hole, I got a chance to look around the room more. It wasn't at all what I imagined. I thought it would be like the dream executive washroom, with tuxedoed attendants handing you warm towels.

Instead, it was a small, dark hole with few features. A square plaque inside of the front door with the same color scheme as the uranium coin, featured that same illustration of the king swallowing a man's head, but with more detail in the background.

Beneath it there was a poem:

When the Son entered the Father's house,

The Father took him to his heart,

And swallowed him out of excessive joy,

And that with his own mouth.

The great exertion makes the Father sweat.

I did not recognize this stuff at the time, but I now know that both the poem and the image are from a seventeenth-century alchemical text called The Book of Lambspring by Nicolas Barnaud.

The other items in the room included a small sink, an automatic hand-dryer, a toilet, and a urinal, on the same wall as the CUM DEO flap, near the corner. The urinal was interesting. It was white, but old-fashioned looking, and of course it was covered with bright yellow-green urine stains, especially in the basin. But on one side of it, glowing blue-white in the UVs like dried semen, were written the words "R. Mutt." I recognized this as the name that was written on artist Marcel Duchamp's "readymade" statue called Fountain, which was really nothing but a urinal with this name written on it. It was actually the alias of the socialite aristocrat who had given Duchamp the idea of displaying the urinal as an art piece.

On the wall, above the urinal, painted in the same substance as "R. Mutt," were the words "Fountains of Youth," along with a double-headed arrow.

One pointed to the urinal below, while the other pointed leftward at the hole where Dennis was currently thrusting his hips at the wall, making poses at it, and calling it "bitch." As he ejaculated with flair, the device in the wall made a grinding sound. Then there was the sound of something dropping and clanging against a metal surface.

“A penny saved, a penny earned,” the young man said to himself with a chuckle. He put his hand around his junk and attempted to remove his penis from the wall. But something went wrong.

I’m doing this for you, said the voice in my head.

“What the FUCK is happening,” said Dennis. The alarm in his voice was quite real.

He seemed to be unable to pull out of the glory hole.

“Oh fuck. Oh fuck. What the fuck am I going to do?” he screamed, frantic now. I pushed my wheelchair forward.

“How do I get out of this room?” I asked, prompted by my informant. The young man nearly jumped out of his skin and screeched “whoop!” as I startled him. Lucky for him, he jumped forward, and smacked his head into the wall, instead of jumping backwards and ripping his penis off.

“How did you get in here?” he said. I didn’t reply.

“Can you help me get out of this?” he said, nicer now.

“I don’t know,” I said. “Show me how to get out of this room and I’ll get someone else to help you.”

“OK,” he said. “You’ll need the coin to get out, just like you do to get in.”

He reached down underneath the glory hole, and then underneath another, smaller flap that was there. From this, he extracted a Vaseline glass token identical to the first. He handed it out to me. I wheeled forward to grab it.

“There’s a slot right next to the door, he said. He rested his hands and forehead on the wall in front of him.

“Where should I go to get help?” I asked.

“Go to Rosenberg’s Privy Chamber,” he answered. “There’s a crossroads on your left. The signs will show you which way to go.”

‘A crossroads on your left.’ What strange words to use, I thought.

Get the ‘key to the outer doorways,’ the voice in my head said.

I demanded this of the lad. He seemed shocked that I knew to ask for this.

“I only have the key to Rosenberg’s Chamber,” he said. “Knock first or he’ll kill you. The Outer Doorway key is with him. But there’s no way he’ll let you have it.”

“Where’s the key you DO have,” I demanded.

“In the back of my pants,” he replied.

Great, I thought. And your pants are on the floor, where you can’t get them because your penis is stuck in the wall, and I can’t get them because they cut off my feet.

I had no choice. I positioned the side of my chair parallel to his back, and leaned down as far as I could to grab the keys from the back pocket of his jeans.

The left pocket yielded nothing. At first I couldn’t reach the right pocket. I used the right wheel of my chair to nudge the jeans and push the pocket up a bit. Then I managed to get my fingers in. There I found a set of electronic keys.

“Which one’s Rosenberg’s Privy Chamber?” I asked.

"The one that says '81'," he replied, groaning with discomfort. "That's the room number too. It's not marked otherwise."

With that, I turned my wheel chair around, pumped the coin into the slot next to the door, and barreled down the hallway, letting the door slam shut behind me.

Wheeling down the ramp was much easier than wheeling up, as you can imagine. Within seconds, I was back at the "crossroads" at the end of the sky bridge, which I still don't understand the nature of. As I approached it from the other side this time, it seemed to suck me in and subsume me.

Then suddenly I was presented with the three slots again, leading in three directions, but in a different order compared to what they were before. Now the Privy Chamber option was in the center, and the "Rrecycling Center" was on my right. Once again I headed down the middle.

It felt like I was on an amusement park ride. My wheelchair seemed to move itself through almost empty space. The most visible sights were the ramps spiraling ahead of me and around me, each lined with the glowing tubes. Directly down below, the Vortex glowed brightly with the yellow-green fluid, the identity of which was now undeniable. It occurred to me that it was probably covered with a clear tarp just like the broken sunroof, or else I would have been able to smell the stench of it, like the night before when the top was broken. Philippine, the horses and the broken chariot parts had been removed. The contrast between this and the darker substance floating within it, along with the body of the dead little boy, was amazing.

As my wheelchair winded self-propelled through the twists and turns of the ramp, shooting stars seemed to come out of the darkened dome above me, spreading out over the ceiling, and all over the body of Baron Carrickfergus, glowing like the flecks of urine and jism on the walls of the Qaphqa. I felt my head spinning as I whirled around. I was getting dizzy. And I wasn't pushing the wheels at all.

Where is it taking me? I asked my invisible friend.

To Paradise, it said. But remember: I never promised you a rose garden.

A catchy tune from Joe South. Why do you mention it? Rosenberg…? Rose Mountain…? Rose Cross…?

Just look for the keystone, was the reply, with a hint of exasperation. Then I'll tell you what to do next.

Presently I found myself in front of a door that looked just like the other private office doors I'd seen in that building, what few there were. But it was marked "81." I pulled the key out of my pocket.

Dennis told me to knock first, I thought. Otherwise he'll kill me.

Don't knock, surprise him, came the answer from my psychic informant. Use the ruse that Jupiter used on Saturn according to Orpheus.

What? I thought. I'm running out of time here. I'm not in the mood to solve riddles.

Unmoved by my plea for clarity, the mental voice replied with a poem.

When stretch'd beneath the lofty oaks you view Saturn, with honey by the bees produc'd

Sunk in ebriety, fast bind the God.

I pushed the button on the key marked "81." The door opened. Just then I heard a security bot approaching around the bend from the left. It quickly pushed myself and my chair through the doorway backwards, letting the door shut behind me just as the machine turned the corner.

"Dennis! Is that you?" Rosenberg slurred from behind me.

I was silent.

What do I do? I asked my informant.

“What’s the word, bird?” said Rosenberg. He sounded really drunk.

The Rose Gives Honey to the Bees, said the voice in my head. That’s the password. I repeated this phrase, a well-known Rosicrucian motto, though its meaning remains obscure.

“Oh Pamela!” he said. “Oh how lovely. Won’t you join me for a drink?”

I turned my chair around to face him. But I found that there was a divider made of glass brick behind me, obscuring the rest of the room. I wheeled around it. This brought me in to the main chamber.

The room was quite large, with immense ceilings, and a huge theater projector screen against the wall on my left. In front of this there was a long and exquisite black leather sofa curled into a C-shape around the fat end of an egg-shaped black marble coffee.

Here sat Rosenberg, alone, in a once-white, now red-stained terry cloth bathrobe and nothing else, surrounded by empty and half-empty ceramic amphorae once full of blood-wine. He looked up at me, then seemed startled as he looked at my feet. But he didn’t ask me what had happened, so I presume he remembered hearing (or perhaps ordering) that my feet were to be cut off. He poured himself another drink. He didn’t actually offer me one, which was fine with me. All I wanted in that regard was morphine.

The room—which also contained three more leather couches, several leather seats, many more black marble tables of various shapes, several rows of bookshelves built into two of the walls, a 4.5 foot-tall porcelain wheel painted iridescent purple, and a metal dissection table on wheels—was completely trashed. In addition to more empty amphorae, other debris included used cans of Lyle’s, empty canisters of “poppers,” discarded clothing, including black leather fetish garments, and small empty animal cages.

On the dissection table, which was utterly covered in blood and gore, were the dismembered arms and legs of a small white male child with dark hair, aged about nine years, strapped to the sides. The table had been used to do a vivisection. The hands were still clenched into fists, and the toes splayed outward in pain. The rest of the body—the head and torso—was draped around the top of the porcelain wheel, face down. It seemed to me that he had died quite recently.

He had been dissected while alive, then positioned on the wheel and anally violated, from the looks of it. I could not tell if had been alive for that last part or not, but the tongue was bitten through. Next to this on the floor was a large krater, still full of blood-wine, and from the smell, still fresh. I shuddered and looked away.

Yo u know what I don't see, I said mentally to my informant, are any keystones lying around haphazardly. I waited for a clue, but got only silence.

Rosenberg was paying me no attention. He was staring at the screen in front of him and laughing as he ate something out of a white ceramic bowl. It was popcorn. I looked at the screen.

He was watching an old black & white film, familiar-looking, with a Wagnerian score. At the moment I looked at it, a continental soldier sitting on a chair on the patio of a large house had just put a ten-year-old boy on his lap and begun kissing him on the mouth.

I've seen this before, I thought. In film school.

"It's L'Age d'Or," said Rosenberg, still without looking away from the screen. "Luis Bunuel and Salvador Dali. Have you seen it before?"

"I've tried watching it a few times," I said. "I always fall asleep."

With that he finally turned around to face me. "Neanderthal! Troglodyte!"

he shouted, pointing at me and shaking his head as if to shame me for my lack of art appreciation. I was too high on morphine, and too much in shock from everything else, to care what he thought of me. I smiled and stared straight into his eyes.

"Why don't you tell me what's so great about it?" I said.

"Look," he said. He faced forward again and pointed the remote control at a machine against the wall. The film skipped to a scene of a man with silver hair and a pointy beard stuck to a ceiling next to a chandelier.

"You see that?" said Rosenberg. "That's what happens to the Minister of the Interior in this film. That's a prophecy of what happened to Baron Carrickfergus."

He rewound it a bit to show what led up to that scene. The Minister of the Interior was sitting at a desk making a telephone call to a younger man with a black mustache. They spoke in French, with the English given in subtitles.

"You scoundrel," said the Minister of the Interior. "You are entirely to blame. You compromised me too. Do you realize that not one child survived?

Many women and old men perished too."

"You're bothering me about a few brats?" replied the man on the other end of the line.

A crowd was shown running down the street as they were chased by the flow of hot lava.

"Filthy ruffian, you've dragged me down with you!" said the Minister. His phone was shown destroyed on the floor next to his desk. Then we saw him on the ceiling again. We were back where we started. There was no explanation of how he got up there.

Rosenberg pressed another button on the remote control. It skipped to a title that read "the first prismatic articulation," followed by a scene of scorpions fighting.

"Those are the scorpions that the mithraeum here, and the chambers beneath, are infested with. They are the scorpions that Luna sends to devour the testicles of the bull. The entire film is arranged to resemble the 'prismatic articulations' of the scorpion's body. This refers to the prism that imprisons us."

'The prism that imprisons us.' Did I hear that right? I wondered.

"Then, there's this," he said.

He skipped ahead a bit. Now a crowd of people were gathered around a cornerstone-laying ceremony officiated by a man in a black top hat. Corn, wine and oil were poured on top of a brick, then smoothed out with a trowel.

"You see this?" he asked me.

I nodded, bewildered.

"The foundation of the Holy City. Ab Urbe Condita," said Rosenberg.

Remember what Crowley wrote? 'Baphomet was Father Mithras, the cubical stone which was the corner of the Temple'"

The film displayed archival aerial footage of Rome, accompanied with subtitles that almost seemed like they explained what was going on. But they didn't really. The text said:

In the year 1930, on the premises occupied by the remains of the Majorcans, was placed on the sheer rock the foundation of the city of… Imperial Rome. The world's ancient, pagan mistress became the seat of the secular church for centuries. Some aspects of the Vatican form the firmest pillar of the church.

Rome was founded on April 21st in 753 AD, I thought. This film was made in 1930. What the fuck?

"Now look at this," said Rosenberg.

In the next scene, a man was seen walking out of a café, brushing bits of crumbled masonry off of his coat. Then, a few shots later, another strange title page read:

“Sometimes on Sunday….”

Next, a row of buildings was shown collapsing.

“The diverse and picturesque aspects of the great City!” said the title page that came right after this.

The whole scene reminded me of something.

“Wasn’t there a part in 120 Days of Sodom, I said, “about an aristocrat whose fetish was to make buildings that were set to collapse eventually, trapping women and children in the rubble?”

“That’s the Holy City collapsing,” said Rosenberg, ignoring my inference.

Then a man was shown kicking a violin down the street and stomping it into pieces.

Violence, I thought. Violence against violins. Stupid surrealists.

“Here,” said Rosenberg. “This part’s about me.”

The man who brushed the collapsed building debris off his coat was now shown walking through a park with a flattish stone balanced on top of his head.

He walked past a statue of a man with long hair, also shown with a similar stone on his head.

“Psalm 118,” said Rosenberg. The cornerstone becomes the headstone.”

The line in question, number 22, actually states: The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner.

This statement was also paraphrased by Jesus in Matthew 21: 42-44, where he said that the rejected stone became “the head of the corner,” leaving out the repetition of the word “stone.” Then he followed it up with this: And whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken: but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder.

“That was me, you see,” said Rosenberg. “I was born from a rock at rock-bottom, from the dirt on the ground. And yet it is I who shall climb to the highest heaven tomorrow and sit on the throne of God himself. My head will be the keystone to the Arch of Heaven.”

“Am I? Listen, my dear,” he said, turning around and smiling at me, with a bloodstained Batman Joker grin extending from the corners of his obscene mouth. “Human flesh and body fluids are definitely rich with chemicals that are intoxicating when ingested by other humans, or those who take their form. But that does not mean I am mentally incapacitated. Far from it. I am in a heightened state of awareness right now.”

Keep him talking, I thought.

“Pretty much,” he said, burping. He got up to refill his glass. Then he walked over and made a bizarre swishing motion in the air with his hands as his robe flopped open. It looked effeminate and awkward. I thought he was just twitching compulsively, but then the sliding glass doors to the patio opened on the farthest wall. I realized he was communicating with his digital ceiling. Cold night air came pouring through the open doors. Behind him, the sky was empty and black, but the blacklight was bathing his clothes and face, as well as the buildings behind him.

What on Earth is causing this? I wondered again. It’s definitely something on top and outside of the building.

I wheeled my chair closer so that I could continue to hear his confessional James-Bond-villain-style rambling. He was telling me things I thought I might need to know. I decided to goad him more.

“So you didn’t have a human mother?” I said. “Some god just ejaculated onto a rock and you came out of it like a chicken from an egg?”

“Not quite,” he said. “It was more like a Kinder Surprise Egg. They’re illegal in the USA, but in Europe you can buy these toys for your kids that come in tiny plastic eggs covered with chocolate.”

“I’m familiar,” I said. “There are videos about them on YouTube. You can’t avoid them for some reason.”

“Yes, well, they’re illegal because really dumb kids have deservedly been weeded out of the gene pool by swallowing them whole, which often causes them to choke and die.”

“OK,” I said. “What does that have to do with who your parents are?”

“‘Parents,’ you say?” He snorted a laugh. “That’s for mortals. No. You’ve read The Gospel of Thomas, I’m sure. When you see him who was not born of woman, fall down upon your faces and worship him. And that’s what everybody does. They fall down and worship me.”

He smiled.

I couldn’t take it anymore.

“You motherfucker!” I said. “What’s wrong with you!”

He stood up straight, looked directly at me with rage and stomped right towards me.

“So what if I fuck my mother? At least she produces seed from it—glorious seed full of astral light and transcendental power! At least she has something more than just a vacuous slimy hole that takes without giving! At least I’m not like your friends, the Butchers, those stodgy old aristocrats who cut off their own dicks and feed them to their queen, their Great Mother. The only way they can cling to their decaying carcasses is by sucking period blood out of their mothers’ pussies! Did you know that? So do the sons of the crown that the Butchers have been propping up for one hundred and twenty years! They call themselves princes, but they bow down to something as low and disgusting as a vagina!”

As he spoke, he gritted his teeth and bared them like an angry dog. With his teeth and the whites of his wild eyes gleaming brightly in the blacklight, it looked like he was transforming into a monster. I started to back away from him.

“It is I who shall destroy the works of the female! Your friends at the Society of Butchers sacrifice bulls to the Great Mother because its horns remind them of her womb. But you and I both know that the Great Mother’s womb is a tomb, because it is also a stomach. It is also the cauldron that cooks the meat that the stomach digests. It is a prison where we all suffer as slaves to provide sustenance to overlords whom we cannot see, because we are inside of them.”

He knows that I know about the Society of Butchers, I realized. What else does he know now in regards to that?

His hands were balled into fists at his sides and he stumbled as he continued to close in on me. He was truly enraged, though not at me specifically, I was relieved to confirm. He continued his tirade.

“You see, I will bust out of here. I will bring each floor of this mansion crashing down until I find the Father who has no Mother. Then and only then will I find something worthy to bow down to."

"So who were your mother and father," I asked, wanting to bring it back to the original question. "You said something about a Kinder Surprise Egg?"

"Yes, well the egg contained the makings of a golem," he explained, calming down. "It was prepared by an expert rabbi kabbalist working for the Rothschilds. It was swallowed, forcibly, by the host. Then, after being passed through the intestines, it was fertilized in ano during a paschal rite by 108

Freemen of the City of London, one from each of the livery companies at the time.

Not the 'official' ones, of course. They all have 'clandestine' versions that operate 'night works,' as they call them, where these things happen."

I recalled that fourth to fifth-century Italian grammarian Maurus Servius Honoratus, commenting on Virgil, had said that the Great God Pan, a satyr, was conceived by Penelope when she gave herself to all 108 of her suitors during one night of debauchery in the absence of Ulysses. I had written about it in my Baphomet book. Multiple fertilizations of the same ovum were not uncommon in the mythologies of ancient gods.

"So you have 108 fathers?" I said. "I guess your mom was a real slut."

He already hated women, so I wasn't sure this would rile him at all, but it was worth a try. I wished I could find a way of hurting him. I despised him so much at that moment that it was almost overwhelming. Then it got worse. He smiled that ugly smile again.

"I guess you could say she's a debauched woman. Even back when she was a little teddy boy taking a free titty mag from a stranger at Piccadilly Circus. None of the lads who strutted their asses around the fountain of Counter-Love were innocent in those days."

So that's it, I thought. A sick feeling slid down my throat, like a cold cockroach swallowed accidentally from a can of Coke that's been sitting out since yesterday.

I can't believe I didn't realize it before, I thought. But that makes Rosenberg…. No. It's impossible.

“You're telling me that Consivia is your mother as well as your wife?” I asked.

“Civil partner,” he corrected.

“And Consivia was the Easter Sunday April Fool,” I said. I put my hand over my mouth.

Did I say that out loud?

For a moment, I panicked.

He already knew that I knew about the Society of Butchers, I thought. Now I just gave away that I knew about the child rape movie from the 50s. He probably already knew I knew about that, which is probably why he mentioned it. But did he?

Apparently, so, for it seemed that nothing I had said to him upset him any further. He was smiling like the Batman Joker again.

“Yes, my mother is quite a lady. ‘That which does not kill us makes us stronger.'”

“So where is she now then?” I asked.

“She's in the kitchen,” he said. “Where every Great Mother belongs.

Preparing for Easter.”

“So early?” I said. I wondered how people like Rosenberg and Consivia would celebrate the Lord’s resurrection day.

“Well, she’s got to be at St. Paul’s at the crack of dawn,” he said. “She’s leading Easter Mass.”

Outside of his window, I could see the gleaming dome of St. Paul’s, which started to chime. From the number of rings, I surmised that it was 4 a.m.

“I’m really overdue for a morphine shot,” I said.

“Well then let me take you to your friend Thomas Weir,” said Rosenberg, grabbing my wheelchair and pushing me towards the door. “Or, as you like to call him, Leopold Black. Did you know he was related to the house of De Blacas?”

“What?” I said. “You mean Louis and Pierre?”

He wheeled me through the door and down the ramp through the darkness.

“Yes, Blacas,” he replied. “The family that collected the Templar artifacts that Hammer-Purgstall wrote about. They are among the many of Thomas Weir’s illustrious ancestors. When some of their descendants moved to the Britain, first to Scotland, they renamed themselves ‘Black.’ It was his mother’s maiden name.

That’s why he took it as an alias. Has it ever occurred to you that Louis, Duc de Blacas may have been the inspiration for the Duc de Blangis in 120 Days of Sodom?”

It certainly had not occurred to me. But now I had to think about it.

The Duc was a Jesuit-trained aristocrat, entwined with the crown, essentially running the government in France as a sort of prime minister, and against the Revolution. The Duc was accused by modern historians of faking the Templar artifacts he showed to Hammer-Purgstall, covered with scenes of the sacrifice and rape of animals and boys. They claim he might have done this to make Templars, and thus the Freemasons associated with them, look evil, to discredit the Masonically-inspired Revolution.

Since commencing my research into this topic, I had dismissed this argument. What a lot of work to go to for a roundabout, indirect jab at the enemy with no impact, I had previously thought. But I considered the fact that the Marquis de Sade had been a Revolutionist, and had presented his obscene works as political commentaries.

His debauched villains were always aristocrats like himself, or in the clergy.

Sure, the Marquis was guilty of many of the crimes depicted in his novels. But his point was not merely to glorify rape and murder for the joy of hurting people.

While he did accomplish this indirectly, his point, he claimed, was really to show the audience that this is what the ruling class get up to. Pasolini, in his modernized film version, had the same point.

This is what Pasolini was truly persecuted for, I thought. The same was probably true of the Marquis. That's why he was in the Bastille, instead of being invited to elite parties. Because he exposed them for what they were.

Rosenberg, almost as if he could read my mind (and I'm pretty sure he couldn't) now mentioned the first film adaptation of the Marquis de Sade's novel, which we had just been watching in Rosenberg's Privy Chamber, although I didn't know it at the time. It was L'Age d'Or. I had no idea that 120 Days of Sodom was the basis of the film, because I hadn't read anything about it since college, and because I'd never been able to stay awake through the whole thing. I was astonished. Rosenberg continued to enlighten me.

"Did you know that the Marquis de Sade's manuscript wasn't published until the twentieth century? And do you know who rescued it from the cowans who were holding it hostage? Who preserved it? Who brought it out of hiding to take its place in the history of literature? His family. His descendants. They became the House of Noailles. They were patrons of the arts. They funded Dali, Cocteau, Man Ray, Jean Hugo, and Bunuel. Most importantly, they funded this movie, The Golden Age, the first film version of the Marquis de Sade' story. It came out before the book even did."

"Didn't the Vicomtesse de Noailles let Cocteau get her pregnant?" I said, making conversation with one of the few related odd bits that I knew of the subject.

"Yes, but that was no ordinary pregnancy either," he replied. "And the child was removed from the womb prematurely for his own protection. He grew up with a camouflaged identity, sucking out sperm from the very cock that had spawned him, and he never even realized it. But that's none of your business."

Just then, as we swirled around the ramp to the second floor, the blacklight came back and the ceiling lights faded out. I looked up at the giant sunroof behind Baron Carrickfergus. Now with a better angle, I could see that full red Moon behind him, the three circles now glowing purple and almost consuming its entire visible surface.

Is the Moon actually glowing from inside? I asked my friend in my head.

She's pregnant with new light, came the answer. And she's about to give birth to a new aeon.

Astronomy aside, it did seem as if the Moon had something luminescing inside of it, and not just on its surface.

The ancients called the Sun and Moon the 'lamps of Heaven,' I thought to myself. Can the Moon really have a star in its womb? Can its skin act as a lampshade? If so, that would explain where the UV rays are coming from, but also why they aren't blinding us. Because it's being filtered, just like a blacklight at a nightclub.

You're not far off, my invisible informant told me.

As we walked, the ramp curved down towards the basements. The Vortex was above me now, and I could see was the stiff, well-preserved body of Little Saint George, still floating face down, with his eyes shut and his mouth open into a scream, swishing around the revolting cocktail of shining sludge like a lonely ice cube. The effect of the blacklight shining through it now was at once amazing and horrifying.

As we went further down into what must have been the second underground level, I could see a glowing circle that was now in the center of the semi-triangular Vortex. It had three concentric rings of glowing green fluid—a deeper green than how urine looks in blacklight. It resembled the stuff collected from Baron Carrickfergus by the drone. Two of the rings were spinning clockwise, and the one in the middle was spinning counterclockwise, reminding me of the wheels within wheels featured in Marcel Duchamp's avant-garde film Anemic Cinema.

"What are those bright green rings in the center of the Vortex?" I asked Rosenberg.

"The seed of the Sun," he replied. "He gave him an injection so that his sperm would be stained with a fluorescent tincture. We just placed an annular container of ejaculate from Baron Carrickfergus into the middle of the Vortex.

Now I understood why his fresh semen was glowing in the bottle, even though it doesn't normally fluoresce when wet, and never bright green.

"So what's making them spin?" I inquired.

"Nothing,"' he said proudly. "Semen that is sufficiently rich with healthy sperm in large concentration, such as that produced by my own well-fed and well-sexed employees, naturally forms rings that rotate unpredictably in either clockwise or counterclockwise fashion when placed in suspension in an annular container. These findings were published by the Royal Society in October of 2016 in a report about research on the introduction of fresh ejaculate into a microfluidic chip for the purpose of nanotechnology development."

"Oh," I said. I stared ahead, trying to make sense of what he had just said. A few seconds later, I asked for clarification.

"An 'annular container'? I asked. "Like an anus?"

"Anus just means 'ring,' Pamela," Rosenberg replied.

Yeah, I know, I thought to myself. Like Uranus.

"Like Uranus," he said, "the Ouroboros, whose hogtied body, bent backwards, forms the circuit of the heavens."

Hogtied, I thought. Like Baron Carrickfergus on the ceiling. Like Director Pindar's headless corpse. Uranus is Ouroboros, the discarded, mutilated corpse of Saturn's father, wrapped around the concentrically-stacked aeons of the planetary Archons, in the midst of which Earth is secreted, and within that, her womb, filled with monsters, hiding inside like the baby hides in the pastry filling of a king cake on Mardi Gras.

But if he's bent backwards wrapped around us, that means when we look up at the sky, we're looking at his ass. The same side God chose to show to Moses when the prophet asked to see his Lord. The only side it's safe to look at, according to God himself.

The Gnostics said that Saturn is the highest sphere of the Archons. But Uranus occupies the realm beyond that. Does that make him the highest god, even though he's emasculated, and in most respects, actually dead?

Rosenberg began running as he pushed me around the curving ramp, below the lobby, into the subterranean corridor leading to the basements. The blacklight and glow-in-the-dark circles of the Vortex blurred into the light of the digital ceiling. Then at that moment, everything, even my perception of time and space, seemed to blur together in my mind.

It was as though we had entered a tunnel of lights. Among the shining streaks that surrounded me, some seemed to be caused by luminous colored balls jetting down from the ceiling, all of various hues and sizes, each bringing a certain warmth, and a certain humming sound. Then it seemed like the lights were behind us, both the streaks and the spheres. Yet we were still running, outpacing them.

“The fixed stars are descending to bathe in the blood of the Archons and the blood of the innocents,” said Rosenberg, jerking his thumb back over his shoulder. “It won’t be long before the child frees himself from his gestational prison.”

“Is this the Baptism of Wisdom?” I asked involuntarily, forced by the voice intruding into my mind. Rosenberg threw his head back and cackled.

“Yes, Miss Auger, this is their baptism into ‘genital wisdom,’ as your translator of Hammer-Purgstall’s work rendered it. Zoogogon sophian in Greek or, in Arabic, ma-ta na-sha. The carnal knowledge of good and evil, of generation into flesh. We are bringing down the lights of heaven with the Rites of Elicio. I’ve given them an offer they can’t refuse. Like flies eagerly drowning themselves in honey, they know better, but they can’t stop themselves.”

Rosenberg slowed his pushing and brought the wheelchair to a quick but gradual halt as he continued lecturing me on his evil plot to exploit the salacious and bloodthirsty proclivities of the gods so as to gain power over them.

He already seduced them into human bodies and murdered them, I thought to myself. What else can he possibly do to them? And what does all this really mean? Rosenberg continued.

“These are the unalterable laws of existence in the present order of aeons.

Like a horny dog who smells a bitch in heat tied up to railroad tracks, or a cat who’s sniffed out a delectable puddle of antifreeze pooled up on a neighbor’s driveway, there’s no turning back. The fall has begun. Now tell me, my Virgil, where shall we go next?”

As my dizzied outlook came into focus, I realized then that we were actually floating in black empty space, or so it seemed. I couldn’t tell what we were standing on, if anything.

“Where are we?” I said. “I thought you were taking me to see Leopold.”

“I’ve taken you as far as I care to,” he said. “I brought you here so you could guide me the rest of the way. Now show me how to get there from here.”

Oh boy, I thought. Yet another test. Surely he knows which way to go. He’s just trying to keep me on my toes. But I don’t have toes anymore. I decided to consult with my psychic informant.

What do I do now? I asked mentally.

Find the right door and go through it, came the reply, and then nothing else.

Well, I didn’t see any doors at all. But I had gotten through two sets of crossroads so far by choosing the door in the middle. So I decided to look a bit harder for a door directly in front of me.

I tried to clear my mind. I tried to look with spiritual eyes the same way I had heard the voice of the informant with nonphysical ears. I tried to see with the same eye that had seen the shine on the picture of the bull liver at Oriental Club.

This was the same eye that had seen the red glimmer at the end of the bull’s intestines on the floor of the mithraeum.

As I pictured this last image, the eye that had spied it opened up again, and I now saw before me, off in the distance, a ruby-red diamond, brilliant-cut just like the one from the London Stone. It was giving off a pulsating red light as it rotated in mid-air. I knew that the red light was broadcasting a message to me, although I could not pick it up.

Either I’m not equipped to, I thought*, or I’m not close enough.*

I desired to be closer to that light, to pick up its signal. In that instant, Rosenberg and I began to float towards it. As it grew closer, it stopped rotating.

Now it was situated at the top of an archway of gray stones. The portal within the arch was black, and I could see nothing beyond it. But we were headed straight towards it. Then suddenly we stopped right in front of it.

“Show me your hands please,” said a voice overhead. “Please identify yourself.”

It was a feminized but artificial voice. The message was either coming from a robot, or it was being translated by one. And it was coming through that diamond keystone in front of me above my head. I was picking up its signal. I put my palms out in front of me and looked over my shoulder. Rosenberg had vanished. I was on my own in front of the archway in empty darkness.

What should I say? I asked my informant mentally. Should I give my real name?

Identify yourself by your title, the informant replied.

Cryphius? I asked silently.

‘ And Caducifer,’ the informant answered.

OK then, I thought. I announced myself, speaking directly to the keystone.

“Cryphius and Caducifer am I.”

“Then where is your heralding stick?” the keystone asked.

I looked down at myself. I had nothing with me but a wheelchair, a hospital gown, and the set of keys I had stolen from Dennis. I examined each key carefully.

I didn’t see anything that qualified either one of them, even symbolically, as a “heralding stick.” This term was, of course, a reference, to the “caduceus,” derived from the Greek word kerukeion, meaning “herald’s staff.”

I’ve never really understood how snakes wrapped around a stick represents a messenger, I thought to myself.

I knew that many analysts thought it represented the human spine entwined with nerves, which was reasonable. I thought about putting forth my backbone as a reply. Then once again an answer came forth through my lips without my conscious awareness.

“I did not come here as a herald, but of mine own accord, seeking the light of the keystone,” I said.

Then why did you have me say before that I came bearing a caduceus? I asked my informant.

The caduceus is within, the informant replied.

Within my skin suit. Yeah, I know, I said. I rolled my eyes.

Now I will tell you this: the rape and murder I had witnessed, the maiming and dismemberment of my body, along with the deprivation of sleep, food, and water that I had endured much of the time on a diet of mostly morphine—all these things had taken quite a toll on my mind and physical well-being. But the constant dangling of cryptic clues by virtually all of the villains involved in this adventure, including my mysterious psychic intruder acting as mystagogue—this was what threatened to drive me over the edge into insanity. I’d rather the layers of the universe crash down into the Abyss than to have to solve, learn about, or even think about another esoteric riddle, which at that moment I could have done without for the rest of my life. Or if given the option of ending that life there rather than doing so ever again, I would have gladly chosen the former. So I said:

“You know, I think I left my heralding stick inside last time I was in there heralding”

…hoping that a deadly laser beam would shoot out of the talking crystal and sever me in twain right there where I sat half-naked with my bloody stumps sticking out of my wheelchair. Whether this deadly guardian of the portal should cut me with her fiery sword of vengeance sideways or down the middle, it mattered not to me.

But instead, by the sweet grace of Providence, that didn’t happen. Rather, an eye, fierce with wisdom, opened up on the keystone, and a white light shot out of its pupil. It then split off into seven rainbow-colored rays, two of which (on either end) I caught with the pupils of the eyes that had just opened up in the palms of each of my hands, still displayed next to my head with the thumbs pointed at my ears in the pose of surrender, as required.

The key turned. I don’t know what it was, or where the lock was. But the door must have opened. Because the next thing I knew, I was inside. But so too was Rosenberg. Posing as the caregiver of me, the sad cripple, he had wormed his way in right behind me.

Or shall I say beneath me? For I looked down and there was his face, directly below in the chamber that I was being lowered into on a plank attached to two ropes. Who was holding the ropes? I couldn’t tell. I craned my neck up to look at them just in time to see an iron plate placed over the opening I had come through. The ropes had just been secured to something above.

But I was not yet on the floor of the chamber. Instead I was floating above yet another hole, leading down into endless darkness. Noxious, suphurous fumes arose from the hole directly into my nostrils, heightening my opiate-induced nausea.

However, that hole was in the floor of a room. I now regarded this room with curiosity. I looked for Rosenberg, but he scurried off into a corner behind me. Scurried? Yes, that’s what it looked like, peripherally: like a scary tarantula scurrying off. But I thought that it was probably just the shadow of a spider cast on the wall by the light of one of the several torches that were set into holders along the periphery near the ceiling. I saw no other people, but all four of the corners of the chamber were dark, so I couldn't be sure. I decided to call for Rosenberg.

"Mr. Rosenberg? Are you here?"

"No Pamela," said a voice from behind me. It was a familiar one, yet unlike any other I had heard with my ears before. It was coming from the corner behind me where Rosenberg had scurried.

"No, Rosenberg isssss not in h-h-h-here. H-h-h-he's afraid to come in here. I am not your jailer. I am your friend. And I am also in prison. I h-h-h-have been h-h-h-here for countless aeonssssss. Or at least, they are countlessssss to you."

"I saw your face," I said, though I knew I was wrong. "When I first came down. I saw Rosenberg."

"You feel h-h-h-his presencccccce because h-h-h-he's watching. And when you saw my face, it was s s-s-s-so s s-s-s-hocking that your mind immediately pasted over it with the last one you h-h-h-had s-s-s-seen."

The voice was so odd. It was like speaking to someone with a tracheostomy. It was atonal, gritty, and gasping, with the sound of air being sucked through a hole that was being plugged up every few seconds.

"So let me see your real face," I said.

"Are you s-s-s-sure?" the voice gasped ominously.

A wave of renewed fear washed over me. Suddenly I was filled with apprehension.

"Yeah, sure," I said, clearly unsure.

Still, I had agreed. The proverbial foot was in the door.

I heard a rustling sound, like the sound I remember from my childhood of the animals getting up to greet me when I first walked into the barn at the crack of dawn.

My eyes now widened with terror as I saw two feet step out of the shadows towards me, trailing bits of straw in their wake. They moved in a disjointed manner, scraping the stone floor underneath as they went. They were white with circular cuts made around each of the ankles. But I saw that they were both curved on the right, like human left feet normally are, which I found quite unnerving. Furthermore, the one on my right looked like that of an adult male, with black hair on the big toe. The one on my left had the appearance a woman’s foot, but was unusually large—a description that could have applied to the feet I had once possessed, just a day and a half previous.

But then the creature rotated its body a quarter-turn towards me, and another foot emerged on the other side, behind which I detected yet another. All four, jutting out from the sides of this creature’s body, bore the ankle cuts, and I saw that they were all attached to legs that were clearly not their original partners. Yet it was what these legs were attached to that was most unthinkable.

It was no wonder that my mind had pasted over it with a picture of Rosenberg when my abused and bewildered eyes first beheld this visage.

What I was looking at wasn’t exactly a trinacria, like the painting we had seen at Oz Pizza. But of course there were similarities. The head in the center had the pallor, leathery lips and sunken eye socket of one having been preserved after lying dead for a day—not that of a young boy happy to be of service as a table leg.

I say “eye socket” in the singular to refer to the casing around the left eye, which was preserved. The left eye socket was covered with a black eye patch.

Like a pirate, I thought, as I stared down in horror at the monstrosity. Or the pirate mascot, the Jolly Roger.

But it was also reminiscent of the Egyptian symbol of the Eye of Horus, pierced in mythic battle by his brother Seth. A long red line ending in a spiral, with the curvature and proportions of a Fibonacci spiral, but looking something like a shepherd's crook, was trailing out of the corner of the eye, having been carved into the flesh.

As the creature, clearly artificial though organic, shambled the rest of its body out towards me, I saw the fullness of what the head and legs (actually five in total) were attached to.

The main body was topped by a bulbous balloon of flesh stretched out to the point of partial translucency, like a frog that's been inflated by a sadistic little boy with a straw inserted into its rectum. Another living creature could be seen inside, red in appearance when viewed through the veil of pink skin. On top, I saw what at I at first took to be a blowhole. But then when the creature took a step closer, I determined that it wasn't really an opening—not anymore. It was the former entry-point for a feeding tube: a navel.

What I was looking at was a white human torso, small, adolescent, yet female and pregnant, with the belly pointed upward, so that it looked a bit like the abdomen of a blood-swollen tick. But there were two lumps in the belly, one slightly smaller, so that it also resembled a two-humped camel. Attached to this, with barely any neck, was the head of a middle-aged white man with brown hair, pointed forward. On the bottom were the five legs—yes, five actually—each connected to five feet taken from other bodies.

You see, there were two legs on the left, and two on the right. But now I could see that there was another one in the back that acted as a sort of kickstand, allowing the monster to kneel down backwards with its butt pointing downward.

When the creature turned itself around again in the process of walking up to face me, I saw its pudenda and anus from the back, both enlarged and making a schlopping sound as it walked. The anus, of course, was also enlarged, through abuse.

This is Philippine's womb, I thought. And the head must be that of Pindar, skullfucked through the left eye.

Then there was the matter of the feet. I wasn't sure who the others belonged to, but I certainly recognized the ones on the right as mine.

Oh Yes! I thought as my mind finally made the connection. My feet! Maybe if I get out of here alive somehow, I can have them reattached somehow!

"Do you h-h-h-h-have the keyssssstone?" the creature's voice hissed.

"Have it?" I said. "No. I think I saw it in the doorway though."

"Which doorway?" it asked.

"The arch made with twelve stone bricks and a red diamond keystone on top," I answered.

"The Arch Keeeria," the hellish voice responded. "The Outer Doorway.

That'sssss it."

I recognized this term. It was something I hadn't thought of in many years.

But almost fifteen years earlier, I had published a book about a French secret society called the Priory of Sion. "Arch Kyria" was the name of their inner order, which they also called the "Arch of the 13 Rose-Croix." Nobody has ever determined the significance of the term. "Kyria" might be connected to "Kyrie," a Greek word meaning "Lord." But this doesn't seem to elucidate the meaning much.

"Did it s-s-s-s-s-speak to you?" the thing asked.

"Yes," I said. "It asked me some questions. It told me to put my hands up and identify myself."

"Good," it responded. "That means that it's clossssse."

“What do you want with it?” I asked.

“I want to be relieved of my burden,” it said. “I want to get out from under thisssss weight without everything collapssssing on top of me. The keyssssstone’s job is to take my placccce, so that I may assssscend oncccce again to my rightful abode.”

“And where are you now?” I asked. I said “you” because I had decided I didn’t really believe that this creature and I were actually occupying the same physical room at the same time.

“So is that what you want Rosenberg for?” I said. “Are you trying to get him to take your place? Have you been grooming him for that with your psychic manipulations? And me?”

I was pretty sure I was looking at the thing that had been talking to me psychically for the previous two days. Or at least, I felt that the possessing intelligence was the same, and that the head in particular had been used as its vessel or touchpoint this whole time. The addition of the other body parts was clearly more recent.

“We are all playing our role,” the creature said. “Now you do yoursssss, Caducccccifer.”

It turned its hideous backside towards me and schluffed off back into its straw bed in the corner.

“When do you give birth?” I asked.

“Eassssster morning,” came the reply.

“You mean today?” I said. “Now?”

“Almosssst,” it answered. Then I heard the lid of the chamber behind me open. I felt the ropes being tugged on from above, and just as suddenly as I had entered, I found myself on the outside of that room. Or rather, on the outside of some room. I’m still not sure if it was really the same one.

There's a void outside of Existence, which if entered into,

Englobes itself and becomes a womb;

such was Albion's couch.

— William Blake, Jerusalem

So in the blink of an eye, I was back in my wheelchair, at the very bottom of the spiral ramp running through the main building of Rosenberg Plaza, at least one floor underground. Rosenberg was behind me again. The digital ceiling light was on here. We were in front of a room marked with the number "27" and a placard that said "Rrecycling." Beneath this was the typical triquetra recycling symbol, but with a pink happy face emoji in the center. The deliberate resemblance to the trinacria was obvious.

"What's this?" I asked.

"What I call 'the Kitchen.' It's the room where we operate 'the Hellbroth Gradalis.' It's the heart of the Plaza's alembic system, and the place where we make things into other things. Of course, it's connected to the universal system."

He took Dennis' keyset out of my hands and selected a key marked "27," which he then inserted into the door. He opened it, and we descended down a simple, straight cement ramp painted baby blue, into a hallway. It was lit brightly, not by the digital ceiling, but by regular white fluorescent tube lights, like you would find in any normal commercial property. The air was humid and hot. The smell of sulphuric acid reminded me of visiting the hot geysers at Yellowstone Park.

We reached a bend in the ramp and took a right, then another immediately, to go down a second cement ramp. It was open on the left side, except for an iron railing, and you could see a room below. The walls of the room were made of brick and painted white. A series of large metal containers wrapped around three of the room’s four walls (the space against the fourth wall being taken up mostly by the ramp).

Coming from no scientific background, several of these containers looked to me like large water heaters, or the big tanks I’d seen at breweries. They were all connected to each other, and to the walls and ceilings, with pipes. There was either smoke or steam coming out some of them through other pipes, some of which were open, and some of which were connected to the other vessels. I realized that this was the source of the sulphuric acid smell.

As we continued down the ramp, I thought I also recognized the odor of pork being boiled. But then I figured out that everything I was smelling was coming from assorted human body parts and fluids being put through various processes of putrefaction, rendering, and distillation. I became certain of this when I saw, just to the left of where the ramp ended, the door to a large meat freezer. Through the window on the door, one could see the bodies and severed parts of people, mostly children, hanging from the ceiling on meat hooks.

At the bottom of the ramp, on the wall to my right, there was a series of framed pages from medieval illuminated manuscripts. One showed a woman standing over an anvil with a baby laying on it, her anvil raised high, ready to strike. Around the anvil were scattered human body parts. Next to her was a flaming forge made out of brown bricks with some of these body parts sticking halfway out of the fire, and a broom on the mantle for sweeping up ashes. It was obviously a symbolic portrayal of renewal of life through death, being used here as a shorthand depiction of what was literally going on in that very room.

The other framed pages showed: a man hammering out a statue—seemingly—of a naked woman; a real naked woman lying on the ground being eviscerated with a knife by a man while another holds her down, in front of several men that look like priests or potentates of some sort; a small enclosed rose garden, from which a river issued forth, and forked off into two streams; an old bearded man lying on a bed, being castrated with a sickle by a younger bearded man; and, a crowned woman falling onto a sword that pierced her chest, in a manner identical to the way in which Marcia Martina had died.

I recognized the statue-chiseling image as belonging to a bizarre medieval allegory called The Romance of the Rose, which I had never read or looked at much. I had learned about that one image only by reading about the influences for Jean Cocteau’s 1930 film Blood of a Poet, in which an artist makes a statue of a woman that comes to life, just like in the Greek myth of Pygmalion and Galatea. I have since determined that all of the pictures on that wall were from the same book. These were the only things mounted on the walls, except for a few signs listing safety rules and procedures.

It was only when I got past the wall hangings and turned around that I got a good view of all of the stuff in the room. The sizes and shapes of the metal tanks varied, as did the metals that they were constructed from. I am pretty sure that I can identify these metals. The largest one, placed against the wall to the left of the freezer door, was encased in a dull-gray lead. The next-largest, to the left of the previous one, against the wall opposite the ramp, was a tin cylinder almost as tall as the ceiling.

To the left of this was an large, square iron forge encased in red bricks that had been put together to look like a little castle. This then piped smoke into a large copper retort to the left of it, against the next wall, opposite the lead-covered tank. The retort was also connected on the other side, via another pipe that ran diagonally from the corner, to two ball-shaped chambers—one silver and one gold. These were connected by clear glass tubes to the large green glass vessel that dominated the room, soon to be described in detail.

In addition to these items, an emergency eyewash and shower station was situated in the corner between the lead and tin tanks, beneath the pipe that ran along the wall connecting the two. It was a yellow box with a window, slightly larger than a phone booth. Then between the tin and copper vessels, again beneath the connecting pipe on the wall, were three aluminum shelves, which were right in front of my face as I turned off the ramp into the room. These were mounted to the wall from waist-height to shoulder-height. There were dozens of small glass vases and bottles on these shelves, filled with various fluids. Some had pastes or powders within them. Beneath this was the door of a small refrigerator with one shelf. On the bottom, a human hand and forearm was visible. On the shelf were Tupperware-type boxes. One was labeled “Peepee-roni,” and the other, “Sliced Peepee-roni.”

Milling about these appliances were a couple dozen people, performing a number of tasks with scientific equipment mounted on metal rolling trays (among which I identified a centrifuge for spinning test tubes, and two electrolysis machines). I recognized many of the people from either the post-ritual gathering at the Plaza the previous night, or from Rosenberg's speech at the mithraeum opening the day before. At the center of the room was another dissection table, with dismembered human body parts on it and, of all things, a sewing machine.

Seated at this table, on a metal stool with a red leather seat, was none other than Consivia, wearing clean white clerical vestments, similar to what she had worn the night before, but without the cork hat. She was using the sewing machine to do something to the lumps of flesh in front of her. At first I could only see her back and the sewing machine. I couldn't see the body parts clearly.

"What's going on here?" I said.

"Nature at her Forge," said Rosenberg.

"Seems artificial to me," I said.

"Nature is an artificer," he replied. "And now we know her recipe."

Whatever Consivia was doing, she was wrapping it up—literally, in a black cloth—and handing it to a man in a white jacket by the time I got close enough to see the table in front of her. But by then, my focus had turned to object near the wall that was now furthest away from me, which appeared to be the main vessel within the whole system. It was made of clear glass, vase-shaped, with a long neck on top that reached to the ceiling, which sealed it on top, and a big bulbous bowl at the bottom. It was full of clear liquid up to the base of the neck.

On the right and left sides, hookah-like tubes with nozzles on them were hanging down a couple of feet lower than the bottom of the vessel, which was itself about four feet off the ground. I knew that this was the "Gradalis" that Rosenberg had mentioned, a Latin word for a dish that was used to serve multi-coursed meals in medieval times (also called a satura, interestingly). Many etymologists thought that this word might be related to the genesis of the term through similar hoses.

"Grail" (as in "Holy Grail"). The tubes reminded me of ancient Mesopotamian depictions of the Tree of Life, which depict gods collecting nectar from the “tree”

Another interesting aspect of the Gradalis was how it was being held upright. Instead of having a stand to rest on, it was balanced on the shoulders of what appeared to be two hoodwinked men, who were chained to the floor. They each knelt on one bent knee in a half-genuflecting position, with the heavy apparatus perched on their shoulders, kept aloft with their hands.

Though their heads were entirely covered with black cloth sacks equipped with no eyeholes, I recognized the expensive black business suits they were both wearing, without ties, which were visible from the shoulders down. It was Paris and Chesterfield, the latter identifiable as the one with pale skin and a truncated middle finger. They were swaying a bit under the burden, but for the most part it was held remarkably still. The lack of tilt to the apparatus was indicated by a most unusual plumb bob dangling down to the middle of the vessel, inside the fluid, from a golden chain attached to the ceiling at the top of the vessel.

Attached to this chain from its top with a black suction cup, and situated in the center of the vessel, in a strata of yellow liquid, was the diamond-like gem uncovered from the London Stone by a bolt of lightning the night before. But now it had undergone a remarkable transformation. In addition to being greatly magnified in appearance (which I assumed was an optical illusion caused by the shape of the glass and the liquids inside), there were now eyes inside of each of the Within each of the kite-shaped facets on the crown were there were eyes, blazing red with a green glint of intelligence. I could only fully see two from my perspective at first, but I saw the periphery of two others, and I knew there were eight of those beveled facets on the crown, so I (correctly) surmised that this would be the total number of eyes now open on top of the diamond.

One for each of the seven planetary archons, I thought. Plus one extra.

Uranus? Mete?

Whatever spirit or spirits these eyes belonged to, the two in front of me were staring directly into my own eyes. This filled me with panic. I attempted to contact my informant for guidance.

What is this? I asked mentally.

My replacement, came the reply.

“This is where the rivers of Paradise meet,” said Rosenberg, as if I had asked him. “All of the waters of life flow here. It’s where we transform them into a higher state and then make our deposits into the universal bank.”

Just then, Rosenberg reached into his coat pocket and put on a pair of tinted glasses. Then a small octagonal window opened up on the ceiling above us.

It encompassed the Gradalis, and an area of several feet around it. You could now see all the way up to the lobby, and the Vortex above it. But after looking up once, I looked away, because the opening was bringing in what looked like blacklight from the Moon, seemingly stronger—hotter—than before—and I could feel that it was damaging to look at it directly. However, it was impossible to avoid the glare of it, reflecting off the glass vase and refracting through the diamond. I squinted. I could feel a headache coming on. Rosenberg tapped me on the shoulder. When I looked over, I saw that he was offering me a pair of the same type of tinted glasses. I took them and put them on. They stopped the pain right away.

So how is the moonlight coming through so intensely?” I asked Rosenberg.

“Total Internal Reflection,” he responded. “We actually use some of the streams of fluid that we’ve piped in to bend the light directly into here. We’ve not only got light from the sunroof coming in, but also from several other light portals arranged around the building. And in a few minutes, the UV light of the Moon will be replaced by the green rays of Hyperuranion.

Total Internal Reflection, I thought to myself. The basis of modern fiber optics, a way of making light bend to follow a stream of liquid. And the long-treasured secret to the alchemical technique of star-bathing.

“Star-bathing,” which I had written about in the past, was a means of channeling the light of the heavenly bodies into liquids, which alchemists claimed to be a key element necessary to effect certain chemical transformations.

Mysterious illustrations for cryptic alchemy manuals often show the essences of the seven classical planets, including a sun and a moon, being drained into a vessel, which another sun and moon then bathe in. This is what Rosenberg had been referring to when he spoke of the “Bath of the Stars," an alchemical term which, I have theorized in the past, might be related to Baphomet's name, if interpreted to mean "Baptism of Wisdom."

"So this is where you offer the fruits of your sacrifices?" I said. "To your partners on the other side?"

"Yes," he said. "And everything that's happened on the grounds of this plaza for the last 729 days has been part of a pact negotiated long ago. Much of the detail was worked out ahead of time regarding the victims and how their various essences would be processed. But there were elements left for me to figure out with the help of others, and parts left to chance, as per the demands of the party of the second part."

"And what exactly is being negotiated?" I asked.

"Dining club privileges," he said. "Our ethereal partners are always welcome and encouraged to dine upon anything offered here whenever they like.

Fresh essences can be absorbed directly from the body at the time of expulsion.

But we also keep the system here ever-flowing with the sacred fluids which our partners like so much to suck. Specified amounts are piped directly to the upper and lower worlds at regular intervals according to pre-existing agreements."

"You mean piped to the planetary Archons?" I asked.

"They among others," he replied. "And this is really just a demonstration of my ability to pay. I am proving that what I have claimed is true. I have the bodies and souls of every man, woman and child of the human race at my disposal to negotiate with forever according to my will. That's the most powerful capital you can have in the higher worlds."

“You mean you think you own all the people on Earth and you can offer them as either slaves or food to another species living in another dimension?” I asked, wondering if I really understood him.

I wheeled myself closer to the Gradalis, and followed Rosenberg in circling it counterclockwise. I then found that there was a third man helping to hold up the vessel. From the looks of his light brown leather cap toe Oxford shoes, I knew it was Leopold.

“Oh yes,” Rosenberg replied. “I have all the gold I need now, and I hold a controlling interest in the debt of all the world’s governments now, though their populations don’t know it yet. People have already signed themselves away in toto to their governments in every country on Earth. So that makes me their de facto owner, and puts me in a position to use them as collateral, or to use them for whatever I want, really. I have all the power in this world now, and so I am going to use it to gain power in the higher worlds.”

“But what about now?” I said. “Now that the planetary Archons themselves have been sacrificed….”

“I have offered both them and the Earth people to the one most anxious to see them humiliated.” He put his hands behind his back and resumed his strut around the Gradalis.

“There is one further offering to be made, and that’s the baby. He has been nurtured on the blood of the Archons. Now he is to be born under the first light of Hyperuranion on this Easter morning.”

“Which baby?” I asked.

“The child of Philippine, of course,” he said.

I knew that was the answer, but I still didn’t understand how the conception and development of this baby was supposed to work. So I was questioning him to try to get him to reveal that information.

“You mean she was pregnant when you guys raped her?” I said.

“No of course not,” he said. “We raped her to get her pregnant! And to humiliate her as Luna, the goddess bitch of birth and menstruation. But that goes without saying.”

“Then why did you all rape her in the behind?” I said. “And why would there be a baby born today when she died Friday night?”

He laughed victoriously. “Pamela, you know better. You know the Eye of Horus does not obey the same rules of conception and gestation as the typical female womb. Extraordinary results require extraordinary efforts.”

“So this baby is going to be magically born from the rectum of a dead girl today,” I said, “and then you’re going to sacrifice it?”

“Yes,” he replied. “As I am deflowering his rose garden and absorbing his celestial power through the opening of his fundament, I shall cause the expiration of he who has waited since the birth of time to be avenged. I will suck up his god-power through my cock like a straw as it leaves his body.” Rosenberg’s penis became hard as he said this. He massaged it through his pants as he continued.

“This will not only ruin his plans for a return to glory, but will pin him down into a new place of subjugation, while opening a secret door for me into the Supernal Eden of the highest heaven. Then as he’s dying I will use his back as a stepping-stone and climb up through the aperture to take my rightful place above.”

“So what do you want me for?” I asked.

“You’ll see,” he said, coming back around the Gradalis to stand next to me on my left. “You’ll see entirely too much. The sight of so much reality, cast into a new light, will shock you greatly. But I’ll need you to maintain your constitution as you have so far, and tell me what you see when a new hole opens up in the sky and the rays of the sun from beyond are felt. You know what I mean: the light of the Blazing Star, from the portal between the pillars of the Earth and the sky, beyond the Moon and beyond the solar disc. This is the light that the Masons symbolized with their sacred G, just as scientists have named the Gamma ray after it, and used the Greek letter to represent the photon—the ultimate unit of light."

"Don't you want to see it yourself?" I said. I was getting nervous, not wishing to be alone in whatever was about to happen to me.

"No," said Rosenberg. He reached into his pocket again and switched to another pair of tinted glasses with pink lenses. "I have my reasons." He stopped pacing suddenly and stood still facing the Gradalis. Next, he stomped his left foot on the floor, and slid his right foot up against his left heel at a right angle. Then he pulled his red Phrygian cap out of his other pocket and put it on his head.

Most of the men in white coats seemed to leave the room all at once.

Consivia came over, wearing a pair of pink glasses as well. She whispered something to him, then turned around to walk up the ramp to the exit. But then she turned around again, leaned over me from behind, and whispered in my ear also. I could feel her hot breath on my neck, and the odor was atrocious, like a restroom at a gas station.

"You're on your own with him for this one," she said, patting my shoulder and causing involuntary spasms of revulsion. "He'll need you to tell him certain things about what to do and say next, based on what you see and hear."

"Wait," I said, not wanting any such responsibility. "Where are you going?

You're in charge of the rituals here."

"I'll be directing another rite while you are working here," she said. I have to do Easter Mass at St. Paul's."

The lights went out. Two assistants each switched on hand-held white LED lanterns. These now provided the only illumination apart from the lights on some of the room's machines, and the blacklight coming through the Moon, channeled down to the Gradalis.

"What if I don't see anything?" I asked.

"Oh you'll see," Consivia said. "And you WILL look. You won't have a choice."

Just as she walked away I felt someone approach my wheelchair from behind. Then I felt the barrel of a handgun up against my right shoulder, just like I had experienced before. A large male hand grabbed my head from the top and jerked it backwards so that I was looking up at the top of the Gradalis near the ceiling. Another hand from outside my field of vision removed my glasses, causing great pain in my head. Then an eye dropper was used to put a drop of something caustic in the corner of each eye. I squinted and squirmed in my chair as it burned.

"Keep your eyes open," the man said. It was Miles. He was wearing pink glasses just like Rosenberg.

This is like A Clockwork Orange , I thought. But I have already seen so much ultraviolence, and so much ultraviolet light. What's a few Hyperuranian rays?

But I was just trying to give myself courage. Truly, I was afraid. That the sky would literally open up—including all of the layers of the atmosphere that protect us from the deadly radiation of space. Already ultraviolet light was coming through, and now Rosenberg was speaking ominously of deadly Gamma rays.

Do these atmospheric layers somehow correspond to the realms of the planetary archons? I wondered. Is that why the light from beyond was thought by the ancients to be light from beyond Uranus, the lord of the sky?

Then I saw something I hadn't noticed before: a recess in the floor directly beneath the Gradalis. I had to back up my chair a little bit and bend sideways in my seat some to get a glimpse of what it was, and it was still hard to make out the detail. But because of the vision—or whatever it was—that I had been given just before coming to “the Kitchen” in room 27, I now understood what horrors crouched beneath.

It was a hole about three feet deep, plated with a metal that looked like copper, and a bed of straw in the middle. In it sat the creature I had seen before, with Pindar’s head, Philippine’s womb, and my stolen feet, among others. But it seemed like it was in an even in a worse state than it was when it had appeared to me in the vision. Now it was convulsing and sweating profusely, while its one eye was rapidly fluttering uncontrollably. The womb that formed its back was even more swollen than before, and one lump was now greatly larger than the other. When it moved one of its legs, two scorpions, glowing bright green in the blacklight, scuttled out of the straw to the edge of the pit.

The blacklight illuminated the occult sigils that had been drawn all over its head and body, which hadn’t been visible in my previous encounter with/vision of it. A glass rod coming down from the bottom of the Gradalis, terminating just a few inches above the navel on the back of the creature, and was entwined with two clear plastic tubes that were inserted directly into the womb. I figured it was for the baby, presumably an IV drip feeding it the contents of the Gradalis. And of course, it resembled a caduceus.

A crush of people were now filing into the room, all in their ceremonial black robes. But instead of the masks as before, they now only wore sunglasses on their faces, like Rosenberg. When they were all standing still, one of the young boys, no doubt a Nymphus in the previous ceremonies, tooted some annunciatory notes on a trumpet. Then I heard everybody gasp.

At that moment, I saw that the diamond was now levitating above the level of the fluids, and rotating. Its color turned from clear to red, and the faint purple glow of the blacklight changed to a bright pink hue. I noticed planetary symbols being projected in green on the sides of the vessel, and then refracting all over the room. They included the familiar signs of the seven classical planets, plus another—the Monad—a symbol discovered by John Dee, which combined the other seven. He representing this combination as an alchemical operation taking place inside of an egg.

Now the very thing that Dee had written about was taking place right before my over-exposed eyes, as revealed by the pink light from beyond (or whatever color it really was, as scientists insist pink light doesn't really exist, but is rather a stand-in color our brains put in to represent certain invisible rays of the spectrum).

With this brighter light I could now see the scene in the hole below much better. But when I looked again, I wished that I hadn't. For what I saw was the creature's anus—Philippine's anus—opening up from within. As it did so, the rectum began to protrude externally, forming the pink fleurette that is referred to as a "rosebud" in extreme anal pornography, now even pinker.

"Here we see the blossom of the Holy Rose Garden of Great Mother Nature," said Rosenberg. "And the Rose Gives Honey to the Bees." He sighed with carnivorous lust.

I had been horrified a year earlier when I had learned that some people were turned on by seeing internal organs collapsing and falling out due to sexual abuse. Now my horror reached another level as I watched a tiny hand protruding from the opening, humanoid but with sharp white claws for fingernails, covered in blood and other slime. It was my first witness of an anal birth. I hope it will ever be my last.

It took less than a minute for the baby to rip itself out with ferocity, shredding the sphincter and utterly disemboweling the body of its mother as it did so. Even more astoundingly was the fact that the baby seemed to be getting larger as it emerged. First one entire arm came through. Then the other arm and head came out together, ripping flesh along the way. Finally, the rest of the body fell down onto the straw below like a piece of dung. All the while, Rosenberg chanted as the Nymphi sang hymns in Latin and the head of Pindar, attached to the monstrosity below, howled in pain.

Already resembling a fifteen-month old in stature and appearance, the precocious newborn immediately stood up and used its teeth, quite sharp, to sever its umbilicus, which appeared to me to be a short flesh tube connected to a much longer plastic one. This was strung through Philippine's womb and connected to the Gradalis above. The child pulled it out through the entry hole in Philippine's pelvis. Then it put the tube to its lips and began sucking fluid out. As it drank, it grew to the size of a three-year-old in just a couple of minutes.

Apparently sated, the child climbed onto the back of the thing it had come from, the back being Philippine’s stomach. That creature, despite being eviscerated rectally, willfully crawled over to the side of the enclosure where the child used its body as a step-stool to try to climb out. But it could only reach up high enough to get its forearms out, and couldn’t pull itself up. So the creature, whether motivated by maternal instinct or something else, raised itself up on its hind legs and leaned with its forelegs against the wall, which allowed the child to escape.

I refer to the child as “it” only to be gender-neutral, as it quickly became clear that both sex organs were present. But there were other unique features as well, such as certain markings on the child’s skin. These became more apparent after what happened next.

The hermaphrodite toddler ran into the emergency shower, where it managed to jump up and pull the triangular yellow handle that was hanging down from the ceiling inside. A siren went off, the white light came on inside, and water began pouring down on the child. It used its hands to rub the muck off of itself.

This revealed its skin, which was dark and covered with what looked like stars. In the UV light, these popped out brilliantly, so that its hide looked like the sky itself.

As all this was happening, one of the robed celebrants, acting on a nod from Rosenberg, slammed the door shut. The child turned around with a look of horror on its face. It banged on the door with its fists and cried. At this, everybody laughed.

The person who shut the door leaned over and turned a red knob that was on the outside of the shower station, next to a blue knob, right where the water was piped in. It seemed he had turned the hot water on, as the window began to fog up. The water was pooling up rapidly, and due to the steam, dripping down from the entire ceiling in addition to the shower head. The child became increasingly frantic. The hot water was undoubtedly scalding it.

“Enjoy the purifying pain of the Niptron of the Stars, my son,” said Rosenberg, not acknowledging the child’s feminine aspect. “This is nothing like the Niptron of Empyrean fire that will soon baptize the entire peasant population of this pathetic prison with its flaming wisdom.”

He walked up to the shower door and looked directly into the child’s eyes through a hole in the fog that its panicked fist-pounding had made. He laughed at the poor thing for another couple of minutes. Then when the water was up to the child’s chest, he announced:

“That’s enough!”

Two others pulled the child out, who was shivering in shock. Another pushed the dissection table out between the congregants and the Gradalis, with the sewing machine still sitting on one end of it. The body parts that Consivia had been sewing together were gone already.

The other two assistants dragged the child over and placed it on the dissection table face down. Then they held it in place as Rosenberg stepped up behind it. The person who had brought the table over now held out for him a can of Lyle’s Golden Syrup and a black umbrella.

Rosenberg dropped his pants and slathered up his penis while the other two forced the child onto his knees with his rump positioned at the end. I turned my head away and shut my eyes, not wanting to see yet another child raped —and this was to be the youngest one yet. But Miles pushed my head back to face the scene.

“Open your eyes,” he said. “Or I’ll kill you.”

I opened them, but purposely kept them out of focus so that I would not see the horrors in front of me very well. Yet I could still hear the horrible sound of the child screaming, and it seemed to me that the rape had already begun.

As much as I tried not to see, I peripherally observed that Rosenberg was attempting to open the rectum with his finger and a glob of syrup.

At that moment, there was a rumble in the building, like an earthquake.

The diamond now flipped itself over and ascended to the very top of the Gradalis, to the octagonal window in the ceiling, where it fit perfectly like a puzzle piece.

Then the Hyperuranian rays came through. I don't think the others saw it, because they didn't react. But I saw the diamond, after having been temporarily red, now light up brighter than before, putting out a rainbow of colors all over the place. The fluid in the Gradalis took on the appearance of a pousse-café, stratified into different colors.

Now when I say "different colors," I mean it was a rainbow of colors that I had never seen before. They were sparkling all around me as the diamond rotated, putting out dizzying flashes that threatened to induce a seizure in me.

But then the diamond turned green in color, and switched its rotation. The light I saw also became green in appearance. The diamond was acting as a deck prism on board a ship, amplifying the light from above the chamber. I could tell that it was filtering this light—light from normally invisible spectrums—into a form that I could see, although presumably, these rays were still quite dangerous, as the glasses worn by the others would indicate. Furthermore, what the new light allowed me to see in the rest of the room was absolutely horrible.

The ghastly creatures I now spied filled every single inch of space around me. There were things everywhere, things that resembled in several aspects living beings. It's hard to say what they looked like because each one was different.

Also, you couldn't tell where one ended and the others began.

The only individual items I could distinguish in the room were the things I had already seen before the green light entered. Everything else was a mass of greyish-green-colored slimy flesh, consisting of hundreds of beings with black beady eyes and long proboscis-mouths. These mouths were all busy sucking on things, mostly on the bodies of the people in the room. A large number of mouths were also sucking from the hoses hanging from the Gradalis.

There were insect-like legs on some of these creatures, and tentacles on others. These became enmeshed with those of the other beings as they moved around the room, hungrily chasing emissions from living bodies wherever they might be found. These emissions could be seen by me now as diversely-hued jets of light streaming out of particular points on people’s bodies.

I noticed a large cluster of mouths around the stumps of my legs, with little black reptilian tongues slithering in and out, licking at the blood that had seeped through the bandages. But more—many more—were surrounding the victim on the table, screaming and struggling as the preliminaries of its rape continued.

Those closest slurped eagerly. Many others crushed to get close. What was happening on that table clearly put out an energy that they were desperate to drink. I shuddered in revulsion.

They’re not just in this room, said my telepathic informant, now crouching before me in the dying body of the Frankenstein creature in the pit beneath the Gradalis. These are the Amaleks. They’re everywhere, all the time. You can only see them now because of the Hyperuranian light.

Then I noticed a mess of these monsters crowded around the rear end of the creature in the pit. Some were eating the blood from the its wounds, and the afterbirth on the ground. But most were eagerly licking and sucking at something else: its vagina. Something was coming out. It took a moment for me to realize that there was yet another small humanoid hand emerging from it, this one coal-black skin, but with white claws like the first child.

The green light had been there for at least a full minute before Rosenberg noticed that I was looking at things that he and the others, because of their glasses, couldn’t see.

“What do you see?” He asked.

Don’t tell him the truth! the informant said in my head.

What should I say? I asked.

Nonsense, the mental voice replied. Distract him. Sing a song. Keep him from hearing the other baby’s cries. This child is our last chance to prevent the collapse of the Pillars of Heaven.

“What do you see?!” Rosenberg insisted angrily.

I tried to close my eyes to clear my mind and think of something. But Miles slapped me and told me to open them again. So I couldn’t shut out the image of all these parasites sucking off of everybody, and I just could not think of anything to say. No mental voices came along to rescue me, and I began to wonder if my informant was dead, since I had felt him to be inhabiting the head of Pindar that was sewn onto the creature at the bottom of the pit, and that creature seemed to be dying as the second twin ripped its way out.

Pindar’s head was grimacing in pain, but remained silent, presumably choking back the moans so as to keep Rosenberg ignorant of what was happening. The baby’s head, however, had begun to emerge, and I knew it was possible that it would begin to scream immediately. I sensed that if Rosenberg knew about the other baby, he would kill it, and that would be the end, somehow, of an opportunity for Earth to escape its apparent impending doom.

I wasn’t sure how it was going to happen, as my informant had been vague.

But I realized that somehow Rosenberg’s imminent sodomization of the child of the planetary Archons that had been born from Philippine’s anus would cause the layers of the universe, already unstable from the sacrifice of most of those Archons, to collapse.

“Well that light’s about to get a lot brighter. Just tell me what you see.”

With that, he grabbed his penis again with one hand, the child’s thigh with the other, and lurched his pelvis forward towards the rear end. Then one of his assistants deployed the umbrella and held it up over his head, presumably to protect himself from the Hyperuranian rays.

If he doesn’t want to see that light, why does he want to go to the place where it’s coming from? I wondered.

Sing you idiot! shouted the voice in my head, suddenly returning. Don’t let him go through with it! Distract him!

“Return through the rectum is easy!” shouted Rosenberg, pointing his finger at the screaming child on the table, just an inch away from achieving his goal of penile penetration. “The Distinguished Charity of Mete uproots the enemy! I am Saturnus Stercutus and you are my Stercus. I shall plow you and then burn the fallow fields with the Niptron of fire!”

The words “Niptron of fire” reminded me of something. Something stupid.

This happens to me all the time. Even in the worst situations, something I hear another person say will remind me of a song with lyrics that sound similar. It can be any type of song—even a TV theme song or an advertisement jingle.

Regardless of how catchy the tune is, or whether or not I like the song in question, it will immediately get stuck in my head, often in altered form. My mind will automatically create a new version with parodied lyrics to fit similar-sounding words I’ve just heard.

Well, this is what happened to me at that moment, and it filled my head with the lyrics to a once-popular song. It was not my favorite by any means, and not all that singable for me, really. But “Niptron of fire” made me think of that song by the Pointer Sisters from the Beverly Hills Cop soundtrack. And so, without a second to lose, I sang out loudly, swaying back and forth in my wheelchair like a brain-damaged moron.

"I'm just burning doing the Niptron Dance!"

The distraction worked. Rosenberg stopped what he was doing and turned around to face me.

"What did you say?" he asked, confused and annoyed. Just then, I heard the newborn twin cry out from the pit. I sang more to cover it.

"I'm just burning doing the Niptron Dance! I'm just burning doing the Niptron Dance! Hooty-Hoot! Hooty-Hoot!"

"What's wrong with you?" Rosenberg said angrily. Then, his look changing to serious and curious, he asked "Are you hearing a radio station in your head?"

But I didn't answer, I just continued singing. As I did so, I saw that Miles had followed my gaze, and now saw the baby coming out, still crying. But instead of alerting Rosenberg, he looked me in the eye for a good second, then began to sing along.

"I'm just burning doing the Niptron Dance! Hoo hoo!" As we both sang this together, another light entered the room from above. Everything became brighter. I could still see the Amaleks all around, but they were not as distinct anymore. I looked at the Gradalis. The diamond was clear again, and refracting a normal rainbow spectrum of colors, quite beautifully, all over the room.

Real sunlight! I thought. Sunrise on Easter. Halleluiah!

But Rosenberg didn't notice this either, so distracted was he by our terrible singing.

"Miles, why are you doing this? Rosenberg screamed. He pounded his fists on the table like a pouting child. "Stop it! I'm losing my erection!"

While he had been throwing his fit, the twin child had fully emerged, cut its own cord and was already drinking its fill from the Gradalis. It too had grown to the size of a three-year old. And while it resembled its brother/sister with its dual sex organs, the coloring of its body was much different.

It was piebald, with one leg and foot black, the other set white. The same was true of the hands and arms, but the white and black colors were on opposite sides compared to the legs. The torso, divided into quadrants, was similarly chequered, as was the head. The white segments were marked with black sun-shapes, and the black segments covered in white crescents. All this was quite visible because there was clearly a bright morning sun shining above us now, and also because, while covered in afterbirth, this twin wasn't nearly as mucky as its sibling had been.

Now, as Rosenberg approached me and Miles in fury, with the umbrella-holder following him uncertainly, the twin came crawling out of the pit behind him. But Rosenberg didn't notice because he was focused on getting us to shut up. He took the gun from Miles, which it seemed to me that Miles allowed rather easily, and then pointed it at us, repeating his demand for us to be quiet.

"The light is frying your brains! Stay cool! I need to keep focused on my task," he yelled.

As he said this, the twin ran behind the Gradalis and disappeared in the shadows of the room's machinery. Rosenberg turned back around to return to his rectal raping ritual, placing the gun next to the sewing machine. But then we were joined in our singing by the three men that were holding up the Gradalis: Paris, Chesterfield and Leopold.

"I'm just burnin' doin' the Niptron Dance!" they all sang, completely out of sync.

"What the fuck!" screamed Rosenberg. "Nymphi, sing the Nosiéle eiryk!

These folks want to hear some music, it seems!"

The young boys in the room immediately began singing, in Greek this time, but backwards. I’m pretty sure it was the Greek Orthodox version of Kyrie eléison in reverse, the undoing of the traditional Christian prayer for mercy. The tune was backwards too, probably an inversion of Franz Schubert’s Mass No. 2, composed for this prayer. Meanwhile, Rosenberg chanted the Sator Square once again.

SATOR!

AREPO!

TENET!

OPERA!

ROTAS!

SATOR!

AREPO!

TENET!

OPERA!

ROTAS!

SATOR!

AREPO!

TENET!

OPERA!

ROTAS!

Rosenberg’s member dangled perilously close to its desired entry-point once again, and with it, seemingly, the fate of our world was hanging in the balance. At that second, which might well have been our last as far as I knew, the dumbest thought ever came to me, spawned by Rosenberg’s chanting.

The only thing that can save us now is a deus ex machina, I thought.

A deus ex machina—a “ghost from the machine”—is, of course, a term for when dramatic stories have the crisis solved at the end by the sudden appearance of some new element, such as a supernatural being who saves the day. As per example, the flying chariot sent by her grandfather Helios to rescue the witch Medea at the end of the play by Euripides that’s named after her. The “machine” in the phrase is said to have originally been a reference to a crane that was used in ancient Greek drama to lower the gods in these scenes—or rather, the actors playing them—onto the stage.

However, this is a little-known detail. Most people who use the phrase assume that the “machine” is the story itself, and I think the meaning has evolved to include that. It occurred to me that the phrase “phantom of the opera” could be reinterpreted to mean the same thing essentially, as opera is Latin for “work,” and is considered synonymous with machina. Phantasma, meanwhile, is a synonym of idolon, another Latin word for “ghost.” In terms of Rosenberg’s present working, both terms could refer to his ongoing series of rituals, and the rousing of a spirit that would then determine the final outcome of the ceremonies.

As I pondered this, the phantom of the operation made itself known. The piebald twin hermaphrodite now sneaked up behind Rosenberg, who was applying more Lyle's to its sibling's rectum, and stealthily removed a large pair of surgical scissors lying next to the sewing machine on the table. Then it opened them up, and spoke.

"Oh Paternoster!" it said, vibrating the air in the room with a voice of many waters. Everyone else in the room, most of whom had noticed the child moments earlier but reacted very slowly, began to back away from the dissection table in fear.

"Ah?" said Rosenberg, spinning around.

He still hadn't achieved penile penetration of his target, and in fact the child still seemed relatively intact in that regard, judging by what I saw peripherally from my vantage point. Nor would Rosenberg get another chance to deflower it. The instant he turned around, the child's brother/sister removed Rosenberg's manhood expertly, as if it had done so a thousand times before, at the birth of a thousand different aeons.

It took a second for him to realize what had happened. He was still holding his penis when he noticed that it was no longer attached to him. At first he just dropped his jaw silently, with his eyes wide with horror. Then he dropped the umbrella on the dissection table, where it got caught up against the sewing machine. Finally, he dropped to his knees as he screamed in pain, and his attacker buried the scissors in-between his shoulder blades—a fatal blow. The instant he let go of the child on the table, the green light from above, and the horrible bloodsucking creatures it revealed, vanished from my vision.

Then, as if to be thorough, as if to ensure that this penis of terror could never again be used as a weapon against another child, the piebald hermaphrodite caught the genitals in its hand before they hit the ground. It bit off both testicles, swallowed them, and threw the penis into the pit where both twins had been born. Next, it grabbed its sibling around the waist and began helping it down from the dissection table. I saw Rosenberg's body stop moving. He was gone.

At this moment, the three men holding the Gradalis all acted at once on a pre-arranged signal.

“Go!” I heard Leopold shout.

All three of them began attempting to stand up, which was quite a struggle.

The weight of the fluid-filled vessel must have been enormous, plus there was counter-pressure coming from its attachment to the ceiling. Then there was another complication, which I hadn’t seen before because of the hoods draped over their heads. But when those hoods got lifted up a bit as they were struggling, I saw that all three of them actually had their necks attached to the Gradalis itself.

Their brainstems were being leeched? I thought.

Then Leopold gave another signal. “Three, two, one!” he said.

They rose up sharply in unison, heaving and sighing, with the Gradalis still on their necks, until the glass cylinder at the top connecting it to the Vortex above the ceiling cracked and shattered. A flood of fluids immediately began raining down like from the sluicegates of Heaven in the days of Noe.

“Go now!” Leopold shouted. All three men each reached up with one hand to detach themselves from the neck valves as they simultaneously pushed the Gradalis backwards with the other. By “backwards” I mean that two of them pushed it off of themselves, and, necessarily, in Leopold’s direction, as he also pushed it forward.

The Gradalis tipped over and landed on top of Leopold, shattering and spilling its load around. Most of the contents fell down into the pit where the creature with Pindar’s head, Philippine’s torso, and my feet (among those of others) stood eviscerated and presumably dead. Leopold too now lay face-down and motionless on the concrete floor, so I assumed he was deceased as well. The twins had run off somewhere and were no longer visible.

Chesterfield and Paris lurched forward, free now, but with clear fluid now dribbling out of their necks. They both took their hoods off quickly and pressed them against the backs of their necks to stop the leaking. Then they each fell forward onto their hands and knees in the full-genuflect position. Whether by pre-agreed design or instinct I know not, but the two of them both began praying.

That was the real Christian prayer for mercy, and in Greek, too, which was uncommon but not unheard of in his native Anglican church, and, I’ve always thought, much more authentic than the English-translated versions. Paris, next to him, muttered a Mohammedan equivalent in Arabic.

Rosenberg was kneeling next to them too. But he wasn’t praying. He was crying, screaming, and bleeding to death.

While this was happening, the other congregants were quickly filing out of the room via the exit ramp. But when the one at the front of the line opened the door, an ocean of blood and other human sewage greeted them, flooding into the room. It washed the people on the ramp back down into the room and began filling the floor, making its way towards the pit with the Frankenstein creature in it that had my feet.

My feet! I thought again with a pang of longing.

I wheeled myself closer to the pit and leaned over in my chair to get a better view. The pit was half-full of fluids and broken glass now, but the chimera creature was still standing on its legs of various origins. I couldn't see any breathing, though, and the head was flopped forward in defeat.

I saw that the diamond had landed point-down directly in Philippine's excoriated pelvis, where it was slowly sinking into the flesh, which seemed to collapse and partially liquefy under its weight, capturing it like quicksand. Next to this, Rosenberg's severed penis had landed, halfway on top of the creature's backside, where the vagina and anus had both been ripped open so badly as to form one large hole. That hole now began to collapse inside, swallowing the penis, tip first.

The entire torso dissolved into a fleshy, bloody pink mass resembling Playdough. Then it coagulated around the diamond, forming a thin membrane over it. This made me think of the similarity of shape between the side profile of the diamond, this sacred "keystone," and the human sacrum bone at the center of the pelvis. It occurred to me that this bone actually does act as a keystone for the pelvis and, in a way, for the entire human body, positioned in the center, dispersing the weight of the upper half evenly through the lower half.

In fact, if you bent over onto your hands to form an arch with your body, I thought, either forwards, like Nuit, the Egyptian goddess of the night sky, or backwards, like Uranus, the Ouroboros (and Pindar's body, and Baron Carrickfergus)—the placement of the sacrum bone would be precisely in the keystone position.

As I was watching the creature's bodily transformation in front of me, I noted that the sacrum bone, when detached from the other bones, including the coccyx below, also closely resembles the keystone referred to in the Masonic Royal Arch degree—the one that was used as the official seal for Pennsylvania,

"the Keystone State." Then I remembered some of the things written in a 1922 book by Masonic writer Manly P. Hall entitled The Initiates of the Flame, in which he states outright that the sacrum bone and the Royal Arch keystone are one and the same. He further asserted that “the head of the Sphinx” could be seen in “the inverted sacrum bone when it is turned upward,” and also in “the inverted Masonic keystone.” Then he elaborated even more: It is said that in ancient times the Sphinx was the gateway of the pyramid, and that there was an underground passage which led from the Sphinx to Cheops. This would make the symbolism even more perfect, for the gateway to the spirit is through the bodies according to the ancients.

These passages were accompanied by an illustration of the sacrum bone inside the Masonic keystone.

According to Egyptologist E. Wallis Budge, as I recalled, the sacrum bone was the root of the sacred djed pillar, the “spine of Osiris” which was thought to hold the different levels of existence apart. He also said:

> …There can be little doubt that the djed is a conventional representation of a part of the backbone of Osiris, namely the sacrum bone, which on account of its proximity to the sperm bag, was regarded as the most important member of his body….

Then I remembered that the ancient Mayans referred to the sacrum bone as a “portal to the underworld” (that being “the Place of the Seven Gods”). They compared going through it to going into the mouth of a serpent. Presumably this is because of the serpentine shape of tunnels of the intestines, considered analogous to the infernal caverns by many cultures, including the Greeks and the Hindus. In fact, going back to ancient Babylon, the spiral emblem found throughout the world has been used to represent these tunnels. This association is one of the reasons that intestines were so commonly used for divination—as maps, indicating the path that lies ahead.

I mused about the fact that alchemists have cryptically described their “red stone” (a product of the alchemical process) as being a “bezoar,” a word for a clump of undigested food that has been caught inside a living creature’s intestines. They called this stone the “red sun,” and the “lesser stone,” as compared to the ultimate alchemical product, the Philosopher's Stone, which was believed to be manufactured within, or otherwise utilizing, the brain human rather. According to the oldest Egyptian alchemists, I remembered, the red stone was formed in the human bowels the same way they thought of gold as being created within the bowels of the Earth.

This is the same thing as the stone that Rhea gave to Chronos to trick him, I thought as the understanding rushed down upon me. And it's also how he was poisoned, through the anus, blocking his intestines and causing fecal vomiting.

Recalling this brought me back in my mind to the Mayan beliefs regarding the sacrum bone, which they sometimes call a "second skull," or even "the inverted skull," because it sort of looks like one when you separate it from the rest of the skeleton. Then I thought about the Templar symbol of the skull and crossbones, and the fact that it basically shows a head in-between two thighs. I wondered if it might be connected to their alleged rite of induction involving the Osculum Inflame ("Obscene Kiss"). The same ritual was allegedly practiced by witches at sabbats, involving a kiss on the Devil's "second mouth" underneath his tail.

This brought to mind an articulated read somewhere stating that some Jews believed that this is where a deceased person's soul is stored, hibernating until the Resurrection at the End of Days. At that point, supposedly, all human bodies will regenerate from their sacrum bones, if they're lucky enough for that part of their bodies to still be intact, and then everyone will be presented for Final Judgment.

As I contemplated these things, I saw the pelvis of the creature, pregnant now with the diamond, fall downward as the recently and artificially-formed sinews connecting the tissue to the various legs began to melt. It slid slowly to the floor while the legs remained standing. The head fell off and into the surrounding goop.

The waterline in the pit started to rapidly rise as the flood of fluids from above flowed down the ramp and across the floor to join the pool below. But when it rose up high enough that the fluids reached the top of my feet, I saw them come alive. They began to twitch, and then to stomp.

“Come to me!” I shouted to them.

And they obeyed. They jumped up high, freeing themselves completely.

Then, one at a time, they leap-frogged off the top of what was left of the monster’s main body, which was now re-congealing around its remaining legs.

They sailed through the air directly into my lap, slimy and bloody.

Like the flying feet of Mercury, I thought to myself.

As disgusting as they were, they were a part of me, and I was happy to see them. They seemed to feel the same way. I had to hold the feet down as they continued to hop around my lap in excitement for our reunion.

Then I heard something slopping around in the pile of coagulating flesh and blood at the bottom of the pit. I leaned over again for a look. I immediately regretted it.

Fresh sinews had just formed between the remaining three legs and the torso, which was now a triangle. Tentacles of bloody, rubbery meat reached out from the stumps to merge with it. Pindar’s head fell backwards and dissolved into the mess. But his facial features, with his mouth curled in agony, now appeared within the triangle.

Within less than a minute, I was looking at a real, living trinacria, with a reddish-pink triangle in the center. The freakish creature was surrounded with the presently knee-deep and ever-growing puddle of sludge that was still pouring into it down the ramp from the floors above us. The eye caught my gaze as the grimace turned into a delighted smile that sent a shuddering chill through me.

Thank you, the voice of my informant said to me in my head. Now Albion can rise again. Now I can come home to Jerusalem on the Thames.

But then the face twisted in pain again, and its body convulsed once more, just as it had during the birth of each twin. Well as it turned out, it was not just a set of twins. They were triplets. A third sibling now began to emerge from the place where Pindar's head had been attached to the body.

It was covered in a pink membrane sac, but through it I could see two dark hooves. By the time half of it was out, I could tell that the "membrane sac" around it was actually a human stomach and attached esophagus, the latter with the front hooves stuck through it. The outline of a tiny horse head could be seen at the top of the stomach, twitching side to side.

But at this point, the birth seemed to stall. The baby horse was stuck. The face in the triangle howled. Its voice sounded so … ancient, and loud. It reverberated through the whole room, perhaps the whole building, perhaps the whole world. I heard a rumbling sound all around us, along with a trembling sensation coming through the floors and walls.

Then in the corner of my eye I saw something stirring from behind the pit, amid the broken glass of the Gradalis. It was Leopold. He was getting up.

I couldn't tell how badly he was hurt because he was covered in filth. But he was able to get up onto his feet, take off his hood, press it against his leaking neck, then walk over to the pit and slide down into it, all without looking up at me. Next, he went over to where the little foal, about the size of a small cat, was still struggling to be born.

He grabbed its front legs and yanked it straight out, then caught the whole thing with both hands before it fell down. He walked up to the edge of the pit, sloshing through the sludge, and lifted the foal up over the side. He placed it down on the floor in front of me, still inside the stomach, where it continued to twitch. After letting go, he fell backwards onto his butt and sat silently in the pool of sewage.

Then the twins came out from hiding. They had been inside the emergency shower, and had apparently used it just now without me noticing, the noise drowned out by all the rest. The piebald one was now clean, and the blue one had washed the syrup off itself.

They were both quite beautiful. I was happy to see them looking relatively well. Silently, in my own mind, I uttered a prayer, to what god I could not say, asking that they should be allowed to somehow survive this ordeal. I knew the future of existence itself somehow depended on it.

Both children, who from birth had always known innately what they needed to do, now gathered around the membrane-covered foal and, using their claws, ripped open the stomach, freeing it. The horse, which looked like it was probably white, but was covered in goo, continued to twitch on the floor for a minute or so, while the piebald twin grabbed the tub of “Peepee-roni” from the refrigerator.

Then the toddler toddled back over to the foal and knelt down next to its head. The child took the cover off of the tub, revealing, as I had suspected, small preserved human penises. The foal smelled the meat and then sat up eagerly. The child fed it one, then another, with the child and its sibling helping themselves to a few as well.

The horse began to grow before my eyes, just like the two children had done, and did even more as they too ate the penises. Then the horse began stretching out its wings. Yes, it had wings.

Maybe it needs some water, I thought.

I wheeled myself over to the shelves over the fridge, which was no easy task now that the floor was flooded, and looked for an uncontaminated vessel to put water in. At first there was no luck. Every beaker, jar, and bottle was full of either biohazard material or harsh chemicals. Then I found a large beaker labeled “H20” on the bottom shelf. It was half-full. It was. I could reach it, just barely.

I grabbed it and brought it to the eyewash station, where I filled it up so that I had about a liter of water. I wheeled the beaker over to where the children were feeding the horse, and handed it to the blue one. The child looked up at me and smiled in gratitude. Each of the kids took a long draught. Then they gave the rest to the horse, who drank it greedily.

They were all a bit larger by the end of this. The foal stood up finally, and exercised its wings a bit more. I saw that it was male. Both children led the horse over to the shower, where they washed off the afterbirth. When the foal came out of the booth a minute later, he looked much better. I could see that his fur was definitely white.

The two children now walked the foal over to the dissection table, which they were both able to climb on top of. This enabled them to mount the back of the horse. The piebald one sat in front. The blue one turned around to wave at me and smile, as the piebald one leaned forward and patted the horse’s neck. It neighed, whinnied, reared up, and then took off, up the ramp and through the exit door. I knew where it was headed next.

The ramp winds all around the building, I thought. That will give it plenty of runway to build up speed so it can take off.

About a minute later, a shockwave shook the room, like the one I had experienced during dinner at New Court, but louder, with a similar waterphone-like sound reverberating through the air. A clear glass container, shaped somewhat like a Kool-Aid pitcher, fell off the shelf towards my lap. I caught it with my hands before it landed. It was filled with a translucent pinkish liquid and labeled Liquor Amnii + PROTEANS. At the bottom of the vessel was a dead human fetus, about an inch in length, like a worm in a bottle of tequila. I shuddered at the sight of its beady eyes. Then I heard a thunderous crash from the floor above us.

I looked up. There was the body of Baron Carrickfergus, smashed against the bottom of the Vortex. I couldn’t tell if this last blow had been the one to finally extinguish his life. As before, the eyes were still frozen open.

I turned around again, towards the pit, and surveyed the scene around me.

Paris and Chesterfield were still praying. Rosenberg was slumped over on his knees, perhaps dead. As for Leopold and the trinacria in the pit, their present status was unknown to me. But then I heard Leopold's voice coming from the pit.

"You should look for the bottle marked Liquor Amnii + PROTEANS on the shelf, Pamela."

Yes, he said 'PROTEANS,' I thought to myself. So it wasn't just a misspelling of 'proteins.'

You can use it to put your feet back on your legs."

I immediately looked in his direction.

"How?" I asked. "I have it right here."

"Come on over here. I'll help you," he said.

I wheeled over to the pit through the sludge on the floor, past the unconscious body of Rosenberg and the kneeling figures of the two MI5 agents, who remained oblivious to all else but their mantras. As I approached, Leopold stood up from within the pit, so that he was now visible from about the waist up.

He had tied his hood around his leaking neck. His fancy suit was covered in revolting filth, the stench of which I barely noticed anymore. He held out both of his mangled hands in a cupped position.

"Give me the feet and unwrap your stumps," he instructed. But I didn't trust him. He was the one who had cut them off in the first place. I just sat there and stared at him severely.

"Look, you're going to need my help. You need to regenerate the broken bone that was removed. No doctor can do that for you."

I looked at the feet in my lap. Then I unwrapped my stumps, which were hurting again, as the morphine had worn off. Also, I had felt the "phantom limb" sensation several times already, but now my ankles were crying out for the feet like a lover separated from her beloved. The wounds were looking gangrenous and infected.

"Hand over the feet, then pour the elixir on when I give you the signal,"

Leopold said.

Reluctantly, I gave them up. He placed both feet onto the stumps. I could feel the flesh on the end of my ankles eagerly embracing the contact with the estranged limbs. But he was right. A portion around the break point had been removed. The two ends didn't exactly match up anymore, and even if my body accepted them as-is, I'd now be shorter than I was before. Still, it was better than no feet at all. I waited to see what would happen. Leopold seemed to lift up on one side of his body, like he had just put his foot on top of something. Then he closed his eyes as if straining for something. He gave the signal.

"Pour!" he shouted.

I poured the "elixir" liberally on the ends of each piece. As soon as I had done so, I felt an electric current run from Leopold's body through the feet and into my legs. It riveted him in place, but did not seem to be harming him. He just looked directly into my eyes intensely for the next few seconds without moving.

Immediately I felt the feet beginning to adhere to my ankles. I witnessed the miracle of new flesh forming, just as it had when the creature that had borrowed my feet reformed itself into a trinacria. As it coagulated, the meat gelled into a spongey substance before solidifying. During these few seconds of plasticity, Leopold slowly and expertly pulled my feet down an inch, so that the missing segment was reformed, good as new, including, somehow, the bone and marrow within.

“Astounding,” I said, involuntarily, with my mouth wide open in amazement.

Within a few moments, the electricity stopped. Leopold let go, and the feet stayed in place, continuing to meld with the leg. A few seconds after that, I found that I could feel them again. The sensation spread from my ankles down to my toes as my nerves came alive once more. I flexed my toes gleefully.

All these little piggies went to market, I thought. And now they’re all home.

Wee wee wee!

And not a moment too soon. Leopold had now climbed out of the pit, which I found threatening. I instinctively jumped on my newly-recovered feet to run away. But when I tried to take a step, they buckled under me. I found myself on my knees between Paris and Chesterfield, positioned the same way they were.

I wretched at the smell of the gook that was pooling up around my legs.

Leopold walked over to a panel of switches on the wall and flipped one.

Something happened inside the pit. The creature screamed, but his scream trailed off. He was falling down, along with everything else that had been pooling up in the recess. The bottom must have been a trap door. And Leopold had opened it! I heard a splash as everything hit water in the depths below.

The Walbrook, I thought. He just threw the trinacria into the Walbrook.

Then the ground beneath us began to quake, and a large crack formed in the floor of the room. I decided that begging God for mercy, whomever he or she might be, was a prudent thing to do at that point. I knelt and bowed my head, but not so far over that I couldn't keep an eye on what was happening.

Kyrie, eléison, Kyrie, eléison, Kyrie, eléison… I droned. As soon as I started, Paris, without looking up, switched from Arabic to Greek, and joined us. The sound of our chanting vibrated strangely through the air, as though we were speaking directly into the whirring blades of a fan. A breeze seemed to be blowing down the ramp from the floors above.

Then there was another rumble, louder than the others. The ceiling and walls were all cracking now. The Vortex and its contents came crashing down through the ceiling to the floor behind us. We were dusted by this, but because we had our heads pointed down, we managed to avoid being hit in the face by shards of glass, and everything seemed to magically bounce off our backs.

The body of Baron Carrickfergus fell down into the pit and hit the underground river below. The fragrant fluids and broken glass spread more broadly, contributing several more inches to the overall flooding of the room. But luckily for us, the fluids were falling into pit and other cracks in the floor now. This meant that it was draining away from our particular position.

Leopold then chose to come over and kneel in the middle of our triangle with us. There he uttered his own prayer.

"Mother Rock, have mercy. Stand firm beneath us, we implore you," he said. "Deliver us from the mire." Strangely, while addressing a pagan goddess, he quoted Psalm 69:14. Then he went on, mumbling in what sounded like … Gaelic?

Elvish? I'm not sure.

Now "mother rock" is another way of saying "mother lode," and simply refers to the main vein among any collection of underground ore deposits.

But I am pretty sure he was praying to the Magna Mater, the Rock Cybele. Yet I suppose it could be taken either way, considering what was subsequently revealed beneath the ground on which we were kneeling.

Then all at once, there was a sharp jolt from below, and the ground all around us collapsed. Everything was gone except for a small circle, about eight feet in circumference, around where we happened to be kneeling. But I didn’t have time to appreciate the miracle of being so chosen for preservation, because the ceiling came down on top of us.

Yet here again, most of it seemed to somehow just fall away from us, into the immeasurable abyss surrounding us. Not all of it, however. The last thing I remember before I lost consciousness, just before a piece of masonry hit me in the head, was seeing three large yellow circles directly above me in the light blue morning sky, arranged in triangular formation. In an instant they coalesced into one yellow orb, which immediately started bleeding and fell out of the sky. This left a circle in the sky where it had been, appearing as an indigo field studded with white stars, which then immediately opened like a window, revealing a huge eye that stared back at me. It blinked, and I blacked out.

Chapter 25: Albion’s Aeon

The light of this star surpassed that of all the others; its brilliance was ineffable and its novelty was such that all those who looked at it were struck with astonishment.

The sun, moon and the stars formed a choir round this star.

– St. Ignatius, Epistle to the Ephesians Okayness is not only a concept that is relative to the situation, but one which, quite often, when invoked, teeters dangerously on the verge of being meaningless, threatening to render impotent the dramatic import of anything which preceded it. Therefore, when Leopold Black/Thomas Weir, having pulled a stone away from the rubble that buried me, asked, with a disfigured hand extended, if I was “OK,” I did not have an immediate response.

I opened my eyes, but as they began to adjust to the light and to focus on Leopold’s face, I remembered once again how he had tricked me getting involved in this nightmare. I tried to move my feet to push off whatever was weighing on them, cutting off the circulation. Then I recalled that the man standing over me had actually sawed them off the previous night. So I decided just to close my eyes again, thinking that my feet were still gone.

It wasn’t until I heard Paris and Chesterfield’s voices amidst a cacophony of sirens and car alarms also that I opened my eyes again. Then it came back to me: how my feet had been restored, and how the small piece of land we stood on had somehow been spared from what seemed at the time like both the collapse of the earth and the collapse of the sky. Paris lifted a piece of the digital ceiling, with its hexagonal light grid, up off of my ankles. My feet were really there! What’s more, I could move them! It was painful and the muscles were stiff, but they did respond to my mental commands. I sat up.

Then I heard the piece of ceiling that Paris had just thrown over his shoulder hit bottom, after an extended delay and with a splash.

A splash? I thought. Why? And how far down did it fall?

At first my eyes focused on the three men directly before me, who were all staring back at me with concern. They all looked worse for the wear, dirty and badly beaten, but surprisingly unfazed considering the circumstances, especially the wounds I recalled them having on their necks, underneath the hoods that were still tied around their necks as tourniquets.

But then my eyes adjusted to take in the surrounding landscape. A few feet behind the men that stood in front of me, the earth dropped off into an abyss, all the way around. With help from Chesterfield, I stood up to get the full panoramic view. I tried to get closer to the edge of our island of safety, but the others insisted I "shouldn't look straight down right now," because it was scary. They also said it would be dangerous, since it was still quite difficult for me to stand without using Chesterfield as a crutch. So I looked around us, which was shocking enough.

We were surrounded by a vast chasm in the ground, which, from the sound of it, was at least partially filled with water now and quickly becoming fuller. The entire site had vanished—the whole of Bucklersbury, and everything around it, from Queen Street to Lothbury to Gracechurch, all the way down to the banks of the Thames, in a perfect circle. Rosenberg Plaza, the Walbrook Building, St.

Stephen's, New Court, the Bank of England, the Bullion Association, Mansion House… they were all gone.

I turned to the south and saw the river unobstructed in front of me, with a waterfall pouring down from it into the depths beneath. There it joined up with the Walbrook, which was now open to the light of the Sun once again and rapidly forging a brand new mouth for itself. The collapse of the earth below had caused three bridges to fall there also: Southwark Bridge, the Cannon Street Rail Bridge, and London Bridge.

But of course you know about the sinkhole in London that formed suddenly on Easter morning 2018, creating a precisely round hole in the earth a half-mile in circumference right next to the Thames—except for the estimated nine-by-nine plot of land that we four stood upon. You surely know, then, that this anomalous spindle of soil disintegrated, while we watched from above in awe, as soon as the rescue helicopter lifted the last of us up off of its surface. I wondered, of course, if it was our prayers that prevented us from being subsumed by "the mire," a la Psalm 69:14, as referenced earlier by Leopold: Deliver me out of the mire, and let me not sink….

Therefore, I gave thanks accordingly, silently, with Psalm 40: He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay….

If you already knew about the sinkhole, then you undoubtedly know about the Herculean efforts that were made to rescue all the other casualties of this catastrophe. As I write this, they are still working to dam up the river, pump the water out of the hole, and fill it in with concrete. It's the largest construction project in London since the building of Rosenberg Plaza, which now, ironically, must take a step down in history to become the second-largest.

The Prime Minister, enthusiastically embracing the Broken Window Fallacy, has praised and taken credit for the economic stimulation this has caused. But the real stimulus has come, of course, from the unique new element that was discovered within the depths of the chasm, and from the worldwide sovereign debt jubilee that was negotiated, beginning the following Wednesday, during talks between G20 heads of state, the International Monetary Fund, and the Bank of International Settlements.

Experts in Karst Topography and water table science told the news reporters that this was a disaster waiting to happen. The land was already inherently unstable because of the network of underground rivers, which, they said, after lying dormant for over a century, had been partially-re-activated in recent years by state-sponsored environmental scientists as part of the London Rivers Action Plan, which Rosenberg had bragged to us about at dinner on Friday night. Thus the underground development that had taken place in the intervening centuries since these rivers were last active—everything from miles of subway and service tunnels to multi-level basements in massive buildings—contributed to the weakening of the foundation beneath many of the structures.

So it didn't help that Rosenberg, in collusion with some friends in the Corporation of London governing the City, decided to re-channel the underground waters on the sly, without permission, restoring the Walbrook to full capacity years ahead of schedule. Water had since been pooling up in caves that had been formed by the underground river over thousands of years. All it took was a seismic jolt to get the process going, though nobody’s sure what caused that.

England is far away from the world’s major fault lines. But the motion of the tectonic plates elsewhere can still cause regional compression that affects the island. There hadn’t been another earthquake with its epicenter in London since 1750, and the one in 2018 was unrelated to tectonic movement.

However, many earthquakes have affected London throughout its history.

Supposedly one in the fifth century leveled the Temple of Apollo that is rumored to have once sat beneath the present location of Westminster Abbey. Other earthquakes with their epicenters elsewhere have been felt especially in that place many times, often accompanied by strange lights seen near the cathedral.

One such earthquake, which took place on April 6, 1580 during “Easter week,” originated in the Dover Straights and inspired the following poem by James Yates: Oh sudden motion, and shaking of the earth,

No blustering blastes, the weather calme and milde: Good Lord the sudden rarenesse of the thing

A sudden feare did bring, to man and childe, They verely thought, as well in field as Towne, The earth should sinke, and the houses all fall downe.

Well let vs print this present in our heartes, And call to God, for neuer neede we more:

Crauing of him mercy for our misdeedes,

Our sinfull liues from heart for to deplore, For let vs thinke this token doth portend,

If scourge nere hand, if we do still offend.

Another earthquake, which originated in Canterbury on May 21, 1382, was associated in the popular mind with a synod called by the Archbishop of Canterbury that took in the Blackfriars area of the City of London. The purpose was to condemn the heretic John Wyclyffe for his doctrine on transubstantiation.

Wyclyffe eventually died of a stroke, still amid controversy, but he was later excommunicated in 1415. His bones were eventually exhumed by Pope Martin V in 1428 to remove them from consecrated ground, then burnt to ashes and dumped into the River Swift.

With the London earthquake and "aftershocks" of 2018, it is thought by some that a chemical reaction took place right underneath the mithraeum, where the Rosenberg Plaza alembic system connected with the Walbrook. I believe this is accurate. This was the real reason why the London stretch of the Thames, all of London's underground rivers, and much of the local tap water "turned to blood" for a time. It wasn't because the red Moon had fallen into the river, although this is obviously connected on the mythopoeic level, one of the many meaningful coincidences that occur along with a supernatural event of this magnitude. Tests confirmed that the red stuff in the water really was largely blood, along with other human biofluids one would expect to find when sewage leaks into the water supply. But they also found many rare chemicals not normally found in traceable amounts.

Officials admitted to the public that Rosenberg restored the Walbrook to obtain the volume of water he needed for the "bizarre" and "illegal" scientific experiments taking place in the basement of Rosenberg Plaza. They claim that he was attempting to create "red mercury," a solid form of the element rumored to exist, and to be used in the creation of nuclear bombs, but which is quite possibly just fictional. However, several "real" (set up by intelligence agents) terrorist plots have been "foiled" that involved attempts by the criminals to purchase what they believed would be red mercury.

There are stories circulating which allege that red mercury can be used to create gold, to locate buried treasure (like a magic peepstone), or to invoke “jinn”

(an Arabic word for demons). One popular urban legend states that Singer sewing machines contain red mercury, which the news media claims is the reason that Rosenberg’s company purchased thousands of those machines over the previous year. But I think that the real “red Mercury,” the real “red stone” of the alchemists, was made in that ritual when the “Superman diamond” became transmuted with the invisible pink light from the heavens. The “emerald stone” of the alchemists was then formed when it was hit with the Hyperuranian light. This green diamond was the real “kryptonite” that created the explosion.

Officials have never identified or even acknowledged the 736 victims of the two-year-long orgy of death that had taken place there. To this day I still don’t know if they were mostly kidnap victims, adopted for the purpose, or given over as sacrifices by their parents (and raised in secret). But it seems to me that the answer could be any of these, or a combination of all three.

Of course, these are just some of the many details that I don’t know. These are only known to the people who were involved in orchestrating the rituals. Of those people, the ones that I can identify have all either disappeared or died. I haven’t seen any of them since that day. Leopold got on board the helicopter with us when it came to our rescue an hour later. But there were paramedics on board, not police. Nobody handcuffed or tied him down. When we got to the St.

Bartholomew’s Hospital, which was overwhelmed with victims of the sinkholes, he disappeared.

But, you’ll be relieved to know, Chesterfield’s cat Lenore was there at the hospital waiting for him. She had been left at the office of Nahid Paris, Parvin’s sister, who ran the IT department from the basement of the hospital. I actually got to meet this woman, because I was sent down to her office to fetch the cat while the two agents engaged in a top-secret debriefing with their boss Miss Equitone.

I had assumed she would be a Muslim, like her brother seemed to be. So I was surprised to find a sign on Nahid’s bulletin board showing a diamond shape, like the Superman logo, with crossed lines on it forming seven facets on the crown (just like the one on the QAPHQA sign). Inside of these facets were six eyes, with the one in the center filled with text from the Bible. It was Zechariah 3:9, describing a stone with not six, but seven eyes: For behold the stone that I have laid before Joshua; upon one stone shall be seven eyes: behold, I will engrave the graving thereof, saith the Lord of hosts, and I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day.

FOR BEHOLD, ON THE STONE THAT I HAVE SET BEFORE JOSHUA, ON A SINGLE STONE WITH SEVEN EYES, I WILL ENGRAVE ITS INSCRIPTION, DECLARES THE LORD OF HOSTS, AND I WILL REMOVE

THIS LAND
in a single day.
ZECHARIAH

I assume the cosmic purpose for the poster being there was for me to see it, at the moment which I did, so that I would be reminded yet again how perfectly every little bit of reality has been arranged for us.

Lenore scratched Chesterfield as soon as she saw him, which was probably the worst injury he endured through this entire ordeal, strangely enough. There was no trace of the neck incisions, and no sign of spinal fluid loss, on either Chesterfield or Paris by the time doctors examined them. My ankles seemed as good as new. You could not tell, even on an x-ray, that they had ever been cut, or that the bones had been broken. These are among the many mysteries from this episode which remains unsolved.

There is still one mystery in particular that I often ponder, though: If Rosenberg had managed to escape to the hyperuranian realm, as he had planned, what would have happened to the rest of us? On the one hand, it seemed like we were in danger of existential collapse. At the same time, he seemed to speak of enslaving us, using us all as a source of sustenance for those on the other side, and as collateral for making deals with them.

Would that have been possible if the realm above had crashed down on us, after the mysterious “Pillars of Heaven” fell? You might think we’d all be dead, and our universe snuffed out. In once sense, yes, certainly. But now I realize that everything beneath our feet is a foundation provided by the past, keeping us from sinking into the depths of chaos.

Our ancestors from forgotten aeons provide a valuable service, holding us up on their shoulders, bearing the burden of the present. If the pillars fell, then we would become the new foundation for the future, holding up the new aeon on our backs, like slaves. Then just like the Titans before us, some of us would be fated to serve in the role of Atlas as the pillars of the new heaven. It might even be that most of those who populated the new realm wouldn't even realize that we were doing this for them, because they would think of us as dead, or even worse, as simply mythical. Maybe that has already happened to us, and neither we, nor those exploiting us from above, are aware of it.

A good parallel is the story of Atlantis, which is at once described by myth-tellers as a fallen "city," and also as a representation of an entire fallen aeon. Its name derives from that of its fabled foundational king, a guy named Atlas, said to be a son of Poseidon. Now, he just happens to have the same name as the Titan from the Golden Age who was enslaved by Zeus after the Olympian revolution, thereafter burdened with the obligation to eternally uphold the sky. This is a clue that the fallen aeon symbolized by Atlantis had its own Pillars of Heaven, represented in Plato's tale by the two pillars of the Temple of Poseidon said to be in the city's center.

When Atlantis fell, these pillars collapsed (and who knows if one caused the other, or if there was another cause common to both events). Everything was submerged into the waters of Chaos, becoming mire, which eventually solidified and was used as the foundation for the aeon that came afterwards. In my mind, the story really represents the fall of the Golden Age, when the Titans were imprisoned beneath the Earth, and made to serve as the foundation of the realm above them.

It's quite possible that Rosenberg himself is the only person who knew fully what he was up to. His minions didn't, and the self-appointed geniuses of esoteric statecraft—the Worshipful Society of Butchers—certainly didn't. Perhaps Consivia knew. Maybe she killed herself in front of her congregation during Easter Mass because the truth was too horrible, knowing that all of those murders and rapes were for nothing. I imagine that, after being kidnapped, castrated, and then raped repeatedly throughout her youth, she had to cling desperately to Rosenberg's vision of escape from the Earthly prison, and conquering the realm of the godhead above, in order to live with what she'd been through. It certainly wasn't depression from Gender Identity Disorder, as the press office of her parish claimed, that made her disembowel herself with an ancient ceremonial harpe just after raising the Eucharist host up to the light of the three suns shining through the crucifix on the stained glass window behind the altar.

While we were in the helicopter, just before he disappeared again, I asked Leopold if he had known Consivia before, since he had called himself the "Baron of Alphamstone," while she had been living and working there for years. He didn't really answer.

"She had an axe to grind against the Butchers and Barber-Surgeons," he replied. "The Stockholm Syndrome didn't prevent her from feeling resentment towards those who had helped the Comprachicos destroy her body." Then he closed his eyes, shook his head, and fell silent for the rest of the ride.

Comprachicos is a Spanish word, coined by Victor Hugo, for gangs that steal and mutilate children, then use them as freak performers or panhandlers, emphasizing their (deliberately-created) disabilities to elicit donations. I presume Leopold used this term to refer to those who had arranged for the boy to be kidnapped from Piccadilly Circus and castrated in 1956, turning him into the sad, frightened girl we saw in the Easter dress in the second half of Easter Sunday April Fool—the poor waif who grew up to be the Bishop of London.

I had a revelation regarding Consivia when I entered Nahid's office at the hospital. She was wearing large red headphones when I came in, which she took off immediately. I heard the song "Dear Prudence" bleeding faintly out of the headphones as they sat on her desk. I remembered that one of the interpretations of the name of the goddess Metis was "prudence" (along with "cunning" and "wisdom.")

This made me think again about my idea that Metis, Rhea and Gaia were all the same figure: a goddess who kept helping her son plot against their father, only to marry the son afterwards and start the process over again in the next generation. Then I thought about how Metis was prophesied to produce an heir that would overthrow Zeus. But the only child they are known to have made together was Athena, while the figure who seems to have actually taken over the role as king of the gods was Jesus, as I mentioned before. The ancient writings claiming that “Apollo” was his first-born son and therefore successor are hinting that the Greeks knew this was coming. The Romans, with their numerous solar cults popular at the decline of the empire, were the ones to usher it in, as I stated previously.

When I got the chance, I researched the word “Opiconsivia.” A specific entry had been made for this term in Wikipedia sometime the previous year. It had not been there a few months earlier, when I was trying to help the man I hired to translate Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum figure out the meaning of the word consivia, which he did not at first know what to make of.

But now there was an entry for this word, where it was said to be the name of a pair of festivals for the goddess Ops (the Roman name for Rhea, the wife of Saturn), held on August 25 and also on December 19, two days after the commencement of Saturnalia. The first Opiconsivia took place right after the August 21 planting festival for Saturn, called “Consualia,” which was named after the god’s alternate title of “Consus.” I noted mentally that August 21 had been the date of the solar eclipse the previous year, and wondered what role that had played in the symbolism of Rosenberg’s Mithras cult.

They probably had a very special orgy in the mithraeum that day, I thought.

The name “Ops” means “plenty” and consivia, as I stated before, means “to sow.” Mythology experts claim that she was first associated with planting and harvesting. This connected her to the earth in the minds of the ancients, and everything that was thought to be under it. This is how she became a symbol of the underworld and mineral wealth also, they say, just like Saturn, whose name is connected to satur ("full, rich") and saturitas ("abundance, satiety"). Thus, Saturn and Ops have a lot in common with the king and queen of Hell, Pluto (the Roman Hades) and Proserpina (the Roman Persephone). Interestingly, a minor character in the Roman Catholic canon is St. Satur, who I think is quite possibly an iconotropic cover for Saturn, and whose feast day is on March 26.

After learning about Opiconsivia, I understood that I was right about the goddess who had given birth to each new king of the gods in each aeon, and protected him from the wrath of his father.

Is he always the 'sun god,' I wondered, or is that just the language we use for the concept now, because the Sun is the king of the gods now?

I still don't know the answer. But meditating upon the meaning of the lyrics to "Dear Prudence" once again, I realized that it's a song about Metis emerging from the body of Zeus for the first time in at least an aeon, possibly two, at the dawning of a new one. It's about the old world order being subsumed by the birth of the next. I believe that's what I witnessed taking place, both in the rituals at Bucklersbury, and in the sky's firmament.

I also thought again about the words in the Sator Square. "Sator," as I stated before, is Saturn, "the sewer," "the begetter," "the father." "Arepo," it occurs to me now, might well stand for "Harpo," another name for Eros, a.k.a.

Cupid, the child of Aphrodite. "Tenet, we know, means "to hold." "Rotas," like I said, means "wheels," and has always been combined with "Opera" ("work") when interpreting the formula. So it is commonly rendered "Saturn and Arepo hold and work the wheels," although my "Eros" interpretation for "Arepo" could render it "the Sewer of Love works the wheels," or some combination of the various conjugations of those words.

But "opera" could also refer specifically to Saturn's partner, Ops, "the planter," and some kind of "work" that she did with him involving these wheels." I think there may be some connection with what William Blake referred to as the "Starry Wheels, Which revolve heavily in the mighty Void above the Furnaces" in his poem Jerusalem. This poem was obviously very important to Rosenberg when composing the rituals, for reasons that I will explain shortly. It was quoted repeatedly at the end of the New Court ritual, and I recall being inspired by the voice of Chronos in my head to mention "Starry Wheels" in regards to the carriage ride in the New Court ceremonies. I figure the "wheels" are the invisible controls that move the celestial bodies above us.

I know that not everyone in the world had the same experience of the signs in the heavens that Easter weekend. In fact, the only witnesses to these events appear to be the people who were in the square mile of the City of London at the time. There really weren't very many people in the business district on a holiday weekend. Even among those who were there, most of those who have survived claim not to have seen the events in the sky. This was because, for some reason, almost all of them spent an inordinate amount of time sleeping that weekend.

They only woke up when the earthquakes and the sinkhole formation jolted them.

The few who were awake and watching the skies in the City of London during this time saw the Moon grow large on Friday night at sunset. If they kept watching, they then saw the six colored balls of light gather around the Moon from various directions, just as I saw out the window of the Sky Box at New Court.

Shortly after this, witnesses experienced what seemed like a "shockwave" that went through the air, and "sonic boom" heard at the same time. But no recordings or measurements taken corroborate this.

These people generally report that at first the light balls looked like planets usually do when you catch a rare glimpse of one making itself visible to light-polluted London. But because of the way in which they appeared from out of nowhere, and because of their subsequent inexplicable behavior, they can only be categorized as UFOs. Besides, there was no conjunction of planets scheduled on any ephemeris that night.

Many things were witnessed next that I didn’t get to see myself because I was inside the mithraeum at the time. Around 8 pm, about a half-hour after sunset, people saw the Moon emit a beam of blueish-white light directly into the Thames for a few seconds. Those who were on the waterfront on the north side of the river from Temple to the Tower of London, as well as those driving along the Blackfriars and London bridges, saw the beam drop down into the water between the Millennium and Southwark bridges.

The beam was wider at its source and got narrower towards the bottom.

Some people say it almost looked like the Moon was being projected in the sky from a beam of light on Earth. This of course gave fodder to people who believe that everything in the sky is a holographic projection. They have videos on YouTube claiming that everything that was seen in the sky from London over the weekend was a “glitch in the Matrix.”

This is fitting, for after his death, it was revealed that Rosenberg was the leader of secret syndicate of “tech billionaires” who had been the subject of news stories two years earlier, without being named at the time. The articles, published simultaneously by several news outlets, claimed the syndicate’s members were convinced that our reality was just a computer simulation run from somewhere else. They were supposedly funding research projects to “find a way out of the Matrix.” The Atlantic’s headline at least properly stated that the businessmen’s goal was to “Destroy the Universe.” But they didn’t mention that the methods would involve alchemy, rape, murder, and black magic, or that only a few members of Earth’s population were slated to make it out safely to the other side.

At about 8:30, witnesses report that one of the spheres next to the Moon grew larger. It was the pinkish-white one, which, they say, initially looked like the Evening Star, but wasn't in Venus' proper location. People then describe a glowing stream of something pouring out of it like water into that same spot in the Thames, appearing pink like moonlight. They also saw a small red dot form in the center of the Moon at about 9 o'clock.

The next sphere to enlarge and pour forth its essence into the river, at about 9:15, was the orange-red star, which took on a fiery appearance as it grew.

It shot forth what looked like a flame into the Thames. Approximately forty-five minutes after that, the pink orb plunged from the sky all of the sudden, landing at the same spot in the river, leaving ripples in its wake. Following that, the orange-red fireball also fell from the sky, smoking as it came down. Because this took place shortly after the war drama created by the torpedoing of the Russian submarine in the Straight of Dover—for which we still have no explanation—some observers thought it was a missile attack. Others thought it was a meteor. Luckily, tensions did not escalate further, and the incident was smoothed over in the coming days, as you know.

Next, around 11:00, about the time that our hastily-arranged ceremony on the rooftop terrace of New Court began, people saw the whole arrangement of Moon and stars eclipsed by dark clouds, just as we experienced. Then they saw the purple orb peaking through, now enormous in the sky and hovering directly above the City. It emitted a lightning bolt, which, people said, must have hit one of the office buildings.

A few minutes later, those present report, the purple orb let down a yellow rope of some sort, which hung for a moment between the orb and the River Thames, before detaching and dropping down into the same spot in the water that the other orbs and their emissions had dropped into.

At about 11:15, the Moon and one of the strange lights next to it reappeared from the clouds. The greatest detail about this part comes from a homeless man named "Slow Henry," interviewed in a popular YouTube video, who stood on Blackfriars Bridge for two days watching the show. Next, he says, one of lights seemed to grow to the exact same size as the Moon in seconds. It looked just like the Sun, except that it did not light up the Earth or the sky at all.

Slow Henry reports that the sun-like object pulsated for a while, and then merged halfway with the Moon for a few minutes. He specified that the Moon still had one large red dot in the middle of its face before this merger. According to Henry, the yellow orb actually changed the color of the portion of the Moon that it merged with during the union, including that of the red dot. Afterwards, when they separated, the Moon’s original red dot had grown even larger, and a new, smaller one just like it had begun to form right beside it.

Shortly after that, the purple orb also merged with the Moon, just briefly.

Afterwards, the larger red splotch in the middle had gotten bigger still. Then the purple orb drooped beneath the others, finally plummeting down moments later into the same area of the Thames as the others. This is estimated to have occurred at 11:30. According to other witnesses who were closer to the area of impact, the purple orb appeared much larger in size then the previous light balls, and made a more noticeable splash when it touched down.

About five minutes later, say observers, an indigo-colored laser beam came down from out of nowhere in the sky (or at least from no visible source). It shot down into the Thames, and a black sphere was seen descending upon it, becoming smaller along the way. Then at approximately 11:45, the Moon was half-eclipsed, very briefly. Afterwards, the largest red circle inside was noted to be even larger, and it grew bigger as people watched.

The Moon changed even more over the next quarter of an hour, witnesses say. It became dark red all over, fading to black at the edges, and the red spots that were there before now became distinguished by their bright glow. A third red glowing spot, smaller than the others, formed within it also. At about midnight, all of the dark clouds that had enveloped the City of London alone suddenly dissipated.

Next, a flying carriage with four horses was seen by some crossing the sky, which one might associate with Santa Claus had it been Christmas. But on this occasion, people who saw it thought only of the Four Horsemen of St. John’s Revelation. Of course, each horse in that story is supposed to be ridden by an angel, and not tied with a team to a small scythed chariot. However, classical education has been absent from British schools for decades. Nobody knows Greek or Roman myths anymore. In fact, I’m surprised Britons even recognize anything from the Bible.

Only Slow Henry saw both the flying chariot and the movements of the Moon and sun-like object that mirrored it. Only he saw the yellow orb actually slip behind the Moon and become covered by it, invisible. Only he sat up and watched all night as it remained motionless in the sky, until dawn the next morning. Then, he says, the sun-like object came back and replaced it, covering the Moon with itself, while the thing Henry took to be the “real Sun” rose in the East as expected.

I told you that a sleepy comatose state came over the City’s population from late Friday night until dawn Easter morning. This episode is now referred to by your prostitute news media with the cutesy nickname “the London Fog” to keep you from taking it seriously. Because of the Fog, there are only a handful of witnesses who observed the various states of the Moon over the weekend.

There are quite a few people who say they saw the strange lights next to the Moon at sunset on Friday night. But then, inexplicably, many of the people who had been watching this spectacular display in the sky decided to go to bed quite early. Those who had fallen into the trance of “the Fog” then dragged themselves groggily through the next day and night, not recalling the events of Friday until those of Sunday morning shook them out of their stupor.

Later, these people were kicking themselves for not looking up even once on Saturday. Those who were affected by the Fog can’t even remember what they spent their time doing that day. It was only from the vigilant few who not only remained watchful at the time, but had the courage to testify in public afterwards, that some of the sleepers have learned about what they missed.

According to Slow Henry, the sun-like object remained at the sky’s meridian, motionless, all day, while the “real Sun” rose and set. Then at nightfall, the bloody red Moon with the three bright red spots came back, covering the sun-like object again. It just came over it, “like a coin being turned over,” he said. The Moon was suddenly there at the top of the sky, and remained motionless in place throughout the night. Then early on Sunday morning, while it was still dark, the Moon started turning bright violet throughout.

He didn’t have proof, like I had seen, that it was acting as a filter for something inside that was putting out strong UV light. But he did instinctively compare the way it looked, the light that came from it, and the way it made things appear—so that “the whole City looked like a discotheque”—to the characteristics of a blacklight. Assholes on YouTube, trolling the video where Henry is interviewed, keep saying that the Moon doesn’t put out its own light.

They don’t know what the Moon even is. Nobody does.

Attempts to come up with “scientific” explanations for the things that people saw that night are extremely insulting. Several commentators have mentioned that none less than Sir William Herschel himself, discoverer of the planet Uranus, witnessed three glowing red spots on the Moon on April 19, 1787.

Around the same time, something described as an “aurora borealis” (in other words, a green light in the sky) was observed simultaneously by the people of Padua, Italy, quite far from where such phenomena are usually observed, in the Arctic Circle. Shortly afterwards, there was a huge spike in the number of sunspots recorded.

It seems to me that Herschel witnessed something similar to what we in the City of London saw on Easter weekend 2018. Nonetheless, the same lame explanation of lunar “outgassing” has been given for both events by the incredulous scientific community. As usual, they have no respect for the intelligence of the observer when it comes to things they cannot explain.

Most unexplainable of all from the morning of Easter 2018 was the hole that opened up in the sky later that morning, just before dawn. As Slow Henry describes it, sun-like object at the zenith of the firmament disappeared through a circular window that opened up behind it, revealing an indigo field studded with stars—a bizarre sight in full daylight. Then the entire window became a solid bright green color, which shined down on everything below. At that exact moment, the first earthquake took place.

The hole stayed open, and the green light continued to shine down, for another twenty minutes, illuminating things that witnesses wish they had never seen. It stayed open even as the Sun began to rise in the East, blurring out the ghastly visions somewhat. Then the window turned indigo and star-studded once again, and a few minutes later, a black sphere fell out of it, into the Thames.

This is according to both Slow Henry, and also "Phicus," a YouTube user who filmed much of Sunday morning's events from the viewing platform at an office building known as "the Shard." The video confirms a lot of what both men described, although much of it is also open to interpretation. Slow Henry didn't see the rest because he was on his knees praying. And when he got up again, after he was all over, he couldn't see anything anymore. The Hyperuranian light had blinded him.

Unlike me in Rosenberg's basement, Slow Henry didn't have a magical diamond keystone plugging up the hole in the sky, protecting him from the Hyperuranian rays whilst refracting the light and allowing him to see by them. So the horrible sights they showed him were the last things he ever got to see. But this is, in fact, what the Masonic keystone represents. It is a stone that does just this: acting simultaneously as a deck prism and as a protective light filter. It is because it provides protection that it was represented as a "buckler" or a shield in Rothschild heraldry.

This is why it’s so often represented on Masonic tracing boards in the arch of the sky, between the Sun and the Moon, forming a third, and higher, source of light. It’s a window that plugs up the hole, allowing the transcosmic God to see you, and perhaps for you to see him as well. This is why the Masons also represent the same concept with an eye in a triangle, sun-like rays often streaming out of it, like a prism refracting light. Also used interchangeably with these symbols, or in combination with them, is the letter G, the seventh letter of the alphabet—which I believe stands for the Gamma ray, as I mentioned before.

These Masonic images amply demonstrate that my interpretation is correct.

The two aftershocks that followed the first earthquake, as Phicus documented, each coincided with the events in the sky that took place next. The first, was accompanied by another “shockwave” and “sonic boom,” similar to that of Friday night at sundown, but louder. This happened right after two naked children riding a flying white horse through the air.

The second aftershock occurred at the same time as the solar polarity flip and the formation of the sinkhole. As the Phicus video shows, this coincided with the re-emergence of the sun-like object from the portal, followed by an egg-white globe of equal size that came out right behind it. This is what formed the triangle of circles—yellow, white and star-flecked indigo—that I saw in the sky when the ceiling collapsed, just before I blacked out.

As I witnessed myself, the all three circles then turned yellow for a few moments. Then they sort of “rolled together” into one yellow orb, which immediately started “bleeding” into the Thames. A few seconds later, the yellow orb itself fell straight down into the river, revealing the indigo star-flecked circle just behind it. Scariest of all was what happened right afterwards, when that indigo circle, which had previously seemed to be an open window—a portal—then rolled up to the top like an eyelid, revealing a gigantic eye behind it. This eye then eerily blinked twice before it closed for good an instant later.

I think that the yellow orb bled and descended when the body of Baron Carrickfergus finally died. As I shall explain shortly, I have surmised that his body was devoured by the trinacria as they both floated away down the Thames a few minutes after the sinkhole formed. But by then, the trinacria had already consumed another creature and taken on another transformation, which I will soon describe.

It is my belief that the trinacria was possessed by the spirit of Chronos/Saturn. Plutarch wrote that the former king of the Golden Age was buried somewhere beneath the British Isles, in a death-like sleep in a tomb that is also his prison. He was kept alive by birds, who brought his ambrosia to eat as he slept, and with his dreams he communicated to his followers on the surface of the Earth. I think Rosenberg was one such follower, and that those ravens in the Tower of London were the ones feeding Chronos, somehow. When Rosenberg had them killed, it released his spirit into the body of a waiting golem that Rosenberg had prepared.

Plutarch wrote that the tomb of Chronos is guarded by someone named “Briareus.” This, we know from other sources, is the name of one of the Titans selected to serve as a guard all the others imprisoned in Tartarus. So Plutarch was saying that somewhere beneath the British Isles is the location of Hell, which is also the womb of the Earth goddess that Chronos had to chop his way out of so that he and his siblings could be born.

I recently discovered, while writing down these memories, that Man Ray-- the surrealist artist whose cover illustration for Marquis de Sade’s 120 Days of Sodom was reproduced for Rosenberg’s invocation of Venus in the mithraeum—was once commissioned to make a poster for the London Underground (the subway system) in which he made the system’s logo appear to resemble the planet Saturn.

I wonder if he was aware of the myth of Chronos being buried underneath Britain, or if one of the people in charge of hiring him suggested it. In my mind, the symbolism of both Man Ray pieces can be connected. The 120 Days illustration was an inverted Christian cross superimposed over the buttocks of a young man. Saturn is specifically associated with sodomy, as the root words connected to his name attest.

Satu means “sewing,” referring to planting seeds in the earth, just as Saturn’s title sator means sower. His epithet S terculius comes from stercus, meaning "dung." The English word "sod," referring to earth covered with grass, may come from this connection in Latin between feces and agricultural fertilizer.

It's also probably no coincidence that in Britain the word "sod" is a slang term for

"sodomite," or that the inhabitants of Sodom were known to be haughty because of their vast mineral wealth, which the subterranean Saturn (imprisoned in Tartarus) was thought to be the ruler of. Vulgar words for feces are often used colloquially to refer to gold, money or treasure in cultures around the world, probably because of the traditional connection between these things and the underworld. The Etruscans called Saturn Satre, and said that he "hurls his lightning from his abode deep in the earth."

It seems pretty clear to me that the entrance to the infernal prison of Chronos was right there at Bucklersbury. But I don't think Chronos is there anymore. I think he safely floated away down the Thames, contained in the diamond inside of the trinacria.

The creature was actually spotted by witnesses who were standing on the waterfront next to the Traitor's Gate of the Tower of London. They were there to participate in a recreation of a historic April Fool's joke: "the Washing of the Lions." In centuries past, the joke was simply to invite people to attend this oddly-titled "annual event" at the Tower of London. The victim would then arrive at the Tower and find nothing going on.

So when something called "the Washing of the Lions" was announced in the "Festivals & Events" section of the Sunday Telegraph on Palm Sunday, slated to take place at dawn on Easter morning at the Tower of London, everyone knew it was going to be a joke. Most of those who were standing there that day were aware of the history of the prank and were waiting to see how it would be improved upon from previous performances.

Each one of them, when interviewed individually, reported being confused about the location of the Sun that morning while traveling to the event, but nobody spent much time analyzing it. Therefore, when these people felt the earthquake, and finally looked up to see the amazing sights in the sky, they at first tried to convince each other that it was somehow part of the show.

“I thought they were using holographic technology and sound effects,” said one person to reporters. “You never think there’s going to be an earthquake in London.”

Therefore, when guards from the Tower, dressed in full regalia, came out with a lion on a leash, everyone present felt even more certain that they were merely watching an elaborate April Fool’s hoax. I am surprised that the event was still scheduled to proceed, considering what had already happened to the ravens of the Tower. But that had already been completely covered up, as it continues to be, by the government.

Then the animal did something that could only, under these precise circumstances, be taken by the audience as part of the show. It hissed, growled, and lurched out of its handler’s grasp. Then it dove head-first into the water like it was completely mad.

But it wasn’t. It was defending itself against something that it felt threatened by. Those watching said they saw the lion attack a creature with “three human legs and a demonic glowing red face” that was floating in the water. As soon as the lion and the monster made contact with each other, the front end of the lion began to “dissolve into” the body of the hellish beast, until it was completely gone. Then, observers say, they noticed that the creature had taken on some of the features of the lion’s face, including its large teeth, as well as its mane.

Next, floating down the river from behind the creature came another horrific site: a naked white male, seemingly deceased. As soon as the monster saw it, he lurched forward and devoured it. It was then that the bleeding sun fell into the river, right before the eyes of the people watching the monster’s attack.

After it had finished devouring the guts, the monster snarled at the people watching him from the shore, and swam away.

Officials admit that this was the body of Baron Carrickfergus, though they deny he was attacked by anything other than a lion. However, they don’t even attempt to explain why a lion would jump into a river to attack a person who was reportedly either already dead, or almost dead.

I know that the trinacria made it all the way out to the Thames Estuary, where the river empties out into the North Sea. There, witnesses spotted a “ruby-colored crystal” rise out of water and into the sky, where it took the form of a red star with seven rays. From the tips of these rays then appeared seven stars of different colors. All of these objects seemed to come from the center of the ruby mother star except for one, which shined with a light that appeared to be constantly changing color. This one seemed to have come from the south, as if attracted to the end of one of the rays of light by an unseen force.

Once assembled, the entire arrangement of lights began spinning counterclockwise to the cheers of the crowds assembled on the shore. Then, all of the other stars lowered themselves beneath the one in the center. After that, the red star and its entourage shot off further out to sea, then took a turn southwest.

They floated past the White Cliffs of Dover, the last place they were seen.

It wasn’t until after this adventure was over that I learned about William Blake’s mystical “prophetic” poetry on the topic of London. To him, writing during the Industrial Revolution, London was a sort of microcosm of the universe, and analogous, or even truly identical to “Jerusalem,” which he likewise interpreted as a transcendental, non-local place. At the same time, it still was his own contemporary London, possessing all the same monuments and street names. His own pet name for this primordial London-Jerusalem city was "Golgonooza," a word unique to his vocabulary.

William Blake saw this city as the first created space, out from which creation radiated as it came into being at the beginning of time. This would make it analogous to the "Even Ha-Shitiyah," the "foundation stone" of creation in in the real, terrestrial Jerusalem that I mentioned earlier. This object is located in the Dome of the Rock, which the Knights Templar maintained as their official headquarters during their day. As I said, this stone was replicated for the altar of the St. Stephen Walbrook church, which Rosenberg "borrowed" for use in his mithraeum during his sick rituals.

Even Ha-Shitiyah

If a "foundation stone" was the point of origin for everything, then it follows that all the dimensions of space should be measured from there. Thus it should be used in the same manner as the Roman millarium stones, which is what many think was the purpose of the London Stone. This would explain why Queen John Dee thought the artifact was magical, and moved his residence to Cannon Street to be near it.

In William Blake's poems, London/Jerusalem/Golgonooza was not just a city, but also a living being. It was at once the female sex partner and the "emanation" of a more all-encompassing being called "Albion," an ancient name applied to the British Isles. Blake's Albion has everything in common with Chronos, as even Wikipedia acknowledges.

Perhaps the diamond we found within it is the actual "foundation stone."

Maybe it contained the damned and imprisoned soul of Albion/Chronos/Saturn. If so, I think he has been set free now, the consequences of which I cannot predict.

It may be that the burden of holding up the worlds has now fallen on the shoulders of the ambitious Mr. Rosenberg. In that sense we can say that he achieved a bit of the universal importance he strove for.

Since the spectacular events of Easter morning, the people in the City of London have only seen one sun in the sky, and one moon at night, just like everyone else in the world. The stars have returned to normal as well—or at least, that's how people perceive it.

I tend to think that a new normal has been established, and we simply don't remember that things used to be different. We are under the order of a new Sun, but we don't realize it. We think it has always been this way.

It's no shock to me that almost no one has suggested the signs in the heavens seen in the City foretold the birth of a messiah. The rumor mill only manufactures paranoia and hate. Nobody ever tells you that anything good will happen, unless they're trying to sell you something.

According to the Royal Observatory in Greenwich, the only thing unusual that happened in space that day was an inordinate amount of sunspot activity which hadn't been predicted. They admit that the Sun's polarity flipped just before the earthquake and the sinkhole occurred. A few experts have been allowed to hint that there could be a connection between the two events, but always with the caveat that it was far too complex for anyone to ever understand and therefore not worth the effort. They also admit that the tides on the Thames Friday and Saturday night were "a bit wobbly," but can't say why.

The connection between the solar anomalies and the widespread sporadic interruption of electronic communications throughout the weekend has not been denied. Nor is it denied that this contributed to slowing the spread of information regarding the sudden shift that was occurring on the precious metal markets.

As you all know, when France pulled out of the Eurozone it caused a run on gold, starting late Friday night. That night at the party, Marcia Martina and her son Philip were quite satisfied with themselves. Of course, the Rothschilds had been among the world’s largest gold-holders for centuries, despite a misleading headline published in The Telegraph in 2004: “Rothschild to pull out of gold market after 200 years.” More recently, they had been calling in huge quantities, and tightening their purses.

In the previous two months, the price of gold had gone up considerably because of this hoarding. It was all part of tightening the screws on the central banks, particularly in the West, as Ms. Martina had explained to us. This was payback, punishment, and reigning-in after decades of poor fiscal governance.

Because of this, it had become increasingly difficult for governments to sell bonds. It was also difficult to obtain gold as a back-up reserve. The states of the Western world were inarguably at the mercy of the moneylenders, and this one family in particular. This was because they controlled such a large share of the market, and they had decided to collude to bring about this crisis.

The night of the crash, we all assumed that a major shift in wealth had happened to dramatically concentrate it even more amongst the so-called “one percent.” Rosenberg’s own newspaper ran with the headline “Gold sky high, silver to the Moon.” But nobody knew that Rosenberg’s people had just suddenly dumped trillions of dollars worth of gold and silver on the market. As you know, gold went from being the 72nd most common element to the 65th, taking the place formerly held by silver. The simultaneous silver dump bumped that metal down to 50 on the list.

It wasn’t until Monday morning EST, however, that people took full account of this in the financial news media. The market was already presented with the difficulty that both the place where the gold prices were fixed each day—the London Bullion Market—and the place where the pound was issued—the Bank of England—had both fallen into the sinkhole. Aggravating the delay of the reaction was the fact that this specialty of journalism had already been crippled by the destruction of the main offices of both Rosenberg network and the Financial Times. Then there was the issue of the Niptron Terminal hacks, involving the so called “CAPUT 58 virus,” which caused every single one of the machines to freeze up on the traders at 10:30 AM GMT.

Simply put, a pop-up window opened on their screens demanding the solution to a riddle involving computer-generated three-dimensional image of a diamond shape with 58 facets (by inference, a “head” with 58 “faces”) encoded with an 8-character set of symbols referred to by the virus program as “the OPERANTS” (the seven planetary sigils, plus John Dee’s Monad symbol). Infected terminals were also presented with what purported to be a key: a five-by-five Latin square image cipher. By the time security experts figured out a way around the challenge, it was too late to save anybody’s bets.

It was only after reading about the details of the virus that I figured out the meaning of the term “PROTEANS” that had been used on the bottle with the Liquor Amnii that saved my feet (an anagrams of OPERANTS). It is a reference to the Ogdoad of eight archons. These are the seven planets, plus a transcended twin of Mercury, who is also the goddess Sophia-Achamoth—Metis or Mete, the Great Mother, “Dear Prudence.”

They are represented by the eight characters used in the Sator Square, with three different magnitudes of use, representing three different levels of divine power. T, R, E, O, and A are used four times each, representing the five wandering planets. P and S are only used two times each. They represent the higher powers of the Sun and Moon. N is the letter in the center of the square, and it is only used once. It represents a god-power transcending the others, but one which is mutable and open to interpretation, like Proteus of Greek mythology, and like quicksilver, corresponding to the Philosopher’s Mercury, the Universal Solvent. By dissolving, separating, and re-coagulating the essences of the gods themselves, any imaginable change is possible, including chemical changes otherwise not allowed.

When it was discovered that the total global quantity of gold had suddenly increased drastically over the weekend, there were many theories introduced by the experts on the news. First, of course, was to suspect counterfeiting, and so all the vaults forced to assay their gold holdings, to the embarrassment of all the companies involved. As we all saw, none of them had the physical reserves they had claimed prior to the dump. All of them had been committing fraud, as had all of the world's governments, with the full knowledge and collusion of all of the world's banks. This, analysts say, is what really destroyed Barclays Bank when its stock price evaporated on April 2.

We all remember Rosenberg's crazy rant that Black Friday evening, during an interview on his own TV network, Skyped live from his office right there at Rosenberg Plaza. I didn't get to see it at the time, as I was walking with Chesterfield to New Court to meet Rosenberg and his friends for dinner. But of course I saw the highlights, endlessly replayed on the news for weeks.

There, to an interviewer who was utterly confused, he declared that the

"the 'so-called' noble metals of the old plutocracy" would soon be "dethroned like the noble families of old Europe had been dethroned by money." He then announced his vision for a new system of wealth and power distribution based on the value of the human body: its parts, the fluids it produces, and its "perceived value" (to which he added finger quotes) as an "object of affection."

It was so bizarre, commentators on his own network said that they actually thought he was drunk. In a way, they were right. He was drunk on the blood and suffering of innocents.

The conspiracy crowd claimed the sinkholes were the result of a "false flag attack," a Jewish plot to consolidate their wealth. Furthermore, they said, the earthquakes, sinkhole, solar activity, and orbs in the sky were all caused by weather modification technology, they purported distracting investors from the coming changes in the gold and silver markets. Why? Because when the price of gold, the value of paper, and credibility of credit collapsed simultaneously overnight, the jig was up. Time to cover your tracks and run away to your private islands, right?

But the source of this crowd’s real complaint had also been eliminated. The “anti-Zionist” movement against “Jewish banksters” lost its raison d'être. Because as it turns out, nobody really cares about Israel one way or the other, except for a few freaks, and most cannot tell a Jew apart from a gentile unless they are told what’s what. The thing that really bothered these people the most was the vast amount of money, gold, and property—a large portion of the Earth’s entire treasure—locked up in the hands of one family, who had then successfully managed to deflect attention away from themselves.

Many historians had falsely claimed that the Rothschilds had waned in wealth and influence, but the exact opposite is true. Those who knew this, or felt that they knew it, had been frothing at the mouth for decades, trying to “wake up the sheeple” to the truth. Now, although this truth had been covered up even more completely with the collapse of New Court into the Bucklersbury sinkhole, the problem was gone as well.

The Rothschild fortune has essentially been obliterated. The membership of their incestuous clan has been decimated, in the classical sense of the word (one out of ten gone, not nine, as the common modern misnomer implies). Moreover, it was the older, more corrupt ten percent that was killed, as many of the tribe elders were asleep in the New Court building at the time of the collapse, having gathered there Friday night for a week-long Passover celebration.

But that very night, they lost the value of all their money, though at the time they thought they had just made a killing. The properties they owned lost value as well, and, of course, their most important piece of real estate: their London headquarters, which fell down into its proper final resting place in the depths of Hell.

They even lost their pet project, the Bank of England. For it’s not just the building that has disappeared, but the whole institution as well. At the present writing, it looks like it will soon be shut down in favor of the new solutions currently being proposed in the House of Commons. It’s a humiliating defeat for a once all-powerful dynasty. Those Rothschilds who are left will probably change their names again within a generation, and be entirely forgotten by their descendants.

On a related note, it is interesting to consider that that the Superman character is broadly considered by media experts to be a representation of Jewish identity. As I learned in college from a Jewish film history professor who lived in New York City, the Superman character was literally created to represent Jewish immigrants from Europe who were hiding in plain sight in the entertainment industry by using Westernized names, just like Superman hides behind the persona of Clark Kent. Now here’s another amazing coincidence to keep in mind: It is known that the character of Lois Lane, Clark Kent’s girlfriend, is based on a girl that Superman’s creator, Jerry Siegel, had a crush on in high school in Cleveland.

Her name was Lois Rothschild.

None of the articles written on this subject say she’s related to the banking family. But even if this is just a coincidence, I sense that it points to something significant, as coincidences often do.

As for the future of the “Hyperuranium,” the new element that was discovered at the bottom of the sinkhole (along with considerable amounts of platinum), it could be the foundation stone of a new Golden Age. I think it was probably created naturally somehow when the sinkhole formed, transmuted from the gold, silver, and other precious metals and gems that were present in the underground vaults of the Bank of England. But I fear that it will be monopolized and controlled like gold has been. I also think it’s very likely that new war technologies will result from the research and development with it that is to come. In other words, I think it will only serve to further enslave us.

The presence of a lump of it in my pocket, along with a note from Leopold, discovered when I got to the hospital, just after he disappeared, is another miracle that I cannot explain. The note came with a phone number, and instructed me to contact Harut Al-Hazrat, a broker, who, it said, could help me sell the piece of metal. I don’t know if it was a blessing or a curse.

On the one hand, the sale did bring a tidy sum, which has eliminated my financial problems for the time being. On the other hand, just before I gave it over to the broker, I did an experiment with it in which I rubbed it across the skin between my eyes. Ever since, my clairvoyant powers have been dramatically increased, which is sometimes a problem now. Some things you just don’t want to see.

It is mind-bending to try to grasp the reflexive, sympathetic relationships that must exist between the orders of the universe which make it possible for an action performed on the body of a “divine” child—anal penetration—to rip holes in both the Earth and the sky. But then again, what made it possible for such a divine child to be bred using the perverse means that I have described? Is the human conscience ready to accept the realities that this is based on?

You now know the truth about what happened to change the head of state in the UK, who is said to have died in Westminster at the exact moment that the sinkhole formed in the City. You also now know what happened to the other two waiting in line. They didn’t just die in a sinkhole while visiting a friend during an experiment gone awry, as your media told you. I have given you the real reason why the British people now have a screwball for a Regent and a toddler waiting for the throne.

But you should take it as a positive sign that the screwball in question was not present at the ceremony that took the lives of the other three. There must be a reason why he wasn’t invited. I am not saying you should trust him. I am only saying it’s a possible sign of hope for the future. I took quite seriously the rumor I read on 4Chan about him, stating that he personally discovered a white horse grazing on the lawn of Kensington Palace, along with two naked children playing nearby in the grass. Word on the street is that they have been secretly adopted into the royal household.

It is a relief that certain people lost power, and were denied their ambitions to greater power, that weekend. But the ruling class still has the same perverse proclivities as always. They are still using the same tactics of violence and blackmail to maintain that power. You see that the exposure of the Lord Mayor’s child abuse, caught on video, led to no further investigation of organized pedophilia among the elite. You see that the 729 murdered children of the year-long rite (not counting Philippine, I presume) were never identified, and nobody was ever arrested for that.

However, I think it’s possible that forces were unleashed during this ritual, both for good and for evil, which will play an important role in events to come, possibly deciding whether or not this state of affairs shall continue. We shall see what comes of it. For a sign of prognosis, I will continue to watch the skies and the headlines, and wait.

HERE ENDS THE WORK OF THE SUN. LONG LIVE SOL NOVUS.

FIAT JUSTITIA RUAT COELUM

Before the consummation of the age, the whole place will shake with great thundering. … Then the sun will become dark, and the moon will cause its light to cease.

The stars of the sky will cancel their circuits. And a great clap of thunder will come out of a great force that is above all the forces of chaos, where the firmament of the woman is situated. … Then she will pursue the gods of chaos, whom she created along with the prime parent. She will cast them down into the abyss. They will be obliterated because of their wickedness. For they will come to be like volcanoes and consume one another until they perish at the hand of the prime parent. When he has destroyed them, he will turn against himself and destroy himself until he ceases to exist. And their heavens will fall one upon the next and their forces will be consumed by fire. Their eternal realms, too, will be overturned. And his heaven will fall and break in two…

fall into the abyss, and the abyss will be overturned.

Preface

Our first paper on the German flying discs appeared in 1983. At that time, we simply set ourselves the task of proving as best we could that the 'UFOs' that have been observed in all parts of the world for four decades are not of extraterrestrial origin that the internationalists let spread through their world media, but are purely German in origin.
However, we had to realize more and more that not only was there a lack of approximate knowledge about these German developments before 1945 - largely even in circles that remained German or national - but also the so-called 'UFO' topic itself, i.e. the events of the last decades, was largely missing remained unknown. Yes, the connections were and mostly still are - in the spirit of the ruling Allies - smugly laughed at and dismissed as nonsense. In order to achieve this intended effect, even the occupying national press in the Federal Republic of Germany was involved.
Due to this situation, we gradually felt obliged to not only provide proof of German origin step by step, but also to report in much more detail about the worldwide flying disc sightings (UFO observations) as well as military and other events of the last decades initially planned.
Because the Imperial German strategy is so grandiose and therefore appears so unbelievable, we also felt compelled to provide good evidence of the facts using source material and documents. That's the reason why we chose this large A4 format.

The political situation in occupied Germany would never have been so disastrous and so disadvantageous for the German people if the enemies had not succeeded so masterfully in lying and deceiving the people in this sector as well. Even the official apparatus, which was still largely staffed by Germans, would never have allowed itself to be harnessed to the ruling occupiers - and thus against its own people - if it had been aware that it was supporting today's 'collaboration with the enemy'. may soon have to answer for it. At this point we would like to thank our readers again for the many submissions and newspaper reports, some from all parts of the world - often with translations attached.
Also for the many letters and suggestions. At the same time, we would like to ask for your understanding if we were not always able to respond due to work overload.
We hope that with this publication we have succeeded in further deepening and consolidating knowledge of this difficult topic.

Adolf Hitler on April 19, 1945 to Colonel HU Rudel:

It's easy for you to talk, I've been trying to make peace continuously since 1943, but the Allies don't want it, they've been demanding unconditional surrender from the start.
Of course my personal fate doesn't matter, but the fact that I couldn't accept unconditional surrender for the German people will be obvious to every sensible person.
Negotiations are still ongoing, but I no longer believe they will be successful. That's why we must definitely get through this crisis so that decisive weapons can still bring us victory.

In response to Rudel's opinion that the war could no longer be successfully ended by both sides at this point. From the forbidden book 'Despite this' (1*) by Colonel Rudel.

Already at the beginning of the Polish campaign the Führer declared:

And if the enemy floods all of Germany, then the war will be continued from abroad and there will be no surrender. (2*, p. 16)

Which means that preparations for this emergency of enemy occupation were already underway before the war began; and this can also be proven in some areas today!

The dismantling of German submarines before 1945

In the vast majority of the submarine literature of the Second World War, the impression is given that there were no escaped German submarines whose whereabouts on the Allied side, i.e. officially, nothing was known about. This has also been loudly claimed by the occupation media at every appropriate opportunity since 1945. Accordingly, there would have been no submarines for deployment overseas, to the South Seas, to the Antarctic, to South America or to the north polar waters, and just as there were no 'escape submarines for Nazi notables'.

But disinformation is a political tool that has been perfected and has been used, especially since 1945, in occupied, divided and disenfranchised Germany to mislead the German people in order to prevent any awakening. Within these overall processes, this is to be understood not only in relation to Germany, nationally, but also globally. This means that these activities affecting Reich Germany after 1945 are more or less effectively concealed from the entire world population.

There are very valid reasons why the USA and especially England have confiscated the majority of the German submarine documents for 43 years now and marked them with the secret note SECRET, withholding them from the rightful owner. The purpose of this secrecy is to prevent conclusions being drawn, both on the German side and worldwide, which would be of utmost importance for recognizing the true world situation after 1945.
Please note that the above-mentioned retention of files does not affect naval files in general, but only submarine documents.

The Federal Archives in Koblenz, which has over 76 km of files and books, owns several hundred linear meters of general naval files from the Second World War. Even well over 100 linear meters of the Imperial U-boats, which were still in their infancy at the time, but only a very modest two linear meters of those hugely grown submarine weapon of the second war. In the IWK Comprehensive reference work: 'The Federal Archives and its holdings' , Boldt-Verlag, Boppard aR, this retention measure by the Allies is formulated in a knee-jerk style towards today's occupying rulers, as is usual today: files and KTB (war diaries) of all command authorities of the British Admiralty in London, very few war diaries Rods Flotillas and submarines are still at the and logbooks of individual boats the Library of Congress. So far, only a few copies from KTB and from files with technical content are available in the Federal Archives.

Because general naval documents are almost completely available in the Federal Archives, it can be concluded with good reason that there were very special reasons for this long-term confiscation, especially of the submarine files, and probably still must be today. Exactly these reasons have already been explained in more detail in the HUGIN series of publications 'Secret Wonder Weapons' I-III and are therefore assumed to be known to the reader here, such as:

The Imperial German deposition maneuver to overseas bases around 1945; largely with submarines of the latest design from 1943-45.

The production of revolutionary submarine types at peak performance, starting in 1943 and increasing until 1945, despite the increasing chaos of war.
Development of new types of propulsion, such as the Walter drive and the electrogravity drive, as well as the successful prevention of submarine detection by the enemy from 1943 onwards.

The Walter drive, named after Prof. Walter, was developed in 1933. The first test boat, V80, achieved an underwater speed of 26 kn, i.e. almost 50 km, on the first test trip, significantly exceeding the normal submarine speed of up to 9 kn. The lower part of these boats was shaped like a standing figure eight and was powered by hydrogen peroxide. Later boats also had electric engines and diesel engines for overwater travel.
U 792 - U 795 and U 1405 - 1407, later up to 1416, had Walter drives, as did boats with 2000 and 4000 numbers.
In order to cover up the enemy espionage and the organized betrayal, it can be assumed that the official German information given at the time about diving depths, horsepower, knots, etc. were often understated. Therefore, differences can always be found between information from the non-confiscated documents, as found in the specialist literature, on the one hand, and logged reports of individual submariners' experiences, on the other. Here's an example:

In general submarine literature, the U 558, belonging to the VII C class, is mentioned, led by Kptlt. Krech, which was sunk after an air raid off northern Spain on July 20, 1943, northwest of Cape Ortegal.

In the recorded report of the marine Franz We..., however, see report in Secret Wonder Weapons Vol.I, 5.47, his U 558 does not belong to the VII C class and was not led by Captain Krecht, but by Captain Zur See Schermann.

Didn't sink at Ortegal, but surfaced off Iceland after an engine failure and was in a submarine formation under Korv. Captain Moehle, who left for Mar del Plata, Argentina, most likely for the purpose of deportation. Based on other reports, we now know that, for example, the numbers of sunk boats were re-transferred to the revolutionary new boats - this must also have been the case with U 558 - but very probably only if these new boats did not have the numbers used again were no longer used in general military operations, but were given a completely new purpose.

The boat described by Franz We... had 2 sets of turbines with 12,000 hp each and achieved a performance of 75 (!) knots, which was unheard of at the time, and had a drive similar to Walter's but even better. The U 558, led by Krecht, was lost in the summer of 1943, while Franz We. . . explained: '. . 'In 1943' (which indicates the end of the year) we took over the new boat with the number U 558.

From 1943 onwards, the electric boats, coastal boat types No. XXII and XXIII, the offshore type XXI, but also those with even higher Roman numerals, were built with emphasis. December 1944, especially January and March 1945, Germany achieved the highest submarine production figures of the entire war years, with 27 / 37 / 27 units per month, despite the catastrophic war chaos at the time. Grand Admiral Dönitz explained about the new electric boats: These types eliminated the superiority that the (enemy's) defense had gained over submarines since 1943 and which was essentially based on surface detection using the shortest waves. The submarine remained undetectable for location - under water, operating at a protective depth and only attacking from there. From: 'Ten Years and Twenty Days' ; Karl Donitz.

The new types from 1943 onwards were largely to be viewed as submarines in the true sense, because they could now travel long distances constantly under water without surfacing, achieved considerable diving depths and, as already mentioned, could no longer be located; only in very shallow coastal waters, where they could also be seen visually. Where, for example, the electric boat U2538 - most likely also on the route to South America - had to be sunk after enemy fire:

Many of Bormann's inner circle had been ordered to come to Flensburg, from where they were supposed to escape in one or more of the three newly built Walter submarines. This part of the plan was dubbed 'Operation Rainbow'. The alternative to the submarines was to sneak across the 'green border' into Denmark and hide there or go further to seek asylum in Sweden.

Himmler also gathered his circle in Flensburg. But only to wait for Walter Schellenberg's news about asylum in Sweden. ...but something wasn't working for both groups of leaders. What happened to the Bormann group was that the U-boats either didn't come or it proved impossible to get out through the narrow Danish waters. At least one of the Walter submarines attempted to penetrate the Øresund immediately after the surrender. But U 2538 (this electric boat is erroneously referred to here as the Walter U-boat; author's note) was shot at and damaged and captain Heinrich Klapdor had to go to Ätö (an island off the Flensburg Bay), where all passengers arrived on the evening of the 6th At this point, the submarines were were put ashore in May. (3*, p.30) still vulnerable to shelling, depth charges, etc., but - as we will come to later - this was no longer possible years later. Well, many, such as Reichsleiter Martin Bormann, still came to South America; In case of difficulties, a little later, sometimes via detours, or when trying again. The northern escape route existed until 1948, and for a few even longer. Just as the Roman route through Italy and similar other routes of deposition existed for many years. The story that emerged after 1945 about Bormann's death at the Weidenhammer Bridge in Berlin, after his escape from the Führerbunker, probably only served to initially mislead in order to better depose him.

When it came to launching submarines, the Flensburg Bay was a geographically important point. The German submarine port of Mürwik was located here and not far from the bay, just behind the German/Danish border, was the royal summer residence 'Graasten Castle': during the war, the SS set up a hospital there. Since the German army units in northern Schleswig-Holstein remained intact until the end, Graasten Castle was the last hospital in German hands. It remained that way beyond Armistice Day. In doing so, it offered those fleeing the Greater German Empire one last opportunity to find to transform the wounded or into stretcher bearers. At the end of June (1945), shortly after Bormann arrived there, the Danes came on the scene and demanded that the Germans immediately vacate the castle. (4*, p. 295)

According to the Danish book 'Flugtrute Nord', p.27, Bormann was the planner of the northern settlement route. Gehlen and Skorzeny organized them. In 'Go. Wunder Waffen' Vol.III it was already mentioned that the German North and Baltic Sea coasts, Schleswig-Holstein, Denmark and southern Scandinavia were the areas defended by the German side for the longest time, presumably to secure the deposition. Many of those in leadership circles in particular were only able to leave Germany or Berlin in April/May 1945, often under dangerous circumstances. A few failed, were taken prisoner or even died. Others were brought in years after the occupation. However, it should not be ignored that other groups were tasked with setting up secret bases many years before 1945, even before the start of the war.

In April/May 1945, in the entire northern German and Danish region, in addition to the general refugees, there was a large accumulation of managers ready to be dismissed who had to be accommodated here and there at short notice.
The newsletter No. 6, December 1979, to former students of the 'Colonial Women's School Rendsburg', known as the Kolo School for short, also reports on this: Immediately after Easter, the mothers' home in Haus Afrika (which is one of the school buildings) had to be evacuated by the SS the school confiscated! ...Men and their ladies came from Berlin as refugees in large Mercedes cars, but in no way gave the impression of poor people. .... We also had to clear out one room after the other in the main house.

After May 1st and after an air raid on Rendsburg, it continues: We are sitting in the main building on the lowest floor with all our belongings, the SS people among us... The next day it was strangely quiet and empty around us. The forbidden area around Haus Afrika suddenly appeared as a hospital area. Most of the people had disappeared that night. SS Maiden who stayed behind wore nurses' assistant uniforms, the Red Cross flag flew, and male uniformed men wore medical bandages on their arms. The dining room was hastily prepared as an operating room, everything looked very merciful. There were also wounded people that no one had known about before!

The office in the main building became the command post of a corvette captain and oak leaf bearer, who was supposed to lead the defense of Rendsburg. We listened to telephone conversations that were certainly not intended for our ears; it seemed as if all the threads came together in the small office. Irene Pritzen-Steinhorst.

Accordingly, the SS temporarily confiscated the Kolo School, declared part of it a restricted area and the vast majority of it disappeared again between May 1st and 3rd, 1945. What remained turned the school into a 'hospital' but also disappeared as the English approached. Always adapted to the respective situation, the 'Great Deposition' went like this or something similar.

Even before the enemy occupation, the well-known German writer Ernst Jünger wrote: The real core of our people - even if we are defeated - will not abandon their conviction that the world can only prosper if we are at the top... Ours Time comes again. That is why we must now begin work in which military preparations are only the smaller part . (3*, p. 37)
Carlos R. Pineyro, who was sent to Scandinavia by Argentine President Peron to help escape, had free rein to send thousands of these so-called 'technicians' from Scandinavia to Argentina. But apart from the actual scientists who came to Argentina through this network, all were Nazi officers, most of the SS men and Luftwaffe officers who had been promised a position in the Argentine army. (3*, p.39)
There was also a Nazi organization in Ireland, the 'Group 43', which looked after incoming National Socialists from Scandinavia and helped them escape. (3*, p.44)

A Danish SS man, Poul A., said that Bormann stayed in Copenhagen for about four months after his deposition. Then he went to Sweden. (3*, p.47)
At the end of November 1945, the Swedish police in Hälsingborg got wind that Bormann was staying in the Hamilton House in Hälsingborg. He had already been there three weeks. An attempt was made to place him somewhere else. Bormann was seen in Gothenburg on January 19, 1946. In December 1946 one could read in the Swedish newspaper 'Arbetet' (The Work) that Bormann, together with one of the leaders of the werewolf movement, Artur Axmann, and the Gauleiter Ernst Wilhelm Bohle, were on one on April 13th and 14th, 1946 The meeting was in Malmö (southern Sweden). (3*, p.62)

Bohle was later caught and brought before the tribunal of the 'victors' in Nuremberg. Reichsleiter Bormann is said to have declared at this meeting in Malmö: 'We will be back, but in a form that the world will never forget!' , according to the South American newspaper 'Zig-Zag', Santiago de Chile from June 19, 1947.

The resistance in Denmark, as well as in the Scandinavian countries, was divided into two mutually hostile groups, the international and national resistance. The latter helped the Germans escape and depose in many ways.

We leave the topic of the removal of groups and individuals, which has already been touched on in previous HUGIN writings, and return to the removal of the boats. Of course, one is closely intertwined with the other.

Reports like the one above about U 2538 understandably only exist about those boats that failed somewhere during the deployment, because nothing can have been known about the large number of boats that got through smoothly.

We get an approximate idea of the boats that escaped during the deposition from the following source material by Bodo Herzog, published by the reputable military book publisher JFLehmanns, Munich, 1968. At this point in time, 23 years after the so-called 'end of the war', the whereabouts of several hundred Germans are unknown Not yet known to submarines. B. Herzog puts the note: 'Whereabouts have not yet been clarified'!
For the well-known boats, the 31-page table tells us the date of commissioning, as well as the time, type and location of the boat loss. A cross stands for sunk, a cross in brackets means self-sunk. If there is no commissioning date for the boats we are interested in here, but only an acceptance date (A) because they were no longer used in the usual war, then their later whereabouts should at least be known, such as the various ones from the English captured and sunk west of the Hebrides in Operation 'Deadlight' between November 25th, 1945 and January 7th, 1946.

Therefore, several hundred missing submarines can only be understood and logically explained within the context we have presented.

In order to counteract the increasing losses due to the effects of war and for other important reasons, the 'New Submarine Construction Program' began in 1943 at the same time as sectional construction. The submarine sections, which had been prefabricated in separate factories, came together in the shipyards and could now be assembled into the final product in fractions of the usual construction time. This meant that series production was also born in the submarine sector and espionage was largely removed from view. The following has now also become possible: Years ago one of our readers called us and explained: 'What you explained in Secret Miracle Weapor known for years. You will also be interested to know that I was a submariner during the war years and from 1944 to May 1945 we had to load submarine parts into submarines non-stop!'

We are therefore not only dealing with a few hundred - perhaps 1,000 submarines that were taken from the ever-approaching enemies before May 1945, but also with a large number of individual parts and sections, which are very likely only in bases were assembled into ready-to-operate boats outside the Greater German Reich and were only provided there with a new, revolutionary, electromagnetic (?) drive, which we will come to later.

For the aforementioned reason, we have also taken the areas from the boat table in which it says: 'Sections all or partly delivered in Bremen'; or: 'partially finished or under construction'; or: 'up to 95% complete', but the information about self-scuttling as with U 4713 and U 4714 could not be provided. Or where - it says: 'almost finished - whereabouts?' or similar mysterious cases. Because the whereabouts of 'almost finished' boats would have to be known, unless they were also able to escape enemy access. The 'New Submarine Construction Program' was carried out with particular emphasis and the highest level of urgency, so that 'it can be assumed that many individual parts and sections had already been manufactured or assembled when it says: orders were placed in May 1944 and deferred or canceled in December 1944. Put back and loaded so that it was no longer completed in Germany, but somewhere outside of it? According to our reader's testimony above, we can take this into account. The submarine documents retained by the Allies would not give us any information about this. On the other hand, the strange processes in all the world's oceans after 1945.

The boats 2111-13, 2251-95 are micro-submarines, also - as far as we are interested here, with unknown whereabouts - the numbers five and six thousand. These were completely unsuitable for the actual deployment to overseas bases and at first glance would hardly be considered in our context, and yet they are always small and micro submarines of 'unknown nationality' which have not only been spotted in Danish and Scandinavian coastal waters for decades, but have also been fought with depth charges, albeit without the slightest success. These small boats will have a secret, regional base in the North and Baltic Sea areas, which we do not know about. It cannot be ruled out that some of these small boats were towed by the larger ones so that they could then be used regionally in other sea areas.

Suddenly, starting in 1943, Germany suffered extremely high submarine losses, some of which appear very questionable, especially among those reported missing. While the official loss figures in 1941 and 1942 were 38 and 88 boats respectively, losses in 1943 and 1944 rose considerably to 245 and 264 boats. Here, too, some boats - with crews, of course - may have found other uses in the area of responsibility of the 'Last Battalion', and the reports of losses to the naval office at home only served to deceive the agents and traitors in their own ranks.

November 29,

1944 Trip to Bremen and Oldenburg. Bremen is destroyed. But the shipyards are incredibly busy. U-boat next to U-boat lies on the Helligen. Hundreds of workers gymnastics around on the scaffolding and complete a submarine every day in the one shipyard we visit alone.
We are shown one of the new radar-proof submarines, one of which is already at the enemy, and with which Dönitz plans to fight the first convoy battle again shortly.
I know nothing about seafaring and nothing at all about submarines. But this boat, with its size and powerful armament, makes a fearsome impression on me. The experts explain to us that it can stay under water for any length of time and can move at the speed of a destroyer. It does not rely on underwater electric propulsion. (6*, p.181)

From the summer of 1943, three officially known German submarine bases in East Asia were gradually completed and occupied. In Penang, in the Strait of Malacca, in Djakarta and in Surabaja, both located in Java (Sunda Islands). The first 11 boats were sent there in July 1943. Surprisingly, only five (!) boats arrived and the six missing ones were not later reported as having been sunk by the enemy. Another 16 boats set off on the Far Eastern voyage at the end of 1943. Again, less than half arrived in Penang. (20*) reil A completely unusual 'loss' for boats that were not in combat with the enemy! No radio signals were picked up and no survivors ever officially reported back to HUC. Therefore, the assumption that they had to leave the so-called monsoon association during the trip around the Cape of Good Hope was given a new order, according to which they had to head for the nearby German territory of Neuschwabenland in Antarctica, for anyone with this topic familiar, not so far-fetched. An act of transformation through which they were removed from the German Navy and assigned to the 'Last Battalion'. This often happened with people and material.

At this point we don't want to miss the following important note: After one of our lectures in southern Germany, in October 1987, a captain in the merchant navy, who served on speedboats and sometimes on submarines before 1945, stood up and complemented ours Statements about the German base in Neuschwabenland as follows: Around the end of 1941, during my service, I met the two soldiers Siewert and Wehrend, who from then on were ordered to the Russian campaign. They were both participants in the German Antarctic Expedition 1938/39 (both also appear in the official list of participants in the expedition; see excerpt from the list in the appendix). They reported to me that even after the end of the expedition, i.e. in the spring of 1939, they continued to serve on the expedition ship 'Schwabenland' and that their ship commuted non-stop between Neuschwabenland and the home port every quarter in order to transport equipment and entire mining facilities to the Antarctic. This also included tracks and carts, but also a huge milling machine to be able to drill tunnel systems into the ice. So much for the statement of the retired captain Hardly ready to surrender, but still determined to fight, the German submariners stationed in Norway were still in April/ May 1945. The liberal 'National-Zeitung', Basel The Third Reich in dissolution. Switzerland reported on May 4, 194: In the case of Hitler, not even death itself has yet been conclusively proven and for the time being we will have to make do with the information that President Truman relies on. Rarely will a body discovery have as far-reaching and important future significance as the actual discovery of the 'Fuhrer's' human remains would have. (Well, this discovery of such far-reaching and important significance has never existed to this day; inserted by the author).

However, Dönitz himself is unlikely to carry out a formal surrender, for which the Allies would hardly give him more than 48 hours, but would rather leave it to the Allies - to announce victory through a unilateral act. Incidentally, the decisive signal for this is expected from Norway, because Victory Day cannot be celebrated without the German high command in Norway clearly indicating its willingness to cease fighting. As for Norway, it is less certain whether the Germans will also lay down their arms there in the near future. It is more likely that the officers and crew of the submarines and speedboats in Norway, consisting mainly of FANATICS, are determined. Today we know: The areas in the north were defended with particular effort and for as long as possible in order to to continue the war to the extreme. ensure the smoothest possible deployment; This also applies to Norway.

Just a few months ago, a former German soldier (Austrian) who was only deployed in Scandinavian countries from 1939-45 came to see us and explained something like this: In April 1945 I was approached alone and specifically in Norway. I was told I could go to Kristiansand, where there were submarines ready for deployment. I refused on the grounds that I had done nothing wrong as a soldier, why should I escape, I was going into captivity. It wasn't until I read your HUGIN writings that I realized about boat cancellation. (But this could not be told what the U was really about to anyone at the time, in order to rule out treason. What is also interesting here is that only people who appeared to be reliable were approached and who had perhaps previously been under observation for a longer period of time; note HUGIN.)

A few boats surrendered and surrendered months later for various reasons, such as U 530 on July 10, 1945 and U 977 on August 17, both in Argentina, presumably in the course of the deportation. Occasionally, a few or many years later, German submarines, some with and some without national emblems, were either clearly recognized or assumed to be such based on their appearance. We reported various cases in our other related writings.

In general, reporting on such sightings or incidents after 1945 now used a different style of presentation. Now there were reports of 'submarines of unknown nationality', of 'ghost ships', of 'ghost submarines' and later of 'USOs' (unidentified submarine objects). Similar to how after 1945 the German flying discs or fireballs were now called UFOs and the impression was given that they came from other stars.

According to the 'Home and World' report (excerpt) inserted here from around 1956/57, the Reich German submarines suspected or actually spotted after 1945 were portrayed several times in other press reports as modern pirate submarines. Due to the legal situation described below, this must be strongly contradicted: Immediately after the German Antarctic Expedition in 1938/39, the explored and surveyed 600,000 square km area was called 'Neuschwabenland' and declared German sovereign territory. This happened before the outbreak of World War II. The same was true of the establishment of a German base, which began immediately after the expedition.
In 1945, the German motherland was occupied by the enemy - much to the chagrin of all Germans - and has been under occupation for decades ever since, but not the German territory in Antarctica, which is almost the same size. Here,

As in its many other restricted areas and bases, the Reich has not yet been forced to surrender. All Allied attempts made after 1945, such as the Byrd 'Expedition' in 1946/47, as well as later American, English and Soviet war operations against Neuschwabenland, also disguised as expeditions, were unsuccessful. This means that you could neither destroy the German base nor force the Germans there to give up and surrender.

Even the opposing Federal Constitutional Court in Karlsruhe (FRG) had to admit in several landmark judgments, for example on July 31, 1973 - most likely taking this fact of international law into account - that the German Reich did not collapse in 1945, but continued to exist legally.

Thus, the worldwide Reich German operations after 1945 - because only the German Wehrmacht capitulated - be it with flying discs (UFOs) or with submarines (or USUs), are legal acts of war by a legally continuing state and therefore cannot be considered illegal or piracy be placed. The German Reich continues the Second World War from Neuschwabenland, just like any other of the 50 states on the other side of the Allies, in accordance with international law. By owning the territory of Neuschwabenland, the forces of the empire are not in the inferior situation of a simple government in exile.

As the Baseler Zeitung already made clear, Grand Admiral Dönitz did not sign a formal surrender of the Reich in 1945, but rather the 'victory march' - which was not yet one - was a one-sided act by the Allies.

Let us remember Eisenhower's statement during his presidential term when asked by a journalist: 'Your Excellency, what do you actually think of the III. World War', replied somewhat harshly: 'The II. It's not over yet.'

Piraten-U-Boot am Werk

Menschen verschwinden — Fragezeichen im Leben des Kapitäns Miller — Eine Spur: der letzte Funkspruch der ARAKARIMOA — Die Rätsel häuten sich — Phantasiegebilde oder erregende Wirklichkeit? — Unheimliche Beobachtung eines altes Marineoffiziers

Alarmierende Nachrichten dringen aus der fernen Südsee zu uns. Das vielbesungene Tropenparadies steht zur Zeit unter dem Alpdruck panischen Schreckens. Unheimliche Vorfälle im Umkreis der Fidschi-Inseln erregen die Öffentlichkeit, Eingeborene und Weiße zittern, fieberhaft ist die Polizei am Werke und alle Küstenstationen und Flugstützpunkte sind in Alarmzustand versetzt. Was ist geschehen? Eine Serie unheimlicher Vorfälle macht von sich reden, bei denen ebenso rätselhafte wie gespenstisch anmutende Dinge geschehen. Unser Bericht führt den Leser in jene Gegend und läßt ihn die erregenden Ereignisse miterleben.

Auszug:

Piratenbande hatte sich die Seegefilde zwischen Inseln und Atolls der Fidschi-Gruppe zum Tummel- und Beuteplatz ausgesucht. Kapitän Williams hatte richtig gesehen, der letzte Funkspruch der verschollenen ARAKARIMOA erhärtete seine Beobachtung: ein U-Boot unbekannter Nationalität war der Freibeuter. Aber nicht nur das, von den weiter südlich gelegenen Tonga-Inseln wurde der Funkspruch eines Küstenschiffes aufgefangen, der eine in diesem neuen Lichte hochinteressante und alarmierende Nachricht enthielt. „In der Lagune eines den Tonga-Inseln vorgelagerten Atolls sichteten wir ein vielleicht 1000 Tonnen großes Kriegsschiff, daß an eine Korvette aus dem letzten Kriege erinnert. Das Schiff führte weder Namen, noch Positionslichter oder sonstige Kennzeichen und beantwortete, weder unsere Flaggensignale noch unsere drahtlosen Anrufe.“

Elf Jahre nach Kriegsende

Ein „deutsches oder japanisches Unterseeboot" glaubte Kapitän Williams ausgemacht zu haben. Das würde bedeuten: elf Jahre nach Kriegsende müßten noch Schiffseinheiten mitsamt ihrer Besatzung unterwegs sein, die sich auf eigene Faust der Kapitulation entzogen hätten. Das klingt überraschend, ja, fast unwahrscheinlich, wird aber dennoch von den neuseeländischen und britischen Behörden nun, nach dem Verschwinden dreier Schiffe und nach wiederholter Sichtung geheimnisvoller Kriegsfahrzeuge für durchaus möglich gehalten. Es ist bekannt, daß eine ganze Anzahl von U-Booten bei Kriegsende überfällig war, die später auf die Liste der Vermißten gesetzt werden mußten. Andererseits jedoch scheidet bei solchen Erwägungen mit einiger Gewißheit die Annahme aus, daß es sich bei diesen Piraten um ehemalige deutsche Marineangehörige handelt, denn es ist schwerlich denkbar, daß es einem deutschen U-Boot-Kommandanten gelungen sein soll, seine ganze Besatzung oder einen erheblichen Teil von ihr unter seinem Kommando zu behalten und mit ihnen in einer solchen Ferne von der Heimat ein recht- und gesetzloses Leben zu führen.

Montevideo, 8 (UPI). -- The so-called flying disks are not alien spaceships but the works of Nazi scientists who have not come to terms with losing World War II and are preparing for a coming conquest, said engineer Fred Andracht, an Austrian living in Uruguay .

He has been living in Uruguay for two years and is the owner of a chemical laboratory. He was a university lecturer in Switzerland and worked in Argentina.

In statements to the morning newspaper 'EL DIARIO', he expressed his views on this issue: 'It is not just a theory, but a truth. At the moment I do not have the convincing evidence that science requires so that no one questions my position. But I have raised the issue at a higher level because it is obvious that the situation requires preventive measures and not negligence.

There is not only a lot of money behind it, but also interest groups that have a lot of power and are interested in keeping it hidden. I also have to be careful about my safety because those responsible will try to prevent them from becoming known at all costs.'

He recalled that before World War II, Germany tested the latest weapons in Spain and Hitler turned that country into a testing ground.

'There are still many of those Germans, along with others, who have decided to follow them and who believe that the last war is not over and that they can still gain power.'

He said he cannot reveal the location of the base from which they operate and hinted that the Argentine and North American militaries may also know this truth, or at least part of it, or at least intuit it.

Finally, Andracht said that he will soon take part in a conference with Uruguayans interested in the UFO issue and assures that his goal is to ensure that 'Uruguay is the first country to raise its voice - in the appropriate context - against this aggression once he has the evidence. --' German translation from: Daily newspaper 'LA RAZON' - Buenos Aires, Argentina, ca.1977/78.

The extraordinary thing about this report is that it appeared in a daily newspaper. This has been impossible in occupied Germany since 1945 because the occupying media strictly prohibits it, even if it comes from the opposing side, as in this case.

PLATOS VOLADORES CON CRUZ GAMADA

MONTEVIDEO, 8 (UPI). — Los llamados platos voladores no son naves extraterrestres, sino la obra de científicos nazis, que no aceptan haber perdido la Segunda Guerra Mundial y se preparan para una futura conquista, dijo el ingeniero Fred Andracht, austríaco residente en el Uruguay.

Hace 2 años que vive en el Uruguay y es propietario de un laboratorio químico. Fue catedrático en Suiza y trabajó en la Argentina.

En declaraciones al vespertino "El Diario" ,expresó que su concepción del problema "no es meramente una teoría, sino una verdad. Por el momento no dispongo de las pruebas absolutas que la ciencia exige para que nadie discuta mi punto de vista, pero he planteado el tema a altas esferas porque evidentemente la situación exige adoptar medidas de previsión y no descuidarse.

"Detrás de esto no solo hay mucho dinero, sino sectores de enorme poder interesados en que no se sepa nada al respecto. Incluso yo debo velar por mi seguridad. Porque los responsables tratarán de evitar ser descubiertos utilizando cualquier medio".

Recordó que antes de la Segunda Guerra Mundial, Alemania probó en España las armas más adelantadas y Hitler convirtió ese país en un campo de experimentación.

"Aun subsisten muchos de aquellos alemanes, acompañados de otros que han decidido seguirlos y que creen que no terminó la última guerra y el poder todavía puede conquistarse".

Dijo que no puede revelar dónde se encuentra la base desde la que operan, y sugirió que militares argentinos y norteamericanos podrían también conocer esta verdad, quizás parte de ella, o al menos intuirla.

Finalmente Andracht dijo que participará próximamente en una mesa redonda con estudiosos uruguayos del problema de los OVNI y afirmó que su meta es lograr que "Uruguay sea el primero que eleve su voz, en el ámbito que corresponde, contra esta agresión, una vez que disponga de las pruebas

'Unknown' submarines in all the world's oceans

Now also 'Unknown Floating Objects'
The movements of 'Unknown Objects' have now spread to the depths of the sea and are showing the same confident operational capabilities as the objects in the air.
In recent weeks, such USOs have been located underwater several times on both sides of the American continent and have been fiercely pursued by US Navy units.
The speed and maneuverability of these objects once again surpass anything our academic technology could achieve. So these objects have to be attributed to the same unknowns that also dominate the airspace.
(11*, 15.2.1955, S.16)

At some point and somewhere on secret submarine bases outside the German motherland, the submarines that were diverted from the German Navy and also disappeared during the last major withdrawal in April/May 1945 must have been equipped with new revolutionary technologies and also converted to electromagnetic propulsion. These are likely to have the same capabilities and techniques as the German flying discs (called UFOs).

Unidentified submarines.

In recent years, an epidemic of disappearing submarines has occurred around the world. They do not appear to belong to either the Soviet Union or the United States. Reliable, trained observers, such as pilots and ship captains, described these objects in shallow waters where no sensible submarine would dare to operate, and the fleets of New Zealand, Australia, Argentina and Venezuela left armed, assuming the mysterious submarines to catch boats within their territorial waters. However, the objects always managed to escape their pursuers.

From John A. Keel's long report: 'Underwater UFO bases alarm US'. (9*)

In contrast to the conventional Allied submarines, they very quickly reach fantastic speeds. A longer report from the 'UN' states 'sixty to seventy miles per hour', in No. 246 August 1977 another case 'over 150 knots' is stated. The Canadian Jean Prachan describes in his book 'UFOs in the Bermuda Triangle' a submarine pursued by the Americans with a speed of 280 km/h: 'Its speed was more than 28f km/h and this at a time (1963) when the record speed of a submarine was 80 km/h.' (8'~°, 5.104)

Adolf Schneider recounts an incident from 1964, at a speed of more than 200 knots: In the magazine 'Man's Illustrated', March 1968, there is a report of a maneuver in which the aircraft carrier WASP, submarines and other ship units were used. The submarines (of the United States) were equipped for silent navigation, while above them on the surface of the Atlantic, 500 miles from the southeastern coast of the United States, one day in 1964, torpedo boat destroyers with their listening devices monitored the signals that the Underwater units were delivered and the aircraft carrier sent them up to the aircraft used for anti-submarine warfare.

Ninety meters below the surface of the water, one of the submarines suddenly separated from the (own, played) attackers. Above, a bug on board one of the torpedo hunters was making a phone call to the command bridge. After receiving the call, the officer on duty rushed to the commander with an incredible look on his face. When the lieutenant captain saw him, he asked: 'What have you got?'; "Commander, there's something strange down there," the officer said, "one of the submarines has turned to another unidentified target." He added that two tracks appeared on the screen: our submarine and another object. There was only one thing that gave the watch officer pause and that was the great speed at which the 'unknown submarine' was moving. 'What is the speed?' asked the commander. 'More than 200 knots' was the answer.

With a sound of disbelief, the commander quickly left the cabin and rushed to the telephone. When he had confirmation of the incident from the senior officer in the electronics department, he sent a radio telegram to the Admiralty ship, which had already received similar messages from another torpedo hunter and from an aircraft. The trail of an underwater probe, similar to a torpedo, was then followed. What the ships and plane had picked up was the sound of an unknown submarine moving at a fantastic speed that no ship or submarine could match. The electronic instruments of 13 different ships had detected the presence of an unknown submarine, of which identical reports were made to the Commander-in-Chief in Norfolk.

Jean Prachan also mentions this incident with the 'unknown submarine' during the US

Maneuvers: The 'pursuit' lasted four days. Depending on your mood, the mysterious vehicle appeared and disappeared again. Occasionally it even dived to a depth of 8,000 meters, where no 'human' submarine could ever follow it.
This incident caused panic among the American authorities; at first they thought it might be a Soviet boat. There was, of course, reason for excitement, as the object's performance exceeded anything previously known or imagined. No explanation could be found for the appearance of this incredible submarine. After a few days it disappeared as suddenly as it appeared. (8*, p.104)

On October 4, 1977, the 'Bremer Nachrichten' wrote: 'The secret services of both hemispheres are said to be in possession of extensive records of the appearance of unknown and mysterious submarines' and mention an incident in which an unknown submarine moved at a speed of 370 km/h have.

But it was not only the high speeds of these 'unknown' submarines that caused great and initially disbelieving astonishment, but also another equally astonishing factor. At some point in the last 80 decades that cannot be precisely determined, flying discs (UFOs) that plunged into the water or shot out again at another time were no longer distinguishable from USOs or unknown submarines. It seems as if the UFOs can swim and, above all, dive, but these "alien" submarines can also fly.

John A. Keel writes in the aforementioned report:
Unidentified flying objects have been consistently seen by the crews of hundreds of ships across the Atlantic. In many well-documented cases, witnesses claimed that strange metallic disc- and cigar-shaped objects suddenly emerged from the water appeared, rose into the air, circled their ships and disappeared into the sky. In other cases, they came down to the surface of the sea and disappeared underwater. There are other confusing incidents about gigantic mysterious submarines that apparently come from no known nation. They successfully evaded all sea and air searches carried out by fleets of half a dozen countries.

All of these reports have created one of the most widespread and persistent legends of the flying disk mystery, that the UFOs are actually stationed underwater in the Atlantic, Pacific or Arctic.

On January 12, 1965, Captain K. saw from a DC-3 a metallic ship in a perfectly streamlined shape with an equally streamlined flap at the top. It didn't look like our submarines because it had no superstructure. It was about 9m long. The area where Captain K. saw this vessel is impassable for our submarines because of its mangrove swamps and sandbanks. If these unidentified underwater UFOs develop the same characteristics as the aerial UFOs, then they could also develop the same electromagnetic field. (9*)

UFOs or USOs are not only observed within the seas and oceans or in rivers, but also occasionally when diving into and emerging into inland lakes, even ponds. So let's not bother ourselves anymore with the confusion in the various reports, whether it's called a UFO, USO or even a submarine. Because Keel is absolutely right, with the same electromagnetic drive it can be whatever it wants, the original watercraft can operate in the air just like the aircraft can operate in the water. The two media air and water are interchangeable if you have this phenomenal drive, which we have already discussed in more detail in the HUGIN publication: 'Secret Miracle Weapons' Vol. III. They can maneuver equally well in the air and in the water and can therefore maneuver reciprocally.

Jean Prachan describes how in the summer of 1954, the captain and part of the crew of the Dutch ship 'Groote Beer', about 130 km off New York in the Atlantic, observed 'a strange flat object emerging from the sea'. Prachan then goes on to write:
Numerous similar cases were observed in 1954 and 1955. I can't list them all here; The list would be quite long and is not absolutely necessary for our purposes.
However, I would like to describe one in more detail because it was reported to me by the two eyewitnesses themselves. They were young soldiers then. Today they live in the Miami area. One runs a repair shop, the other is an insurance salesman. In March 1955 they were on board a US Air Force bomber that was flying over the Bahamas archipelago on a sightseeing flight. Joe C. and William H. and the other crew members first noticed something glowing moving beneath the surface of the water. Suddenly this light seemed to rise from the water. The plane did not fly very high, and the men were able to observe a yellowish-orange ball of light for two or three minutes - the light, as it emerged from the water , looked like a ball that remained motionless over the sea. Then she set off and headed towards the open sea, where she disappeared within a few moments. When they returned to base, the men were ordered to keep quiet about the apparition under threat of punishment. So this affair remained 'secret' until I accidentally came across Joe C. while doing some research. Through him I was also able to contact William H., the only comrade with whom he was still in touch. The latter confirmed the report point by point.

The following case occurred off the coast of Venezuela, almost at the level of the Antilles

As far as we know, only Ivan T. Sanderson has mentioned it. On December 13, 1956, a Swedish ship radioed the port authority of La Guaira in Venezuela that a conical object was falling vertically into the ocean. When it hit the water, a huge explosion was heard and the sea began to boil . (8*, p. 102)

Initially, accidents were suspected, but these explosions must have had other reasons that cannot yet be classified, because the objects continued to maneuver unscathed after these incidents, as has been observed several times.

In the magazine 'Mensch und Destiny', Ing. E. Halik wrote as early as 1955: A West German news agency reported on Greenlandic experiments with 'flying submarines' several years ago. These flying objects have now been spotted several times over France and their structural details actually correspond completely to the usual submarine shape with pressure hull and turret. It would be difficult to believe that extraterrestrial entities would be so unimaginative as to copy our submarines for aviation purposes. (11*)

The last sentence is a stab at the Allied diversionary hoax with the 'aliens'; because At that time, Ing. Halik was already very familiar with German developments and the imperial German deposition. He also assumed - as we could see from his other publications - that Imperial German flying discs also operated from Greenland, among other places.
Also in his multi-page report 'No Invasion from Space' July 15, 1954, also in the humanities magazine 'Mensch und Destiny', he spoke out against the diversionary hoax about 'extraterrestrials' created by the Allies.

The evidence swells and becomes more confusing with each case. Our world is plagued not only by bizarre aerial objects of all kinds, many of which have demonstrated their ability to dive into the water and transform into submarines, but also by various secret things stationed underwater.

Someone or something seems to be rounding up people in the Bermuda Triangle. Now it looks like they - or it - are doing the same with conventional submarines. All these incredible events are in contrast to the popular opinion that the flying disks are just friendly visitors from space (this is rather a controlled and forced opinion; inserted by the author). The phenomenon appears to be all-encompassing and takes place largely beneath our oceans and lakes. Are we dealing with a phantom fleet from some secret underwater world?

Is this why the US Navy spends more money on UFO research than the US Air Force? In 1967, the Navy spent $5 million on a search project in the Bermuda Triangle using aircraft and special search submarines. In 1969, the nuclear submarine
'No.1' was quietly launched, which had 7 men on board and 100 million.
cost dollars. This submarine is kept top secret, but the Navy says it is designed to "explore the economic and military possibilities of the seabed."
From: 'Male', Nov. 1970; taken from the UN, No. 192 8/1972

'Nuclear submarine 'No.1' in 1969' is an obvious mistake, nuclear submarines existed before 1969.
Maybe a special deep submersible is meant to track down the enemy underwater.
The way the US Navy pretends to explore the seabed here is the usual and widely used form of distraction.
When the Allies send their elaborate, usually militarily equipped 'expeditions' to the North or South Pole, for example, they give to simply look for coal or ore deposits, or to explore the spawning grounds of krill. When they venture into space, they give other harmless research reasons.

In like the other cases, they are commercial excuses and when they launch military operations into the Bermuda Triangle disguised as expeditions, which we will talk about later, they make us believe that they are looking for very specific anomalies in this area, such as strong electromagnetic aberrations, or similar meaningless excuses. In fact, the research in these military actions is of a secondary, sometimes merely distracting nature, if it is carried out at all in any case. But if you're already in Antarctica or the Triangle looking for German bases or underwater bases, why not let a few battered scientists research krill? In any case, it seems pretty harmless.

These Allied actions are about tracking down Reich German units, on land, at sea and in space. But since the Allies have allowed themselves to be presented and celebrated as victors in front of the whole world since 1945, and at the same time have also decided to systematically conceal, or at least disguise, the Reich's continued efforts after 1945, they are forced to suppress the truth again and again. The one big lie about total victory over Germany inevitably leads to many small subsequent lies.

Gehen die Untertassen jetzt baden?

Italienischer Kellner entdeckte rätselhafte Unterwasserobjekte

Nicastro/Italien (upi) Es war diesmal keine fliegende Untertasse, wirkte aber genau so unirdisch: bläulich-leuchtende delphinähnliche, elektrisch geladene metallische Körper mit je drei Antennen, die im Wasser umherschwärmen. So jedenfalls beschrieb sie der Kellner Pasquale Criolese Esposito, der in einem Restaurant am Meer nahe Nicastro in Kalabrien arbeitet. Er schwört, sie gesehen zu haben.

Er, zwei andere Kellner und vier Gäste des Restaurants erblickten das bläuliche Licht im Meer, berichtet Esposito. Sie hätten daraufhin ein Boot bestiegen und seien den geheimnisvollen Körpern nachgefahren. Als sie sich ihnen näherten, seien alle bis auf einen getaucht. Das Boot habe sich dem Metallkörper genähert und ein anderer Kellner habe mit einem Ruder eine der drei meterlangen Antennen berührt. Er habe einen elektrischen Schlag erhalten und das „Ding" sei verschwunden. Als sich das Boot auf den Rückweg ans Ufer machte, seien alle „Delphine" aufgetaucht und hätten sich unter Zurücklassung eines leuchtenden Schweifes mit großer Geschwindigkeit entfernt. Ein Techniker meint, es habe sich vielleicht um Fernlenkwaffen einer ausländischen Macht gehandelt. Ähnliche Erscheinungen seien vor einiger Zeit auch in der Straße von Messina beobachtet worden.

In einer Tiefe von etwa 150 Metern erschien auf den Radarschirmen zweier australischer Kriegsschiffe, die eine spezielle Ausrüstung zum Auffinden von Unterseebooten hatten, ein etwa 90 Meter langes zigarrenförmiges Objekt. Zunächst glaubte man, daß es sich um ein U-Boot handelte, aber diese Vermutung konnte nicht aufrechterhalten werden. Infolge der großen Wassertiefe konnten aber keine genaueren Untersuchungen vorgenommen werden. Ein deutscher Auswanderer, der in Sydney eine Taucherfirma gegründet hat, hat sich nun freiwillig gemeldet, um das seltsame Objekt näher zu untersuchen. Sein Angebot blieb jedoch bisher vom Verteidigungsministerium Australiens noch ohne Antwort. „Schwalmbote“

The strategic importance of the Bermuda Triangle

December 1944, the destruction of Germany by the Allies was in full swing. To make up for losses, seven American bombers were ordered to Italy to be used against German targets. After briefly refueling in Bermuda, the seven aircraft were now back over the Atlantic, about 480 km to the east, when electromagnetic interference suddenly occurred in the ignition, radio and other electrical on-board systems. An incident that, as we now know, appears very often in connection with 'UFOs'. With great difficulty, only two of the seven bombers were able to escape back to Bermuda. Since then, there has been no trace of the other machines.

On December 5, 1945, almost exactly a year later, five TBM Avenger bombers took off from the US naval base in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, on what was said to be a training flight. The suddenly interrupted radio communication between the airport and the planes made it clear that a catastrophe had been brewing for the five bombers. Of the two flying boats sent out twenty minutes later to search for and possibly rescue the crew, only one returned without results. What was probably the largest rescue operation in the history of aviation was initiated, but it also remained unsuccessful. Not a single thing was found of the five bombers and the flying boat: But despite one of the most intensive search operations in history, with 240 aircraft, 67 additional aircraft from the aircraft carrier 'Solomon' four destroyers, several submarines, eighteen coast guard ships, search and Rescue cutters, hundreds of private aircraft, yachts and boats, additional aircraft from Banana River Naval Air Station and assistance from British Navy and Air Force units in the Bahamas, nothing was found.
A daily average of 167 flights, from morning to evening, carried out approximately 90 meters above sea level, a detailed survey of 100,000 square kilometers of land and sea, over the Atlantic, the Caribbean, the Gulf of Mexico, the mainland of Florida and the neighboring ones Islands, a search time of 4,100 hours, all these efforts yielded no results - neither survivors, life rafts, wreckage or oil stains. The beaches of Florida and the Bahamas were searched daily for several weeks for identifiable flotsam that could have come from the missing planes, but without results. (22*, p.27)

Almost all lengthy reports and books about the infamous Bermuda Triangle begin with these two classic cases.
We also reported on this in 'Secret Wonder Weapons', Volume II, 5.13 + 17 ff.

Some say the term 'Bermuda Triangle' was born after the disappearance of the five TBM bombers. Jean Prachan, David Group and others claim that the freelance writer and famous inventor Vincent H. Gaddis first coined it in his article 'The Deadly Bermuda Triangle', in the magazine 'Argosy', February 1964. Be that as it may, everyone agrees that these extraordinary, initially inexplicable events began in 1944/45. It was only later that authors - those who belonged to the secrecy group - and later also those who simply retell the story, began to include older and much older ship accidents in order to give the impression that these events were ancient and therefore nothing new or special for this area. There have been unexplained ship accidents at all times and suitable cases were quickly found in old ship documents. But in times of ship piracy and poor technology, where radio systems were just like that. Although we didn't yet know search operations with aircraft, unsolved cases were still understandable. There was also a lack of modern SOS emergency call systems in the past, which today, on modern ships, should the radio center be unmanned, automatically send out their emergency call when the ship sinks, and if we are correctly informed, up to a water depth of 50-100 m

Because far more ships and aircraft disappear in the Bahamas than in Bermuda, the term is wrong, argues Prachan. Furthermore, it is just a journalistic slogan, as the events cannot be limited to this area. Which is also true, because the increasing number of reports about extraordinary ship and aircraft accidents, including their disappearance without a trace, are, if you look closely, of a global nature.
However, it must be taken into account that there are certain focal points worldwide and this undoubtedly includes the so-called Bermuda Triangle, perhaps the most priority area of all.

Das größte Radio-Raster-Teleskop der Welt ist die Arecibo-Anlage im Hinterland der Insel Puerto Rico. Es hat einen Durchmesser von 305 m. Der Reflektor aus Maschendraht ist in ein natürliches Tal eingelassen. Die aufgefangenen Radiowellen werden in einer hoch im Brennpunkt angebrachten Antenne gebündelt. Von dort werden die Signale in den Kontrollraum geleitet, wo sie analysiert werden. Es geht auch umgekehrt: Benutzt man die Anlage als Sender, kann die Antenne ein Signal in den Reflektor strahlen, von dem es dann ins All gelenkt wird.

The Bermuda Triangle, more commonly known as the Devil's Triangle, is part of the Sargasso Sea and lies just off the east coast of the USA. To this day, the USA in particular, alongside the Soviet Union, is one of the largest war opponents of the continuing German Reich and the German people, which is very important. The vertices of the triangle are given by some as Florida/Bermuda/Puerto Rico, by others as Florida/Bermuda/Cuba or from the Gulf of Mexico across Florida to Bermuda/ Puerto Rico (see sketch). In my opinion, the better geographical identification would be a huge semicircle, starting around Boston/New York on the US east coast, from there via Bermuda and Puerto Rico to the Panama Canal. The entire Caribbean, including the Gulf of Mexico and the US south coast. With the focus in the center: Bahamas and Cape Canaveral.

But let's stick with the given triangle. Why are more 'submarines of unknown nationality', more 'USOs' and more 'UFOs' sighted in this sea area than in other sea areas? Why do more planes and ships disappear here than anywhere else? Because we are dealing with a highly explosive military, strategic and communications-relevant area. What, however, is consciously suppressed by the secrecy group and simply ignored by uninitiated or ignorant authors:

Let's start with the Bermuda Islands, which give their name to this triangle. As early as the 18th century they were expanded into a British naval base and later expanded to include an air base. In 1941, England also leased two areas to the USA for 99 years to establish a naval and air force base.

With a contract dated September 2, 1940, parts of the Bahamas were also leased from England to the United States for 99 years and the latter expanded them into another fleet and air base. (Preparatory measures by the USA for its entry into war against Germany.) The Bahamas have been described as so-called independent since 1973, but the head of state is still the English Queen.

Puerto Rico is subordinate to the USA. This island occupies a strategically important position as the eastern flank protection of the USA; on the one hand with the naval port of San Juan on the island, on the other hand with the naval base in Saint Thomas on the Virgin Islands to the east, English: Virgin Islands (Meyers Lexikon, 1940).
Puerto Rico is also the hub for all submarine cable connections (telephone) on the entire US east coast, especially for New York (center of the Jewish bankers) and Washington DC (seat of government for the gangsters, also contemptuously called 'Chicago Boys' by many Americans), via Bermuda, as well as for the state of Florida with the US space center Cape Canaveral. Also as a connection to the South American continent via Caracas (Venezuela).

The most important thing on this island is probably the largest radio grid telescope system in the world, built in 1964 in a valley near Arecibo, with a diameter of 305m. In order to make the facility appear harmlessly scientific, it was built by Cornell University, but was taken over by the US War Department (Pentagon) immediately after completion. On April 8, 1960, the Americans began Project OZMA to establish 'contact with extraterrestrial intelligences', as they trivialize it to the public. Project OZMA was started at the 28 m telescope in Green Bank, but was moved there after the much larger and more powerful facility on Puerto Rico was completed. The results obtained via OZMA were immediately declared secret by the Pentagon. (21*, pp.139-142)

I wonder why? Because it's really about cracking the internal message CODE of the so-called UFOs! It is known that the German Wehrmacht's radio CODE was cracked by the Allies due to treason, but it is also known that the German naval CODE has not been deciphered to this day. Given the technical soaring on the German side before and after 1945 (UFOs, USOs), it remains questionable whether the known wave ranges were still used at all, or whether the usual radio was able to be completely overcome and instead opened up possibilities that lie beyond school scientific ideas. In many Allied and other states, efforts have long been made to identify the 'extraterrestrials' using radio telescopes and other techniques, the ' higher intelligences in space', and the Soviet Union, for example at the Radiophysical Institute or whatever you like occasionally in Gorky, under the direction of Dr. V. Troitzky, a but also in the world's oceans, to tap into information technology. Under 'listening' program against the flying discs, but as was cautiously revealed between the lines, so far without any success.

The Arecibo facility also serves as an essential communications link for the White House, the Pentagon, NASA Control Center in Houston (on the Gulf of Mexico), and Cape Canaveral; partly coupled with the military satellites in space. This is probably the main reason why Puerto Rico has been literally swarmed and besieged by 'UFOs' in various years, often for months. Over the mountains of Adjuntas in the interior of Puerto Rico, whole swarms of UFOs appeared again and again over a period of three months, almost as if on a fixed schedule. They sent out sideways beams of light, flew in closed formation (a German form of flight; inserted by the author) at a low altitude - about 300 m - made precise right-angle turns (impossible for an airplane), hovered motionless in the air and then suddenly disappeared without a trace. (13*, p.219)

In his book 'Spurlos', Berlitz describes various UFO events and sightings on the island and then names the months August, September, October 1972 for the mass sightings mentioned above.

Jean Prachan, 'UFOs in the Bermuda Triangle', has a similar report from 1973: It is important to note here that in 1973 the Caribbean, Puerto Rico and the southern part of the triangle were hit by a real wave of UFOs. The peak of this 'wave' was in October/November. Dozens of objects have been observed in the Caribbean, all appearing and submerging.' (8*, p.112)

To go into more detail, we take a passage from ßerlitz 'Spurlos' about events in Puerto Rico: Although UFO sightings have been reported by millions of observers from all parts of the world, they seem to be concentrated in the Bermuda Triangle. In Puerto Rico, for example, in 1972 they appeared with such frequency that there were severe traffic jams as people informed by television, radio and the press flocked to the highways to observe swarms of UFOs and their precise maneuvers in the night sky.

Some drivers experienced another surprise on their drive home from watching the demonstration in the sky. At a certain point between San Sebastian and Lares (located in the interior of the island) a huge, low-flying UFO appeared, while at the same time all the car engines stopped and only restarted when the UFO sent out orange and red flashes of light or flames , suddenly rose vertically and disappeared.

During the same period, in Rio Piedras, a suburb of San Juan (here is the US naval port; inserted by the author), a huge UFO also appeared during an outdoor birthday party, blinding those present with a greenish-blue light emitted as it glided very close - about 100 meters above the party guests.

Numerous other people also observed the phenomenon from nearby homes as the UFO slowly floated between two twenty-story apartment buildings; several cars stopped because their engines stopped. Suddenly the strange flying object rose vertically in a cloud of red mist, changed direction, headed towards a nearby power plant and suddenly disappeared (it probably made itself invisible at that moment, which we will talk about later; inserted by the author). (13*, p.219/220)

Many individual examples could be cited from the island, but let's get back to the topic: The phenomena about Puerto Rico are in no way limited to the two years 1972/73 and there should be no doubt at all that this important information center of the USA is constantly tapped by the 'UFOs' in order to be precisely informed about the military and criminal nuclear intentions of the opponents. So much for Puerto Rico.

To the west, the Bermuda Triangle is bordered by the American east coast, mainly Florida, where various military bases such as Fort Lauderdale, scattered missile launch pads and, above all, the American 'spaceport' are located. In the maritime area off Florida, it was not only the Soviet military that was spying, observing all operations and launches from Cape Canaveral, camouflaged by seemingly harmless merchant ships and fishing boats - despite the Allied alliance with the USA. Here the flying disks are also in constant observational readiness; they accompanied the USA's Apollo spacecraft to the moon, as was well known, and they monitor all takeoffs and landings. Controlled, it would be better to say, because since the Challenger was shot down the Americans have apparently had a launch ban imposed by the 'higher intelligentsia', which they have themselves to blame for. With the 'Green Box' on board, which contained capsules with highly toxic substances that kill in two seconds - as the daily press reported - the Chicago boys were apparently once again planning one of their usual large-scale crimes, perhaps against one another of German bases and bases at the North or South Pole. We will discuss the Challenger explosion and the Green Box in detail in the next brochure about space, which has already been announced. Let us also remember that one of the main tasks set by the German flying disc force is to prevent a nuclear war; which they have successfully done for decades.

Furthermore, the triangle is also affected by the trouble spot Cuba, which has become communist . Here there are pro-communist agent activities as well as pro-American ones, who use seemingly harmless fishing boats, merchant ships and private sailing yachts as camouflage.

It is also worth mentioning that the entire maritime area off the east and south coasts of the USA - including the Bermuda Triangle - is the busiest area on earth in terms of shipping and air traffic.

We have shown sufficiently that this sea and island area is of outstanding strategic and military importance, which also makes the constant presence, or rather surveillance, of so-called UFOs and USOs understandable: The series of UFO sightings in 1972 is Only exceptional because of the large number of eyewitnesses. UFO sightings as such are so common on the coast of Florida, the Bahamas, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Cuba and other Caribbean islands, as well as near and over Bermuda and the sea between these islands, that they are covered on the radio and in the press hardly ever be mentioned if they were only seen by a few people. Only when thousands of people notice the same phenomenon does it become newsworthy for the mass media. But even then, due to the frequency of such observations, they are soon forgotten and filed away. (13*, p.222)

The Bermuda archipelago alone consists of 350 islands and islets, of which only 20 are inhabited. The conditions are similar in the Greater Antilles and the Bahamas. The latter consist of 29 larger, mostly inhabited islands, 660 mostly uninhabited islets and 2,400 rocky cliffs and coral reefs, which extend from Florida to 900 km in a southeasterly direction. It is no exaggeration to assume that there are several thousand islands and islets for the entire sea area discussed here. Truly an ideal area for underwater bases and hideouts for the USOs and secret landing opportunities for flying discs. Therefore, assumptions and even claims about UFO and USO bases in the Bermuda Triangle have been made in the relevant literature for decades.

As Grand Admiral Dönitz said to naval cadets in Laboe near Kiel in October 1944?: The German Navy still has a special task to fulfill in the future... The German Navy knows all the hiding places of the seas and it will be easy for it... . (see 'Secret Wonder Weapons' , Bd.I, S.43)

Das Todesdreieck auf der Landkarte

Tausend Menschen in 20 Jahren verschollen — Flugzeuge erforschen atmosphärische Störungen — Ein unheimlicher Fleck

Von dem SÜDKURIER-Mitarbeiter A. Kenley, Washington

„Projekt Magnet" der US-Marine soll ein Rätsel lösen, welches seit hundert Jahren die Schiffahrt und seit 20 Jahren die Luftfahrt bewegt: Die atmosphärischen und magnetischen Verhältnisse im sogenannten Bermuda- oder Todesdreieck. Seine Basis bildet die 1700 Kilometer lange Luftlinie zwischen Puerto Rico und einem Punkt zwischen West Palm Beach und Orlando an der Ostküste Floridas. Zieht man von ihm und von Puerto Rico auf der Karte Linien zu den Bermuda-Inseln, so erhält man eine 1500 Kilometer lange westliche und 1550 Kilometer lange östliche Seitenlinie. In diesem Dreieck verschwinden seit 100 Jahren Schiffe und neuerdings auch Flugzeuge, ohne Spuren zu hinterlassen.

Ein Unglück vom 5. Dezember 1945, bei welchem fünf Avenger-Torpedobomber mit 20 Mann Besatzung in diesem Raum verloren gingen, ohne daß man Wrackteile fand, lenkte die Aufmerksamkeit des US-Verteidigungsministerium auf das Dreieck. In den Vorfall war noch ein Marineflugboot verwickelt, das zur Suche startete und 20 Minuten später ebenfalls keine Nachricht mehr gab. Im Januar 1948 ging eine Passagiermaschine mit 31 Menschen verloren, welche von den Azoren nach Kuba gestartet war. Eine viermotorige Maschine verschwand im Bermuda-Dreieck am 17. Januar 1949. Im Oktober 1954 war es eine amerikanische Super-Constellation mit 42 Personen an Bord; obwohl sie zwei voneinander unabhängige Funkanlagen hatte, gab sie wie die anderen verschollenen Maschinen keinen Notruf. Am 9. November 1956 ging dort ein Patrouillen-Flugzeug der US-Marine verloren.

Die jüngsten Fälle betreffen drei Flugzeuge und zwei Schiffe. Am 8. Januar 1962

reidampfer „Sno' Boy" mit 40 Personen vermißt, von dem sich nach zehntägiger Suche nicht einmal ein Holzstück fand. Im August schließlich flogen aus Florida zwei Strato-Tanker vom Typ KC-135 zu einer Luft-Tankübung aus und gaben vor dem Dreieck noch Positionsmeldung, um dann nichts wieder von sich hören zu lassen.

Keine Leiche gefunden

Das Schiffsregister meldet aus jenem Raum noch mehr Schiffverluste, als dort Flugzeuge verschollen sind. Als man die älteren Bände aufschlug, zeigte es sich, daß seit hundert Jahren dort dauernd Fahrzeuge verschwunden sind, deren Untergang keine Erklärung fand. Ab 1945 forderte das Bermuda-Dreieck rund tausend Menschenleben. Nicht eine Leiche wurde aufgefischt. Das rief eine gemeinsame Aktion der amerikanischen und kanadischen Kriegsmarine ins Leben, das „Projekt Magnet".

Eine Anzahl Super-Constellations mit empfindlichen Meßgeräten beobachten die atmosphärischen und magnetischen Verhältnisse dieser Region. Bereits 1950 hatte ein kanadischer Regierungsexperte bei Versuchsflügen im Dreieck „Schichten von verminderter atmosphärischer Bindung" festgestellt, welche als Abweichungen Kompaß, Funk und elektronische Geräte beeinflussen. Die letzten kanadisch-amerikanischen Messungen ergaben etwas Einmaliges, nämlich „besondere magnetische Kräfte, die nicht von der Erde, sondern von oben kommen", wie es hieß. Anscheinend lösen sie plötzliche Katastrophen bei Flugzeugen und Schiffen aus, die sich hinterher nicht mehr nachweisen lassen.

sie wie die anderen verschollenen Maschinen keinen Notruf. Am 9. November 1956 ging dort ein Patrouillen-Flugzeug der US-Marine verloren.

Die jüngsten Fälle betreffen drei Flugzeuge und zwei Schiffe. Am 8. Januar 1962 schnitt ein Düsen-Tankflugzeug auf der Route Virginie—Azoren das Todesdreieck und kam nicht über dessen Grenzen hinaus. Am 2. Februar 1963 ging ein Schwefeltanker mit 39 Besatzungsmitgliedern auf der Reise von Beaumont (Texas) nach Norfolk (Virginia) in jenem Raum unter; von ihm wurden noch schwache, aber verstümmelte Signale aufgefangen. Seit dem 1. Juli 1963 wird im Bermuda-Dreieck der Fische-

Eine einzige Andeutung über ihre Art besitzen wir im letzten Funkspruch eines der fünf Torpedobomber, die zusammen am 5. Dezember 1945 abstürzten. Der Flugschwadronsführer sagte mit halb erstickter Stimme: „Wir scheinen verloren zu sein — — alles geht falsch — — seltsam! Auch der Ozean sieht nicht so aus, wie er aussehen sollte . . ." Damit war die Verbindung für immer unterbrochen.

Lloyds meldet: 20 Schiffe spurlos verschwunden

Spukt es im Bermuda-Dreieck wirklich? Wieder sind zwei indische Frachter mit 44 Seeleuten an Bord spurlos verschwunden.

In den letzten fünf Jahren verschwanden 20 Frachter auf den Weltmeeren. Auch zwei deutsche: Von der „Rugwardersand" (1569 Tonnen) kam am 18. Februar 1981 das letzte Rufzeichen aus dem Mittelmeer, und die „Wheststar" (1205 Tonnen) meldete sich am 6. Mai 1981 zuletzt aus dem Atlantik vor Portugal – kein Brett, kein Tuch kam je zum Vorschein.

Lloyds-Versicherung in London: „Bis heute gibt es keine Erklärung für das Verschwinden." Die Engländer veröffentlichten eine Karte, in der alle seit 1980 verschollenen Schiffe eingezeichnet sind – die meisten im Bermuda-Dreieck. bri

Jedes Jahr verschwinden fünf Schiffe spurlos

Bremen (dpa/vwd). Fünf Handelsschiffe verschwinden durchschnittlich in jedem Jahr ohne eine Spur zu hinterlassen. Obwohl die Rettungseinrichtungen verbessert wurden, gingen von 1975 bis 1984 nach Angaben des Bremer Instituts für Seeverkehrswirtschaft 52 Handelsschiffe verloren, ohne daß ein Zeuge aufzutreiben war. Insgesamt mußten in diesem Zeitraum weltweit 3 770 Handelsschiffe mit einer Tonnage von rund 15,6 Millionen BRT als Totalverluste abgeschrieben werden. Besonders verlustträchtig waren die Jahre 1979 mit 456 und 1984 mit 327 Schiffen.

...und das sind nur die Handelsschiffe, ohne Kriegsschiffe, ohne Flugzeuge !
...und ferner werden die Angaben zur Verharmlosung nach unten frisiert !

Ship and aircraft accidents are as old as shipping and aviation themselves. Every year, an average of 250-300 ships sink in all of the world's oceans, with a clearance rate of 90-95%. We are interested in the majority of unsolved cases here. Ships or airplanes that mysteriously disappear without a trace or are found floating completely intact but deserted.
More than 600 vessels disappeared off the coast of the United States between 1974 and 1976, many of them in the Triangle. (13*, p. 68)

Similar to December 1944 and December 1945, on December 19, 1946 there were five US P-47 fighter aircraft in the airspace of the Bermuda Triangle. A sixth aircraft accompanied the convoy and witnessed it flying into a cloud, but only four of the original five aircraft emerged. During the search operation that was then initiated, two of the B-17 'Flying Fortresses' involved were also missing and were not found again. (14*, p.126)

Superfortress C-54:
On July 3, 1947, an American Army C-54 with a crew of six disappeared on a routine flight from the Bermuda Islands to Morrison Military Airport near Palm Beach. The plane's last known position was about 100 miles from Bermuda. An immediate search effort by the Army, Navy and Coast Guard at sea and in the air spanned 100,000 square miles of sea surface. No oil stains or wreckage were spotted. (12*, p. 32/33)

After a fruitless search, American Air Force officials hypothesized that a powerful current of rising air near a storm cloud might have destroyed the bomber . (15*, p.118; also 8*; 15*; 16*)

Then the US Air Force should be seriously advised to only carry out their flights when the sky is clear!

Another complicated mystery was the loss of three aircraft from the British 'South American Airline': Star Dust, Star Tieger and Star Ariel - all of the Tudor IV type. (16*, p.16)
The Star Tiger, a four-engine passenger aircraft..., a converted Lancaster bomber, disappeared on January 29, 1948 on a flight from the Azores to the Bermuda Islands. On board the plane were a crew of six and twenty-five passengers, including Sir Arthur Cunningham, Lieutenant General of the British Air Force in World War II and former commander of the Second Tactical Air Fleet. The Star Tiger was scheduled to land at Kinley Airport in Bermuda. Shortly before ETA (estimated time of arrival) at 10:30 p.m., the pilot transmitted a message to the control tower that included the phrases: 'Weather and flight conditions excellent' and 'Expecting scheduled landing'. The aircraft's position was given as 380 miles northeast of Bermuda.
No further reports were made, but the Star Tiger did not reach its destination. There was no SOS, no emergency call, no indication that the flight was not going under the best conditions. At midnight the Star Tiger was called reported overdue, and a full-scale relief operation began the next day, January 30th. Thirty aircraft and ten ships searched the area for several days without success. (12*, p.33; also 8*; 16*; 12*)

Almost exactly a year later, on January 17, 1949, the sister aircraft, the Star Ariel, disappeared under almost similar conditions and in an equally mysterious manner: 'position about 180 miles (290 km) south of Bermuda,' reported Captain McPhee, an experienced pilot with 4200 flying hours; 'Weather good. I'm switching over to the Nassau frequency' .
That was his last radio message.
The 'Star Ariel', seven crew members and thirteen passengers were never seen again.
At this time, maneuvers were taking place in an area several hundred kilometers south of Bermuda, in which a battleship, aircraft carriers, cruisers, destroyers and others took part. This entire fleet immediately set out to search. Two destroyers even went to a spot 480 km south of Bermuda where a US Air Force airliner and a bomber had seen a green glow over the sea. Thousands of square kilometers were combed: not one oil patch, not one aircraft part, not one body.

However, the search soon had a new target, the fishing boat 'Driftwood', which had also disappeared while crossing from Fort Lauderdale to Bimini with five men on board. But both the 'Star Ariel' and the 'Driftwood' remained untraceable. (8*, p.35)

Elsewhere, Prachan again emphasizes this peculiar green glow and writes: On that day, January 17, 1949, to my knowledge, no UFO was seen. But one should not forget in this context that two aircraft, a bomber from the US Air Force and a passenger aircraft from the English company BOAC, which were independently involved in the search operation, reported that they were on the water where the plane disappeared , saw a strange greenish glow. The cases of the 'Star Tiger' and the 'Star Ariel' are much more similar than the official reports suggest. Perhaps today both aircraft are side by side somewhere 8,000 or 9,000 meters under the sea, surrounded by completely waterproof retaining walls that belong to an undersea base. That is now the question.

'Many researchers have long been aware of the connection between UFOs and the Bermuda Triangle, a connection that has nothing to do with coincidence,' writes the correspondent for 'UFO Report', whom I have quoted before.
'Long ago' is probably a bit of an exaggeration, as this connection has only been talked about since 1973. It is surprising that it has taken so long to establish your connection, but it is important to remember that the public has only recently become aware of the events in the Bermuda Triangle. Although there were rumors in certain circles (in the army, air force and among sailors, for example) about the intervention of UFOs, until 1973 no one dared to say it publicly. (8*, p.148; also 12*; 16*; 17*)
The other sister aircraft, the Star Dust, was lost off the Chilean coast in 1947.

Star Ariel

Am 17. Januar verschwand die «Star Ariel», eine Passagiermaschine der British South American Airways Corporation, unter ähnlichen Umständen wie genau ein Jahr zuvor ihre Schwestermaschine, die «Star Tiger». Mit 7 Mann Besatzung und 13 Passagieren startete das viermotorige Flugzeug von Kindley Field, Bermuda, hinein in einen schönen Morgenhimmel zu einem Flug nach Jamaika. Eine Stunde später setzte Flugkapitän McPhee eine Routineflugmeldung nach Bermuda ab: «Wir sind auf Reisehöhe, das Wetter ist gut. Voraussichtliche Ankunftszeit in Kingston wie geplant.» Von der «Star Ariel» wurde nie wieder etwas gesehen oder gehört. Man wußte, daß das Flugzeug zum Zeitpunkt seines letzten Funkspruchs auf Kurs gewesen war, und die Navigationsausrüstung garantierte, daß es auf dem richtigen Weg bzw. nahe daran bleiben würde. Wäre die Maschine auf Grund eines technischen Defektes abgestürzt, wären Wrackteile über ein weites Gebiet verstreut gewesen. Wäre es zu einer Notwasserung gekommen, auf einer wie man weiß sehr ruhigen See, hätte es einige Überlebende geben müssen. Zumindest wären die beiden Rettungsflöße automatisch aus ihren Halterungen in den Tragflächen ausgelöst und gefunden worden. Doch die intensive Suche, die bei ausgezeichnetem Wetter stattfand, war vergebens. Nicht eine Spur der Maschine oder ihrer Passagiere wurde je gefunden.

Eine vom Ministerium für Zivile Luftfahrt durchgeführt Untersuchung war außerstande, die Ursache des Verschwindens zu erklären.

Nach dem Bericht des Ministeriums für Zivile Luftfahrt hatte die Maschine für den 5 1/2-Stunden-Flug Treibstoff für 10 Stunden an Bord. Sie flog mit Rückenwind und hatte eine relativ leichte Ladung. Das Wetter war ausgezeichnet, die Maschine befand sich über der Frostgrenze, ein Vereisen war also ausgeschlossen.*

Die Besatzung bestand aus sehr fähigen Leuten. Kapitän McPhee hatte 2400 Flugstunden, 2000 davon als Kapitän von BSAA-Maschinen, und er besaß langjährige Erfahrung auf der Route, auf der er verschwand. Die übrigen Offiziere waren erfahren, besonders der Funker war bekannt für seine überragenden Fähigkeiten. Die vier Rolls-Royce-Motoren hatten sich alle in der Vergangenheit bewährt, und es gab keinen Grund für den Verdacht, sie hätten irgendeinen Defekt aufgewiesen. Die De Havilland-Propeller hatten in der Geschichte der Tudor niemals versagt. Die Maschine verfügte über eine komplette Navigationsausrüstung mit mehreren Empfängern und Sendern, Richtungsfindern, einem Radiokompaß und Radar.

Die Rettungsausrüstung bestand aus drei aufblasbaren Schlauchbooten, von denen jedes Platz für 15 – 18 Personen hatte und mit Rettungshilfen bei Seenot, erster Hilfe und einem Funkgerät versehen war. Das Radio im Schlauchboot, das sich im Innern des Flugzeuges befand, hatte einen automatischen SOS-Sender mit einer geschätzten Reichweite bis zu ca. 75 Meilen.

Bei einer evtl. Berührung des Flugzeuges mit Wasser würden durch einen automatischen Schaltvorgang die Schlauchboote aus ihren Halterungen gelöst und aufgeblasen. Schwimmwesten für alle Passagiere und die Besatzung befanden sich an Bord, und zusätzlich zu den regulären Türen gab es 5 Notausgänge für den Ernstfall.

Ein technischer Defekt als Ursache des Unglücks wurde von vornherein ausgeschlossen, da er durch die Art und Weise, wie sich die Tudor in der Vergangenheit bewährt hatte, äußerst unwahrscheinlich schien. Die Maschine war mehr als 350 Stunden ohne Probleme geflogen, die Meteorologen waren sicher, daß es entlang der Route keine Turbulenzen gegeben haben konnte. Hätte ein Konstruktionsdefekt vorgelegen, hätte der bei einer Flughöhe von 6000 m recht niedrige Innendruck wohl kaum zu einem Zerbersten der Maschine geführt.

Die Möglichkeit von Sabotage wurde nicht völlig ausgeschlossen. Man fand jedoch keinen Beweis dafür, daß sie bei einer Katastrophe eine Rolle gespielt haben könnte.

Nach dem Wetterbericht des Königlichen Meteorologischen Instituts gab es keine wetterbedingten Komplikationen irgendwelcher Art. Es gab entlang der Route zwar einige Wolken, doch lagen sie alle beträchtlich unter der Flughöhe. Über den Wolken war die Sicht unbegrenzt, darunter nur leicht beeinträchtigt.

* Eis kann sich auf einem Flugzeug nur nahe der Frostgrenze bilden. Über der entsprechenden Höhe sind die Wasserpartikelchen gefroren und haften nicht an der Maschine.

Even before the Star Ariel, a chartered DC-3 took off from San Juan, Puerto Rico at 10:30 p.m. on December 27, 1948, heading for Miami, Florida. This small type of aircraft was long considered by Americans to be the most reliable machine ever built. The weather was excellent, the pilots were experienced and captain Robert Linquist, co-pilot Ernest Hill Jr., stewardess Mary Burks, three other crew members and 29 passengers from New York City could already see the fairy lights of Miami in front of their eyes after a pleasant flight. It was now dawn, and at 4:30 a.m. Captain Linquist sent the following radio message received from the radio tower: 'We are approaching the airport... Only 50 miles south... We can already see the lights of Miami. Everything is fine on board, we will report later for shore instructions.' The control tower confirmed reception, but never heard anything from the machine again, no SOS call, no MAYDAY message, no explosion was heard, no flash of light was seen. The plane literally disappeared before the eyes of the flight control team, especially over the Florida Kays, where the water depth is only 5-7 m, the water is so clear that the seabed can at least be seen from the aircraft, and wreckage can be seen immediately would be. But the search operation that was initiated immediately was without any success. 50 aircraft, ten ships and a dozen smaller watercraft were involved in the search operation. The Army, Navy and Coast Guard combed an area of 100,000 - according to another source 300,000 - square miles by sea and air and again not a lifebuoy, a piece of wreckage, an oil stain or any other trace was found. The DC-3 has remained missing to this day. (8*; 12*; 15*; 16*; 17*; DNZ No. 8/1975)

D. Group gives the following summary of these aircraft losses: These and other losses since 1947 have all the basic elements of the typical disappearance of aircraft over the Bermuda Triangle: It is a quiet night. The plane, which usually stays less than a hundred kilometers from the coast, broadcasts the last message before entering Triangle airspace. Everything is fine and the pilot believes that they will arrive on time. Only when no more messages arrive within the calculated time until landing does the ground crew become restless and send out a search plane. But you can't find anything. The investigative commissions are at a loss. Losses continued to mount in the 1960s and 1970s. (16*, p. 16/ 17)

1950 was a quiet year. On April 5, the Puerto Rican freighter Sandra set sail from Savannah, Georgia, bound for Venezuela with 340 tons of DDT and was never seen again. (15*, pp.148-149 and other sources)

In March an American 'Globemaster' disappeared in the northern part of the triangle on the way to Ireland and on June 9, 1950 another DC-3, about which we lack further information in the cases. (8*; 16*)

Among those cases that occurred in the Bermuda Triangle after the end of World War II, the loss of the Brazilian warship Sao Paulo is particularly curious. The Sao Paulo, which was intended for scrapping and only had a supervisory crew of eight men on board, was moored to two ocean-going tugs. The association was located southwest of the Azores. On the night of October 3rd to 4th (misprint, must say November) 1951, the towed ship suddenly disappeared. Due to rough seas, one of the tugs had loosened the ropes on the night of November 3rd.
On the morning of November 4th the sea was calm again. Then it was noticed that the cables to the second tug were torn and the Sao Paulo was missing. As planes and ships searched for her, strange phenomena occurred: unexplained lights were seen at night and early in the morning, and the next day the ships and planes reported the appearance of dark shapes or shapes on the surface of the sea, which soon disappeared. No trace was found of Sao Paulo and its team.
Most commentaries on the events in the Bermuda Triangle are content to portray them as unsolvable mysteries. But others, namely those who have studied this phenomenon most in depth, suggest that the inexplicable disappearances of ships, planes and people are connected to intelligent terrestrial or extraterrestrial beings. This view is shared by a growing number of people, perhaps because there is no other logical explanation for the phenomenon. (12*, p.61)
The investigation into the case of the Brazilian warship Sao Paulo, which was supposed to be brought into a dry dock by two tugs and suddenly disappeared from the towing ropes with the supervisory crew in the early hours of November 4, 1951, did not rule out the inexplicable light phenomena that occurred during the night had been noticed before disappearing through a cloud of fog in the sky. The aircraft crews, who then carried out an intensive search operation, found no trace of the missing cruiser, but gave a strange report that spoke of unusually dark patches of fog or very low clouds in the area where the ship was believed to be have to find. (13*, p.230 and p.49, as well as 8*, p.191 and 16*, p.196)

Other ships and aircraft that did not disappear sometimes reported strange malfunctions and failures of instruments and previously unknown weather anomalies , such as: In such cases, the crews had to experience that the instruments malfunctioned, the compasses spun, the propulsion systems failed and they lost control lost about their plane or ship; They also saw a strange firelight nebula or 'milk zone'. in which all contours, including the horizon, blurred into a whitish haze . Despite all this, they managed to leave the scary area and get their vehicle back under control.

July 7,

1955: WJMorris, a former sailor of the 'Atlantic City', saw the automatic steering mechanism become 'independent' and steer the ship completely in a circle, at the same time a ball lightning could be seen . Some of the navigation equipment and electrical equipment were then no longer usable. (18*)
Was this so-called ball lightning the unmanned fireballs developed in Germany before 1945?
(See 'Secret Miracle Weapons' Vol.III, p.15-22) The events in the B. Triangle seem to be so dramatic and, above all, so frequent that a special magazine is published in the USA: 'The Bermuda Triangle Special Report' concerned with these events. In 1977, the American journalist Rufus Drake reported on a lieutenant in the American army named LeRoy R.Jackson. We quote from Jean Prachan: 'UFOs in the Bermuda Triangle': But Lieutenant LeRoy R.Jackson did not hesitate to tell Rufus Drake everything he knew. Among other things, he told him about an OV 1 (a photo reconnaissance aircraft) that encountered a strange, very dense cloud formation over the Bermud had encountered. The plane's pilot was in this formation for over forty minutes and was thrown around 'like a football'. Eventually the weather calmed down and the plane reached its destination, but an hour earlier than planned. Judging by the flight plan, the wind speed and the instruments, an hour has simply ceased to exist.

Berlitz and other authors have cited other cases of time lapse over the Bermuda Triangle. For us this is a completely fantastic claim and, given the state of our science, unbelievable. ....
If the military didn't take their duty of confidentiality so seriously, we could certainly cite many similar anecdotes. So many other strange things happen in the Bermuda Triangle zone: radio silence, white waters, failure of instruments and compasses, inexplicable air holes, machines shaking 'as if by the hand of a giant', optical anomalies, bluish and greenish lights, the sudden cockpit or the cargo area of the machine, destruction of the electrical circuits, violent storms, clouds of smoke rising from the water, etc.

Machine Translated by Google

And these are just some of the phenomena that occur again and again; ... (8*, p.122/123)

December 11, 1970:

Pilot Bruce Gernon Jr. recorded massive cloud formation in the form of squiggles directly on the sea surface. As he flew over it, the magnetic and electronic instruments failed and he lost contact with the radar control. When he reached his destination, he felt that he was 30 minutes short of the normal flight time.

December 16, 1974:

Mike Roxby, pilot of a Cessna 172, suffered instrument and radio failure twice in one day, the second time having fatal consequences. A surviving passenger said the crash was related to a "cloud that appeared out of nowhere . " (18*)

In the course of a conversation about the disappearances of ships and aircraft in the Bermuda Triangle, an officer in the U.S. Third Marine Division expressed a widespread but certainly unofficial opinion: 'It's a real mystery. Nobody in the Navy is laughing at this thing. We always knew there was something going on with the Bermuda Triangle. But no one could figure out what. Apparently there is no physical or logical cause. It's almost as if the ships were suddenly covered with some sort of electronic camouflage net .

According to our current school science, which only ever recognizes what it has mastered or understood, these phenomena described above should not exist at all. Not only that, school science, like politics and the press, is a whore. Just as the latter two serve the rulers, school science serves to secure the world view of the rulers. Fundamental scientific findings therefore only ever came from individuals, often from outsiders in science. As Adolf Hitler said: Jewish-liberal science in conjunction with the Judeo-Christian religion is a conspiracy that must be exploded.

Just think of the fate of Kepler, Copernicus and Galileo. Anyone who doubts or even refutes the foundations of the Old Testament, Jewish-Oriental worldview will be destroyed; at that time like today. Justus von Liebig also recognized the controlled limitations within science in his time when he said: 'Science actually only begins to become interesting where it ends.'

However, intellectual impoverishment and controlled dumbing down are the basic prerequisites for the gradual enslavement of humanity that has been going on for centuries; whereby Judao-Christianity as well as the Jewish-controlled republics and democracies were and still are only steps on the way to a total 'one-world' dictatorship based on the Jewish communist model.

But in the 1920s and 1930s a group began to finally and permanently break down the intellectual narrowness of false religion and false school science. What else did Adolf Hitler say in this context?: 'There is a Nordic and National Socialist science that is opposed to Jewish-liberal science.' That is why it is so difficult for us today, unless we have freed ourselves from the intellectual shackles, to understand and unconditionally classify these extraordinary processes in all parts of the world, including the many small side effects.

'According to the laws of aerodynamics and as can be easily proven through wind tunnel experiments, the bumblebee is incapable of flying. The size, weight and shape of its body in relation to its wingspan make it impossible for it to fly. But the bumblebee, which is ignorant of these scientific facts, is not deterred by this and flies anyway.'

Let us return to the events in the Bermuda Triangle, although for reasons of space we must limit ourselves to individual interesting events. The loss of the three 'sulphur ships' is also worth mentioning: On December 2, 1954, the 3,337 ton Southern Districts left Port Sulfur on the Mississippi in Texas, loaded with sulfur, bound for Bucksport in the US state of Maine. The ship was only built in 1944 as a landing ship for invasion purposes against Germany. Later after the conversion it served the US Navy for sulfur transport. Most likely on December 5th - exactly 9 years after the disappearance of the 5 TBM bombers - the Southern Districts off the coast of Florida also disappeared. The Navy and Coast Guard searched 262,000 square miles without any success. (New York Times, five reports from December and January 1954/55; 15*, pp. 154-156 and other sources).

At the beginning of February 1963 (4.2.63, 1.25 a.m., last radio message) the 129 m long sulfur ship Marine Sulfur Queen, belonging to the US Navy, disappeared . It was also a converted warship from WWII and was now traveling from Beaumont in Texas to Norfolk in Virginia with 15,000 tons of liquid sulfur in steel tanks. The ship's last position report came from near the Dry Tortugas. The Navy's Commission of Inquiry noted 'that

The Marine Sulfur Queen disappeared on the open sea without sending an SOS, but offered no valid hypothesis or solution to the mystery (Berlitz). Other sources: (15*, pp.168-177; 17*, pp.107-112; and others).

Exactly 9 years to the day after the Marine Sulfur Queen set sail, on February 2, 1972, the sulfur ship VA Fogg crashed near the coast in the Gulf of Mexico. The trip was supposed to go from Freeport, Texas, less than 80 km through the open sea, along the coast, to Galveston and from there through the shipping lane to Houston. Presumably after an explosion, the ship was found days later at a depth of just 30 meters. (17*, p.111-113; 16*, p.17; 18*; 8*, p.196)

Gunpowder, or black powder, which is rarely used today, contained 10% sulfur. The question arises, does sulfur have any significant significance to the US Navy? Or the other question: could the other side, the 'third power', be interested in larger quantities of sulfur?

Recent eyewitnesses say that in the 'Devil's Triangle' the sky turns sulfur yellow on clear days. The sea then no longer resembles water. .... A similar inexplicable destruction mechanism in space has now seriously damaged American and Russian space probes eight times on the journey to the planet Mars, etc. (19*)

The US Coast Guard's cable-laying and 'research ship', the Yamacraw, had a rather strange and disturbing experience on August 8, 1956. She was confronted with a 'ghost island', like the 'Hollyhock', a US Coast Guard buoy tender, in 1974: although the ship (the Yamacraw) was hundreds of kilometers from land, both mainland and islands, the apparition of Considering its size, it makes for a small island. Both men (from security) checked the instruments. They all worked very well. When they noticed that the ghost island was getting closer, they informed the captain. He wanted to examine the apparition up close. When they were 300 meters away, they turned around and sailed past Ghost Island, which looked like a huge mud wall. Although the phenomenon had not appeared on the radar screen to touch the surface of the water, it now appeared to be moving toward the ship. The height of the apparition could not be determined. The ship carefully steered into the nebula-like wall, which seemed to be made of sulfur fumes . It was found that not even the bright light of the carbon lamps could penetrate this fog. Soon the men on deck had difficulty breathing. They felt a scratchy sensation in their throat. The steam pressure began to fall in the engine room. Just as the captain gave the order to turn, the ship broke through the 'smoke screen', 300 meters from where it had entered the 'smoke'. When it became light, the strange fog had disappeared. (16*, 122-124)

Charles Berlitz, who also covers the Yamacraw experience in his book 'Spurless', speculates: 'It is also possible that the Yamacraw sailed into the dense sulfur fumes of an undersea volcanic eruption,' although he previously wrote: 'This compact mass , the could not be penetrated by radar or powerful searchlights, but was not land, as it stood above the surface of the water and appeared to rise indefinitely against the sky, extending to the southwest at an apparently great but undetectable distance. 'This 'compact mass', or 'rising wall' was first detected by radar, but could not be penetrated by radar; which would not apply to sulfur vapors from a volcanic eruption. Nor was it that when driving into this 'fog-like wall', electromagnetic interference occurred and all the lighting went out.

Group, but especially Berlitz, report on five American. Fighter aircraft of the type 'Super Sabre', which flew into a cloud immediately after take-off from Bermuda - they were barely 900 meters away - from which only four aircraft emerged. The incident was witnessed by ground personnel at the military airfield as well as other aircraft and nearby ships. Victor Haywood was working on the satellite target tracking program at the time, January 1960, and describes the process here as an eyewitness: At around 1 p.m. on a sunny, almost cloudless day, five American Air Force Super Sabers took off from the military base in Kindley (St. Davids) in Bermuda. The author of these lines, along with four or five others who worked on the island, watched the take-off with great interest, as the Super Saber was a relatively rare aircraft at the time - at least in the Bermuda area.

The planes took off particularly quickly due to their afterburning, formed up and disappeared into a large cloud about half a mile from the coast. This cloud was - at least in its two-dimensional extent - fully visible to us observers. The five aircraft were tracked simultaneously on the air traffic control radar screens, as required by the military authorities for every takeoff and landing.
Five fighter jets flew into the cloud and only four emerged from it. No crash was observed on radar screens, even though the altitude was already several hundred feet. We didn't see anything fall down either. After a few minutes, one Super Saber was reported missing and an immediate search operation was initiated. The search area was only half a mile from the coast, where the water was completely flat. Nothing was ever found to indicate that an aircraft had crashed, except for a standard American Air Force life jacket. However, this discovery was never considered to belong to the missing aircraft because countless Bermuda sailors and boat owners were illegally in possession of Air Force life jackets due to the thousands of American soldiers stationed there. This life jacket found during the search could also have other origins.

No satisfactory explanation was ever found for what happened to the plane and the pilot. Needless to say, the thorough investigation conducted by the American Air Force yielded no information and did not shed light on the mysterious incident. (13*, pp.158-161)
Berlitz adds to this eyewitness account: As already mentioned, sometimes several planes disappear on the same day in the same area of the triangle.
At the same time, anomalies are detected by the crews of other aircraft that do not disappear, sometimes even at the same altitude. ... Some experiences suggest that a kind of electrical energy occasionally takes the form of fireballs that seem to rush straight towards ships made of sheet steel and perhaps, in a broader sense, aircraft made of light metal. The report by WJ Morris, a former sailor now living in Llantrisant, South Wales, Great Britain, is indicative of this phenomenon: (13*, pp. 160-162)
Berlitz now describes how in the summer of 1955, at dawn, the motor ship Atlantic City, on which Morris was, suddenly began to turn in circles. Moments later, he and the officer on duty saw a 'ball of fire' coming straight towards them, apparently on a collision course but without any noise. He flew so low over the command bridge that they fell to the ground. Moments later they saw him disappear into the sea, leaving behind turbulent waters. The gyrocompass and the liquid compass, which no longer worked after this event, had to be repaired in the harbor.

We have written about these unmanned fireballs - used for information purposes - which were observed to have a maximum diameter of three meters and were developed in Germany before 1945 in the HUGIN publication: 'Secret Miracle Weapons' Vol.III, pp.15-23 summarized. Of course, they cannot make ships 'disappear', but they can cause electromagnetic interference because they apparently have the same propulsion system as the manned flying discs.

In these non-naturally behaving 'clouds', from which even one of the Super Saber machines did not emerge, there would also have to be a flying disk for camouflage that causes this process - no matter how it happens.

On November 9, 1956, a U.S. Navy PBM patrol aircraft with a crew of ten disappeared near Bermuda. (12*)

A U.S. Air Force KB-15 tanker aircraft en route to the Azores from Langley Field, Virginia, arrived on April 8
Lost in January 1962, without any radio communication and in the usual unexplained manner. (12*)

On August 28, 1963, two new U.S. Air Force KC-13 four-engine Stratotankers disappeared while en route from Homestead Air Force Base, Florida, to a secret air refueling position in the Atlantic Ocean, approximately 340 miles (550 km) southwest of Bermuda. (18*; and 12*)

On July 6, 1965, the crew and captain of the Norwegian supertanker Jawista witnessed a thrilling spectacle: The officer's report read:
'I ran to the telephone and called the captain. Without waiting for his answer, I grabbed my binoculars and ran to starboard. Then I saw a large object flying very close to the aft deck, between 200 and 400 meters high and just a little below the clouds. I could clearly see the body of the object; in shape it resembled a cigar. I could clearly make out a row of hatches emitting bright yellow to orange light. The vehicle had no position lights. It left a initially narrow, then widening path of bluish flames. What appeared to be glowing spheres could be seen inside, and each of them left behind blue rays that ran parallel to the object's trajectory. The light path was about a hundred meters long. Despite the speed and the fact that it passed so close to us, there was no sound.'

Not only the officer, but the entire crew observed this apparition, which was said to have emerged from the sea. (8*, p. 106)

On June 5, 1965, the Americans had to write off a C-119 Flying Boxcar with ten people on board, which had gone missing in the southeastern area of the Bahamas without leaving any trace, and had already been missing on April 5, 1965

A B-25 bomber that had been converted into a cargo plane met the same fate southeast of the Tongue of Ocean with a crew of three. (12*)

The tug Southern Cities left the port of Freeport in Texas with a 64 meter long barge. In this case the process was reversed. It was not the towed barge with a load of chemicals - it was found in perfect condition, undamaged - that was missing, but the tug itself was simply no longer there as of October 29, 1966. Even the tow rope was undamaged down to the fastening chain, only the tug and crew were simply no longer there. The investigation report states: '... since the ship did not send out a call for help, it is reasonable to assume that the shipwreck occurred so quickly that such a report could no longer be made,' (12*, p.72). Either the usual distraction, or helplessness on the part of the authorities.

In 1967, a Chase YC, 122 cargo plane disappeared , as did a Beechkraft Bonanza light aircraft, another Piper Apache light aircraft and, on December 24, 1967, the Witchcraft (18*). The Witchcraft was a small ocean-going ship, although she was anchored at a harbor buoy. (8*; 12*; 13*; which was considered unsinkable, sank in a flash within sight of the harbor and, what was particularly astonishing 18*). In January 1967, four private planes were lost in one week alone. D. Group spoke of a 'black week' (16*).

Of the many yachts and sailboats reported missing in the area, about one ship per month, the case of the Revonoc... attracted particular attention. ... (12*, p. 69)

It also happens several times that warships such as the most modern luxury liners are completely paralyzed for hours or days because Propulsion systems, power supplies and other electrical or electronic equipment fail, or what is even more astonishing, they go miles off course and - although this is noticed and counteracted - nothing happens
What you can do effectively about it:

The USS Richard E.Byrd, a DDG ship type for remote-controlled missiles, lost radio contact while sailing in the Bermuda Triangle in March 1971. At Berlitz we find the eyewitness account of Walt Darlings, a US Navy tactical missile specialist who was on the above ship: '...We were traveling from Norfolk, Virginia, to Bermuda. It was a four or five day practice trip...preparation for an Atlantic crossing. As we headed east, one by one we lost all means of communication. First the radar device failed, then the air traffic control device, then the mine detector for scanning the water surface, then the land detection instrument. We no longer had any radar contact at all.

Nobody was worried about it at first. Then the rumor spread that we were coming to the Bermuda Triangle. The crew began talking about the triangle and showed signs of concern. Then we lost the radio connection, although you can usually get it on the long waves - on the low frequencies of 1500 kilometers, for which there are special stations around the world so that a ship can pick up one from France and another from the African coast, for example and its intersection point and thereby get an indication of its position. But we didn't get anything at all. The sky was hazy and overcast, so we couldn't determine our position based on the stars. The electric depth gauge also failed. We had 300 men on board. Many of them feared we would drive in circles and never get to our destination. Some said that now we would find out for ourselves where all those ships and planes had gone since World War II. The men became very nervous, but no official statement was made about what was happening. After 9 to 10 days we suddenly had radio contact with Bermuda and arrived. The journey usually took four to five days. We never found out what was actually there.' (13*, p.99/100; also 16*; 18*)

In February 1955, the USS Tigrone (a submarine and icebreaker) was on an exercise between Puerto Rico and St. Thomas. Although the submarine was equipped with five types of radars, sonographs and an additional gyrocompass, it veered seven kilometers off course, which simply should not and could not have happened.

One is involuntarily reminded of the ship disaster in the Black Sea at the beginning of September 1986. The passenger steamer 'Admiral Nakhimov' (the former 'Berlin' of the North German Lloyd, which had to be handed over to the Soviets in 1947) collided with the Soviet cargo ship 'Pyotr Wassyev' outside the port of Novorossiysk. It was expressly mentioned that there was neither fog nor storm and that the 'Admiral Nakhimov' had radar. Since the routes of both ships crossed each other, they had made radio contact in time to coordinate the avoidance with each other. But they could steer as they wanted, both ships collided and as a result the 'Admiral Nakhimov' sank. She had 888 passengers and 346 crew members on board. The Tass report simply said: 'There were human sacrifices'. The reason given was that the steering system had failed. ('Ruhr-Nachrichten', Dortmund, September 2 and 3, 1986)

On April 3, 1974, all propulsion, power and electronic systems on the luxury liner Queen Elisabeth II were on a cruise in the Bermuda Triangle. This ship in particular had the best safety systems ever installed in a passenger ship. Now it floated helplessly in the big pond, like primitive sailing ships did in the absence of wind. The passengers were put off for a few days - with warm - but free drinks, but then another passenger ship had to come to take over the now angry guests and to be able to continue the cruise. The captain explained to a professional footballer: We are sitting here in the middle of the Bermuda Triangle. The official explanation was that oil was leaking from the steam boilers, but anyone can believe that. Another argument against this deception is that a US Coast Guard cutter traveling at a certain distance behind the Queen Elisabeth II noticed several times before the total failure that the luxury ship was no longer visible on his radar screen, even though it was clearly visible to the naked eye could see. (12*; 13*; 15*; 18*)

In March 1972, the US destroyer Vogelsang experienced similar problems: According to crew members, the Vogelsang experienced an unexpected change of course on a return voyage from Puerto Rico to the United States in March 1972 and came to a complete standstill for an entire night and part of the following day , as all electronic systems failed and no power came from the boilers. The crew never found out what was going on. ... Although the sea was calm and there was no wind, the Vogelsang, according to the crew, groaned and trembled during the night under such shocks as if it was almost being torn apart. No report of this incident has been made public and not even the crew members have received an explanation.
Such occurrences are confirmation of the recurring phenomenon of power outages, electrical disturbances and mysterious forces that occur in this area, often affecting aircraft and ships large and small, and which are normally not made public, especially when... are marine vessels.

The report: 'New secrets about the Bermuda Triangle', DNZ, No. 49/1977, says: Aircrews who have been in the last two years 'for fear of disappearing', something visible in the distance despite the blue sunny sky In time to avoid the 'mysterious fog that was quickly approaching', they say they heard an indefinable buzzing and whispering on the radio that became more and more agitated. There are numerous recordings of these 'voices'. According to specialists, it is clear from the rhythm of the sounds that these are not atmospheric disturbances. Whenever these sounds become audible, all earth radio communications fail. No communication with other ships or aircraft or a home or seaport or airport tower is possible.

Due to the ongoing state of war between the Allies on the one hand and the German Reich on the other, one will understand the events surrounding disappearing warships and military aircraft, but at the same time ask the question why do private aircraft, seemingly harmless sailing yachts, fishing boats and merchant ships disappear. Simply because they only appear to be of a 'private' nature. They are hired and misused for military, political and, above all, agent and espionage activities in order to carry out very specific tasks or search operations; for example, detecting UFO bases and landing sites in the Bermuda Triangle.
We have included the report in the appendix (R.-N., January 24, 1987) about secret zirconium cargo on board the 'Flying Enterprise' only as an example to show which extremely important and dangerous cargoes seem harmless to cutters or others may contain small ships.

Recently it became known from Sweden that the navy has contracted private fishing vessels to help track down submarines of 'unknown nationality'. Is it any wonder if they get involved in acts of war?

The highly dangerous cargo that large cargo ships can contain only recently became known again. The Swedish authorities have launched an investigation because highly enriched uranium from the Federal Republic of Germany was transported to other countries via Sweden. In another case, there was 'concrete evidence' that fissile nuclear material was being delivered from Lübeck on Finnish ships, albeit hidden under coke . (R.-N., January 16, 1988) Attentive observers quickly come to the conclusion that the Reich German flying disk power particularly monitors the nuclear intentions and criminal projects of the nuclear mafia.

Secret cargo or secret targets with secret missions are often unknown even to the teams; at best the captain and a few 'scientists' or secret agents traveling with him.
Anyone who sneaks into military installations must also face consequences.
In 'Secret Wonder Weapons', Vol.III, pp.79-81, we reported on three alleged journalists who used diving equipment to penetrate a secret German submarine base in the Atlantic in 1975. They also used a private, rented yacht, which then exploded. Only one of the three 'journalists' survived.

The 'UFOs' and 'USOs' were often accused of bringing people into the Bermuda Triangle, presumably as slave labor. Would that be surprising, at a time when German soldiers were still incarcerated in Belgian, Dutch, French and Italian prisons? At a time when German prisoners of war were still forced to do hard labor in Siberian labor camps? Or Rudolf Hess had to eke out an existence in solitary confinement and under degrading conditions in Berlin-Spandau? Perhaps only Allied soldiers and agents observed things that were under no circumstances allowed to be made known to the enemy.

Another speculation, which cannot be proven either, is that secret material procurement by the UFO force is the cause of missing planes and ships.

And? If that were the case? Collectively, the entire German people have been abused as labor slaves for foreign powers and states for four decades during the ongoing state of occupation and have been heavily exploited through taxes, even if 90% of the media-driven and re-educated people can hardly or want to notice this. But those are the facts! What are a few missing ships from our opponents? War is war and they demonstrably wanted and started it and not Germany!

For example, if the US warship 'Vogelsang' or the luxury liner 'Queen Elisabeth II' were paralyzed for several days, warnings could be more indirect; have been expressed (by the Third Power?)?

Either against the respective government or against specific potentates on the ships themselves? In any case, that couldn't be ruled out. The report in the appendix: 'UFO shock and rescue in the Bermuda Triangle' proves once again that planes, ships or people are not targeted indiscriminately, otherwise this rescue operation would not be possible; come about.

Mysteriöses Verschwinden einer Kutterbesatzung

Kopenhagen. (dpa) Das Rätsel um das Verschwinden der Besatzung des dänischen Marinekutters „Ternen“ konnte bisher nicht gelöst werden. Der Kutter, der am 25. Januar vermißt worden war, wurde fünf Tage später bei der grönländischen Insel Ravns Storoe fünf Meter unter Wasser und 250 Meter vom Land entfernt gefunden. Inzwischen sind alle Räume des gesunkenen Schiffes bis auf die Offiziersmesse von Tauchern untersucht worden. Von der achtköpfigen Besatzung fehlt jedoch jede Spur. Rettungsboote und -floße sind nicht benutzt worden. Der Marinekutter hatte nicht Anker geworfen. Die Untersuchungen ergaben, daß der Motor lief, als das Schiff sank. Die Taucher haben an Bord weder ein Leck noch Spuren einer Explosion entdeckt. Auch eine umfassende Suchaktion auf der nahegelegenen Insel hatte kein Ergebnis. Man entdeckte nicht einmal Spuren, die darauf hätten hindeuten können, daß die Besatzung des Schiffes verlassen hätte.

Fischkutter sollen U-Boote fangen

Stockholm (dpa) - Die schwedische Marine will bei der Jagd nach fremden U-Booten an der Westküste des Landes künftig auch Fischkutter einsetzen und Eindringlinge unter Wasser möglicherweise von Fischern mit deren Netzen fangen lassen. Dies kündigte der stellvertretende Kommandeur des Marinekommandes West, Lars Norrsell, gesten an.

Weather as a weapon!

The artificial change in the weather is an ancient fact that can be traced back to ancient writings. Druids, medicine men and shamans are known until recently for their ability to manipulate the weather and make rain to a limited extent.

'Weather Spell' is a magical act to influence the weather; Wizards and special weathermakers possessed these abilities.

'Großer Brockhaus', Wiesbaden, edition 1957.: Former gods will have influenced the weather in a very perfect way thousands of years ago, just as they also mastered flight with rocket propulsion, according to old Indo-Aryan traditions. However, the knowledge of these techniques was lost in both cases and was only recently rediscovered on this planet.

From the three volumes of 'German Mythology', by Jacob Grimm (one of the 'Brothers Grimm'), from 1835, we find the following information: What was originally attributed to gods, demigods and giants, the production of wind, storm and hail ... was later attributed to human magicians. (22*, Vol.I, p. 530)
There is hardly any trace of this in our mythology, which happens so often in Greek that the gods, in order to remain unnoticed, pour a mist over themselves and their protégés, who are supposed to be hidden from the enemy's eye .
... One would then have to suggest again that those Valkyries, who, like the Serbian Vilen, nurtured and protected beloved heroes in battle, were able to produce clouds and hail in the air, or to hold off the invisibility cloaks and helicopter helmets, whose effect is equivalent to fog. (22*, Vol.I, p. 274)
The Norse legends call magically created weather görningavedr. ... (22*, Vol.I, p.533)
The gods appear in mist and clouds . ... (22*, Vol.III, p.100)

We reject the Judeo-Christian teaching, which in recent centuries has forced upon us the erroneous idea that the white race, i.e. the Nordic Germanic peoples, have also 'higher developed' over the millennia from an animal-like state to that of today. In any case, the old traditions prove us the opposite.
Rather, through deliberate mixing with Negroid and Asian types of other races, a regression has taken place. However, if other types of people, even scientific representatives of the Adamic peoples, claim that they descended from this line of descent, i.e. from animal-like to human-like, we do not want to contradict, because they will have just as much evidence for their origin as the Nordic ones peoples for their own. The latter species can derive their origins from the former lineages of gods; However, that means: gradual regression. So it always depends on the reference point. What matters is whether history is viewed from the perspective of those who were once superior or from that of the underdeveloped.
For Christianity, liberalism and communism, all people should be equal, but our five senses alone show us the direct opposite every day. Precisely because the dominant principle in all natural processes is inequality and not the pretended equality! The few examples from Nordic mythology listed above provide a fragmentary glimpse of the possibilities that superior gods and people may have had thousands of years ago, even with regard to influencing the weather. The southern doctrine of the 'higher development of all people' completely contradicts this and can therefore in no way serve as a standard for us.

According to this obvious false teaching, advanced civilizations should not have existed 5, 10, 20 or 50 thousand years ago. But they did exist!

Modern technology now makes many weather-influencing practices that until the last century were only found in mythology possible again. Peoples who were far less deprived of their racial characteristics and traditions, such as Germany before 1945, find it much easier to produce something creative and to rediscover basic physical or technical knowledge than uprooted and heavily bastardized conglomerates of peoples, such as the UNITED STATES. Even the ability of 'hereditary memory', which, as the name suggests, remains tied to good genetic substances that are still present, is then completely missing. Great creative achievements are reserved for the great geniuses and they in turn do not arise from Eurasian-Negroid hybrids, as the powers of decline that dominate the world today strive for, propagate and promote! Only those who are ignorant of these questions are surprised that the German people from 1933 to 1945 were capable of such military and technological achievements - provided they had appropriate leadership; and a small elite even afterwards.

In his book: 'The German Secret Weapons', the American Brian Ford wrote about German developments before 1945: Among other things, great interest was shown in endothermic weapons. These were weapons that could produce enormous cold instead of heat when they exploded. There was talk of using this weapon to freeze areas with a radius of about two kilometers; You then just had to quickly collect all the living creatures before they 'thawed' again. (23*, p.37)

The former German war correspondent and author Gerhard R. Steinhäuser reported on April 5, 1979 in the article in the 'Neue Weltschau': 'Science wants to get to the bottom of the weather', as follows: And that also includes the weather weapon. It no longer consists of sprinkling salt on clouds and thus producing rain. Today, completely different things are at play. In 1944, the author himself witnessed experiments with a German 'cold bomb' that could turn a large area into a snow desert in just a few seconds.

In the DNZ report from February 1955: 'No nuclear war, but the end of the world due to a cold bomb - 276° minus?', it says: South Africa, India and Libya, on the other hand, are reporting snowfalls for the first time in history. ... should the Russians experiment with their new cold bomb again? Professor Kapusta only developed his Rac 11 last year, with which it is said to be possible to cause a temperature drop of minus 276 degrees below zero within a few minutes.'

But according to other information, the Soviets only captured two of the German Frost bombs, detonated them in a later attempt and observed the enormous effect. The Soviets' own development therefore seems very questionable to us; even more so in retrospect from today's perspective.

In our opinion, a very well-documented case of influencing the weather to protect German troops during the withdrawal from the island of Corsica is described in the book 'Adler calls FührerHQ', by Dammert/Kurowski. It happened on September 28, 1943. During the retreat from the island of Corsica to the Italian mainland, there were large concentrations of troops in the northeast of the island, near Bastia, because the crossing by ships was not fast enough. The enemy must have found out about this and enemy bombers were approaching to bomb the German troops waiting here. There would have been a terrible massacre on September 28th if the following had not happened: Here is his report (meaning Herbert Dammert) about a memorable episode, which in retrospect took on the odium of being constructed and unbelievable because it was simply too coincidental to appear coincidental: it was very hot again that day and the sky was cloudless. At around 1:00 p.m. we heard loud engine noises in the distance. Shortly afterwards we saw a formation of about 25 four-engine bombers heading towards the airfield from the north. It was flying at a maximum altitude of 500 m and I had the impression that it had come specifically to bomb our well-camouflaged position. She was still no more than 500 m away from us when it suddenly began to rain, so that thick clouds passed over us and made us hidden from any enemy visibility.

I expected the bombs to go off at any moment. This group of bombers circled overhead for more than five minutes before turning away and disappearing from our sight. The planes had barely disappeared when it became light again and the sun was shining. The clouds disappeared as quickly as they came. We were all happy that things had gone well again.

Twenty minutes later we were startled again by the sound of engines approaching from the south.
Peering over there, we saw the same bomber formation turning towards us. At this time we were spread out within a five kilometer radius of Bastia and Borgo airfield. There was no way out.
And this time the sun shone and the approaching bombers were able to carry out their attack with the best possible visibility. They were again about the same distance and at the same height; The four-engine planes had barely gotten close when the sun was darkened for the second time and black clouds were pushed in, from which a heavy downpour began to fall.
This time the Hombers circled above us and the city for a longer period of time. The roar of their engines could be heard for a long time. We couldn't see the machines any more than their observers could see us.
After about ten minutes they turned away without having achieved anything. Once again we were relieved and grateful for this second lucky coincidence, which had already seemed like a miracle to us. But that's not enough. As the sun shone again and our clothes steamed dry, a third time this mysterious formation came close over the mountains from where we had been fired upon by the artillery hours before, and it could only be a minute or two before they This time it was definitely the case that bombs were dropped in a targeted manner.

It got dark for the third time. Thick rain clouds rolled in again and covered us with their thick cloak of invisibility.
After a few minutes of fruitless searching and circling, the bomber group turned away, never to return.
In the distance we heard the bombs being thrown.

My men and I will never forget that triple miracle on September 28, 1943. On this day we all celebrate our new birthday.' (24*, pp. 179-181)

With this three-fold bad weather zone, which only appeared for a very short time, and which was also narrowly defined and always tailored to a very specific, identical area, so-called 'coincidence' can really be ruled out, especially since this spontaneous deterioration in the weather was also extremely useful German soldiers are about to be destroyed. The question that inevitably comes to mind - which unfortunately cannot be answered - was this: did German flying discs test their first attempts at weather warfare and thereby bring about this apparent miracle? If one could not add any further - albeit different - examples to this process, one would have to answer the question with no. But we will be able to show in a few cases selected from the wealth of material below that in the decades that followed, the so-called 'UFOs' most likely caused similar weather phenomena.

Cold that is suddenly brought into an area of warm air, whether of natural or artificial origin, draws in all the air moisture from a larger environment. Clouds form and, if there is sufficient saturation, rain falls. (As is well known, air humidity is always found in the coldest place in the room. In winter, especially inside the window. In the refrigerator, on the evaporator.) In addition, warm summer air has the ability to store much more air moisture than frosty winter air.

If, in whatever way, cold is intentionally brought into this warm Mediterranean climate on the island of Corsica, which is heavily laden with moisture, this artificial cold zone will remove the moisture from the surrounding warm air - probably at lightning speed - and, because this is beneficial, the cold air will flow far away can hold less moisture, it lets it fall as rain. It cannot be said with certainty whether a 'frost bomb' is required to create this cold zone, which produces this cold chemically, or whether even simpler options are available; Regarding the German flying disks, however, it is logical to assume: The UFO literature contains enough reports of close-up experiences with flying disks that have landed or hovered close to the ground. Some of the eyewitness reports show that the flying tops had a repelling effect - some people literally felt an invisible wall between themselves and the unknown flying object - others reported the direct opposite, namely a slight, invisible but attractive force. In addition, there are descriptions of events in which people were 'sucked' into the flying object within a visible cone of radiation and others in which cars, even airplanes, were lowered up and down like a yo-yo.

With this repulsive and attractive effect, which can apparently be created at will, the flying disks will also be able to bind cold air masses to themselves from great heights, for example from the stratosphere, and even pull them down in a whirlpool to any desired area near the Earth in order to specifically bring about a desired cold event; for example, as a necessary prerequisite for the three Corsica cloudbursts described above.
The German frost bomb may have been a parallel development, on which the German flying discs are not dependent at all.

The 'cloud images' inserted here in the chapter appear far too precise, too uniform, too artificial to be of natural origin. In addition, an unnatural rotation effect can be observed in these clouds. In all likelihood, these are flying discs that camouflage themselves with either natural clouds or artificially created fog.
Even during these camouflage processes, the flying discs have the opportunity to bind to easily volatile substances, such as fog or clouds. (The turning effect is probably created by the surrounding ring around the stationary missile, as we know from the design descriptions of the German flying discs from the 1940s; see 'Secret Wonder Weapons' Vol.I.)

The engineer E. Halik, who was very well informed about the German flying disc developments, wrote in the 'Realesoteric short reports' in the magazine 'Mensch und Destiny': There are definite signs that the UFOs are primarily (?) used to to change the atmosphere and climate of certain areas of land. For this purpose, metal particles of various types are sprayed, such as iron oxide over Central Europe and Scandinavia, tin oxide over South America, copper oxide over North America, rhenium oxide over Indonesia, etc. (11*, No. I5, 1955)

Alluding to the flying discs covered in fog for camouflage, Ing. E. Halik continues: The situation is similar with the change and influence of weather processes. The synthetic bad weather of the last few months is increasingly developing into 'firedamp weather' and the long list of UFO types has recently been supplemented by real UFO clouds and other weather bodies, such as those that could be photographed over Marsaille. (See the 'clouds' image of Marsaille inserted here)

From the fogging of the Obersalzberg in 1943-45 to prevent bombing raids, to the fogging of flying discs for camouflage purposes, it will have been only a small step. How could fog formation have been further developed in the meantime, whether as a defensive or offensive weapon?

In the magazine 'Research and Experience', June/July 1958, FBMarby wrote: Attempts by the nat.-soc. Governments during the last war had already aimed to achieve space cold in smaller or larger enemy areas, at least a temperature that would eliminate all life. It remains to be seen whether this should be achieved through long-distance action, or through rockets, or through aircraft flying over these enemy areas. At that time there was also a plan to turn the surface of the sea into a sea of flames using powder blown off over the sea by airplanes.

In today's related publications and occasionally in press reports, the impression is always given that the weather war is being waged exclusively by the Soviets and the Americans. We want both of them

Not to deny that 'great powers' have the ability to do this, but these reports smell all too much like press manipulation. They will certainly master various methods, such as 'cloud seeding' using aircraft, for early and targeted raining off of clouds:

Up to four flares, each containing 70 grams of silver iodide, placed under the wings of the Cessna are enough to 'bring down' a cloud as rain. (Ruhr-Nachrichten, Dortmund, February 8, 1985, in the article: "Hailstorms are prevented by 'cloud seeding'")

The well-known American Analyst CB Baker wrote a multi-page paper in 'CODE, Politisches Lexikon', Zurich in 1978: 'The Soviet Weather War Attack'; also in 1981, a study that only became known in American publications: 'The weather war devastation of America'. In it he blames the Soviets and the pro-Soviet ruling clique in America (such as the Trilaterals, etc.) for the weather war against the USA, but bases his analyzes primarily on American press reports. He likes this one from America. The press still believed the disinformation coming out.

On the other hand, the American nuclear scientist and ex-lieutenant colonel, Colonel Thomas E. Bearden, who argues similarly, is in my opinion a paid disinformer who should have precise orders on how to conceal the weather war facts.

These Allied concealment practices about who caused the weather war - falsely the Soviets - are now also being adopted by the 'national' press in the Federal Republic of Germany. 'Deutsche Wochenzeitung', 26.0kt.1984: 'The weather war in space; Is the Soviet Union changing the climate?'. In this report, how could it be otherwise, the Soviets were suspected of being behind the weather war, although at the same time it was also acknowledged that the severe hurricanes in June 1984 had caused severe devastation in the Volga region as far as the eastern suburbs of Moscow. The explanation for this illogicality is quickly assumed to be a possible Soviet failure. So a kind of Soviet own goal, a self-mutilation! Shouldn't the flying discs have been more involved?

In order to obscure the global strategic and military context, everything is always dealt with according to almost the same templates: If several observers have observed a red-hot flying disc (UFO) flying horizontally, the press turns it into a Soviet rocket part that entered the earth's atmosphere burns up. Let's just think of the spectacular events on September 23, 1986, when between 7:25 and 7:35 a.m. over half of Europe and according to reports, objects, varying in numbers from 1 to 15, were observed flying in all directions - which even circled Brussels . We have over 50 press reports about this process with reports from the GDR, FRG, Holland, Belgium, Luxembourg and France. What did the press make of it?: Soviet rocket parts burning up as they entered the Earth's atmosphere; although horizontal flight path has been reported several times.
For example, if the Americans lose a nuclear submarine in the Atlantic, and unless it can be declared a 'mishap' or 'accident', only the Soviets can be held responsible for it, even though they are still - albeit secretly - their allies are. If an American satellite goes out of orbit, the Soviets have worked with so-called 'scalar' or 'ELF' waves based on Tesla. In the Eastern Bloc countries the opposite argument is likely to be made, in which case it is the Americans. Just don't admit that there could be another power at play, a real countervailing power!

To avoid any misunderstandings:

Extreme weather conditions and significant storms have occurred at all times. With this chapter we do not want to give the impression that we can now immediately blame one of the great powers for every disaster in nature, every unusual weather situation.
Nevertheless, if we want to remain objective, we have to admit - even if we still lack the ability to differentiate - not all weather conditions are still caused by nature.

Let's turn again to individual examples, mainly from the Bermuda Triangle, Jean Prachan describes the following incident from 1975: On September 3, 1975, a B 52 bomber of the American Air Force exploded in the air and crashed in Aiken, South Carolina . The plane had recently flown over the Bermuda Triangle and the three survivors of the seven-person crew reported that the plane was literally 'harassed' by UFOs over the Atlantic; the pilot reported a strong formation of storm clouds where the sky should actually have been clear... (8*, p.39)

In his book 'The Bermuda Triangle', Charles Berlitz describes the disappearance of tugboats or just their crew, which was often observed in connection with the formation of fog: Other boats also lost their tugboats, and sometimes the crew of the towed ship also disappeared.
In some cases, a kind of fog covered the second ship while failure of compasses and electronic equipment was observed on the first ship. One wonders why reports of such incidents come almost exclusively from smugglers and not from ships sailing alone. The reason may be that individual ships simply disappear - without witnesses - while the tugs at the end of the rope are close enough to observe the incident. (12*, p.79)

The weather weapons are often used in combination with other means. So while the towed ships disappeared in the fog - most likely in connection with a stealth effect, which we will talk about later - the respective tug itself only had electromagnetic interference. This means that only the electrical and electronic systems failed, and it seems that this can still be controlled, sometimes to a greater extent, sometimes to a lesser extent, or only applicable to certain areas. You can cause enemy aircraft to suddenly fall out of the sky due to a total failure of the electronics, but you can apparently also send an indirect warning to the respective aircraft command with a partial failure.

An experience that Captain Don Henry had in 1966 provides a vivid picture of the 'tug of war' between a tugboat and an unidentifiable force that was consciously or unconsciously trying to hold the tugboat back.
Captain Henry is the owner of a salvage company in Miami, the 'Sea Phantom Exploration Company', and has extensive experience as a sailor, navigator and diver. ...
Here is his report: ...We were on the way back from Puerto Rico to Fort Lauderdale. We had been traveling for three days, towing an empty barge that had contained petroleum nitrate. I was on board the Good News, a 50 meter long tug with 2000 HP. The barge weighed 2,500 tons and was attached to a 300 meter long tow rope. We had left the Exumas behind us and reached the Tongue of Ocean (Bahamas). The depth of the water was about 600 fathoms. The weather was good, the sky was clear. In the afternoon I went into the cabin under the bridge for a few minutes when I heard a big shout. I came onto the bridge and shouted: 'What's going on?' The first thing I looked at was the compass. The needle spun clockwise like a top. There was no reason for it - the only place I had heard of something like this happening before was in the St. Lawrence River in Kingston, where a large iron deposit or perhaps a meteorite at the bottom messes up the compasses. (Note HUGIN: Iron deposits or meteorites on the seabed do not confuse compasses, this is just one of the many attempts at distraction by 'science' and the media, of which Captain Henry apparently also fell victim here. The St. Lawrence River in Canada is the one natural outflow for Lake Ontario and others. Kingston is at the beginning of the St. Lawrence River, but still in Lake Ontario. Completely different things are going on here. See National Examiner report appended on UFO occurrences in Lake Ontario.) I I didn't know what was going on, but something was wrong, I was sure of it. The water seemed to come from every direction. The horizon disappeared - we couldn't see where it was - water, sky, everything blurred. We couldn't see where we were. Whatever was going on, it was stealing or consuming all the energy from our generators. The electrical equipment no longer produced energy. The generators were still running, but we had no electricity. The engineer tried to get an auxiliary generator going, but it couldn't get a spark.

I worried about the barge. He was nearby, but I couldn't recognize him. It looked like it was covered by a cloud, and the waves around it were higher than in other directions.
I pushed the throttle full. I couldn't see where we were going, but I just wanted to get out of there quickly for all the world. It seemed like someone was trying to pull us back without quite succeeding.
It was like coming out of a fog bank. The tow rope was taut - like the Indian rope trick, you couldn't see anything -, but at the other end, everything was covered in thick fog . I ran onto the main deck and pulled on the rope. The damn barge came out of the fog, but there was no fog anywhere else. I could even see eleven miles away. In the foggy area where the barge was supposed to be stuck, the water was choppy, although the waves were not high. Call me whatever you want - I certainly didn't go back to see what was going on war.

Have you ever felt what it's like when two people pull each other's arms in opposite directions? It felt like we were in a place that someone or something was claiming and someone or something was trying to stop us from going where we wanted to go.
Question: Was the horizon colored green?
No, it was milky. That's all I can say. I don't care about colors. When we came out the batteries needed to be recharged. I used fifty flashlight batteries.

Question: Were you thinking about the Bermuda Triangle?
Yes, that was the only thing I could think of at the time. I thought - my God, I'm the next number in the statistics!

Question: Have you ever had a similar experience?
No. I've heard that something like this happened to other people, where a barge and its crew disappeared and the towing cable was torn off. In any case, I only had one experience. And it was completely enough! (12*, pp.80-82)

In the DNZ report: 'New disaster in the Bermuda Triangle; Submarine bomber disappeared without a trace!' in No. 33/1978, it says:

Since February 26, 1978, the statistics of aircraft lost in the Bermuda Triangle have increased by one position. The new victim is a Grumman KA-6 bomber. This type was developed in the 1960s and can fly at low speeds of up to 1052 kilometers per hour. Its task is to combat submarines, which gave it the collective term submarine bomber.

In short, this is what happened: The bomber had taken off from a military airfield in the US state of Virginia and was supposed to land on the US aircraft carrier 'John F. Kennedy', which was cruising about 160 km off the east coast of Florida (i.e. in the Bermuda Triangle). The bomber, with experienced pilots on board, was only about 50 km away from the aircraft carrier - where everything was already prepared for landing - when it was just able to radio into the ether: 'We have a problem here'... . The bomber and crew were never heard from or seen again. Navy spokesmen described the incident as a 'sinister phenomenon'. The above-mentioned 'DNZ' gives an explanation and asks the question: Often a cloud or a strange fog enveloped ships and planes, which then never emerged from these cloud and fog formations . These structures gradually dissolved, and the plane or ship that disappeared within them no longer existed.

The fog is often described as greenish and the clouds as tube-like. The fog always appears suddenly out of nowhere and causes instruments to fail.
Did the KA-6 bomber also suffer a similar fate? Did all of his navigation instruments fail too?

These strange processes are not only limited to ships and airplanes, but also extend into space, which will be discussed in a later paper on space. In the 1978 paperback, 'The Truth About the Bermuda Triangle' (Original: 'The Dared The Devil' Triangle'), unfortunately we do not own it, the author Adi-Kent Thomas Jeffrey writes, among other things, about the mystery of the US Weather satellites that stop working exactly above the triangle and only resume their activity after the satellite has left the triangle. (DNZ, No. 33/1978) A similar shielding process has also been claimed several times regarding Antarctica. If this is true, and based on the many connections we have become aware of, we tend to assume this possibility as very likely, then this extremely superior power obviously does not want the Allies to look into its hands; not even with satellites. In the longer report: 'Heavy battles by the USA against unidentified flying objects', DNZ, NR. 20/1978 states, somewhat carefully worded, regarding these military satellites: For two years, around 20 American and Russian satellites have inexplicably disappeared without a trace. This happened through a force completely inexplicable in its origins, which achieved its goal in an intelligent way.

In the summer of 1975, physicist Dr. Wayne Meshejian claims that weather satellites stopped working properly when they flew over the Bermuda Triangle. The images transmitted to Earth from the satellites were completely black. Telemetric and electronic impulses could also only be received with difficulty. Reception was only good with infrared rays. (16*, p.113)

But let's get back to our topic of 'weather as a weapon'. In his book 'Spurless', Berlitz reproduces the American Jerry Osborn's experience report and writes in the introduction: Individual cloud formations that appeared alone in an otherwise cloudless sky were, according to witness statements, observed and photographed by patrol aircraft of the American Navy, although such recordings were withheld from both the original photographer and the public (HUGIN note: All of these connections with the 'UFOs' or 'USOs' are subject to absolute secrecy by all allied military powers.

In the American military, for example, violations are punished with a fine of $10,000 and up to 10 years in prison.). Jerry Osborn, who now lives in Dallas, Texas, but was serving in the Navy Air Force in 1966, along with 11 other crew members of a Marine P3-A aircraft, witnessed a two-cloud , one-plus-one incident unreal dream - or nightmare - resembled ordinary cumulus cloud formations. Jerry Osborne, who is retired from military service and can therefore speak freely, vividly remembers that strange experience: I was stationed at Kindley Field, Bermuda, in January 1966. My rank was AX-3, anti-submarine warfare specialist.

On January 16th or 18th we made a routine patrol flight between Bermuda and Puerto Rico. It was between 1 and 3 a.m. The night was clear and the flight conditions were excellent. We were 400 miles south of Bermuda and flying at an altitude of approximately 4,000 feet.
Suddenly we spotted two very unusual clouds about 5 minutes away from us at almost the same altitude; one was an elongated, apex-down triangle 250 to 300 feet long, while the second, hanging above, was in the shape of a round powder puff about 150 feet in diameter. Both glowed brightly.
My first surprised thought or comparison was, "Someone made a cloud in the shape of a giant vanilla sundae and separated the ice cream from the waffle sundae."
I had a clear view as I was acting as reconnaissance officer and occupied the upper starboard observation seat.
Still, I wouldn't have believed my eyes if all the other crew members hadn't seen it too.
The clouds just hung there in the otherwise completely cloudless sky.
As we got closer, I noticed that the distance between the 'powder puff' and the 'sundae' was about 200 feet and was clear. As we got closer, our pilot started to loop around to fly through them, but just as we began our approach to the two clouds and our photographers were taking pictures of this crazy formation, a bright beam of light flashed out from the gap, groping scanned the area we were following for a few seconds and then stuck to our aircraft. The beam didn't let go of us again - for about 6 seconds in total - until our pilot turned away because we wanted to put some distance between us and whatever was going on. When we got back to base we made a report and submitted all the photos we had taken. We never saw her again or heard anything about the report. Later we asked our officer about it. He said he didn't know anything about it. He didn't seem to want to talk about it, but said it might have had something to do with reaction phenomena from rocket fires. That could possibly explain the cloud formation, but certainly not the bright beam of light from the space between the two clouds that clung to us and wouldn't let go. (13*, p.104/105)

The Allies, both in the West and the East, who are completely powerless and powerless in the face of this superior power, have made the ostrich policy and tactics of secrecy their highest principle in this regard for decades.
Due to the requirement of silence in the military, everyone there is unsettled and everyone uses excuses to avoid being prosecuted, like Jerry Osborn's superior officer above. But the truth and the findings are breaking out more and more and can no longer be stopped.

In the chapter 'White or fiery nebula' Berlitz writes, among other things: Other aircraft have had strange experiences in these haze clouds . Among these is the case of pilot Chuck Wakeley (November 1964), who, on a clear night flight from Andros to Miami, noticed a fiery, glowing mist suddenly forming on the right wing of his aircraft, extending up to the fuselage and over the left Wings spread out and then lay down in the cockpit over the instrument panel, where the pointers of his instruments and the electromagnetic devices went completely 'crazy' until finally the pilot himself began to glow. We are also aware of several cases that occurred in the Tongue of Ocean, a 2 kilometer deep ocean trench between Andros and the Exuma chain, where boats being towed were hit by a single cloud or local cloud that suddenly formed limited fog , in which some of the ships and their crews disappeared forever. (13*, p.81/82)

In March 1982, strange reports spread throughout the world press. With headlines like 'Mysterious cloud circles the earth', Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, (WAZ), Essen, 4.3.82, or 'Spy plane should solve mystery; U-2 brings samples of the mysterious cloud to Earth for NASA.' (WAZ), 6.3.82 etc.
This cloud, which was first discovered on January 25th by Japanese researchers and then also by a research station over Hawaii, was initially only said to be a few kilometers in size with varying thicknesses. At a height of 16 km or a little more, this cloud has probably circled the earth four or five times. A NASA spokesman said that "all we know so far is that there is something weighing about a million tons floating around in the stratosphere." NASA plans to send a U-2 spy plane into the cloud. A day later, NASA announced that the cloud had now reached huge proportions and extended over large parts of North America, the Atlantic Ocean and Europe. (Welt am Sonntag, March 7, 1982) It also said that this 'cloud' was invisible to the human eye. 'It was supposedly detected by laser beams that were sent through the atmosphere and reflected back from the cloud.'

First of all, two weak volcanic eruptions in New Guinea and Angola at the beginning of January 1982 were blamed, after which people did not shy away from even the major ones that had occurred almost two years ago

Partly responsible for the volcanic eruption of Mount St. Helena, which erupted in May 1980. We also learned that the mysterious 'cloud' could not be examined by a NASA satellite because the power supply had already failed in November. (Maybe a foreign power did this?) Be that as it may, the U-2 plane had to go up, circled for about 6 hours at an altitude of 15-18 km and the samples taken down showed: the 'cloud ' consisted of fine droplets of sulfuric acid. (WAZ, March 13, 1982) On the same day we learned: a 'new mysterious cloud at high altitude' (WAZ) was discovered, this time at an altitude of 30 km. It was now admitted that this could not be explained by volcanic eruptions, not least because of the high altitude. It stretches around almost the entire northern hemisphere, so it has taken on 'global dimensions' and could possibly contain up to 20 or 30 million tonnes of sulfuric acid. (Welt am Sonntag, March 14, 1982)

Is what happened here just an unfoundedly exaggerated but still natural phenomenon? Or should this 'cloud' be of artificial origin? Would NASA send a reconnaissance fighter into a natural cloud and if so, would it even be worth mentioning? But definitely not. Should these two anti-satellite clouds serve similar functions in space as the much smaller clouds that enveloped planes and ships before some of them disappeared entirely? This can also be ruled out, because the satellites orbit the earth at an altitude of 100, 200 or more kilometers, whereas the two clouds were only detected at an altitude of around 30 km.

We previously heard that satellites over Antarctica and the Bermuda Triangle were temporarily ceasing their spying activities for unknown reasons and would not function normally until they had cleared these areas. We also learned that these two huge clouds - although not noticeable to our eyes - reflected the laser beams sent up precisely because they could not penetrate the clouds. Could it not then also be possible, in reversal of this process, that the special cameras on the satellites are no more able to penetrate these clouds from above than the laser is from below? Are we dealing here with huge, artificially drawn 'clouds' that have the task of concealing certain near-Earth actions of 'UFOs' and 'USOs' from the spying eyes of the Allied military satellites?

We currently lack relevant, conclusive material, particularly for this chapter 'Weather as a Weapon'. Over time, more facts will be added, either invalidating or further confirming some of our arguments. Therefore, parts of these statements should initially only be seen as food for thought.

Warum es in Moskau grün regnete

Sowjetische Wissenschaftler kön- n jetzt ein Phänomen erklären, s am 5. Mai ganz Moskau erstaunte: Grüner Regen fiel damals auf die Sowjethauptstadt. Der Frühling war schuld! Nach dem langen harten Winter waren Bäume und Pflanzen explosionsartig erblüht. Winde wirbelten massenhaft die Blütenpollen in die Luft; färbten die Regentropfen grün.

'Bild'-Zeitung, 19. Mai,1987

The Norwegian newspaper 'Agderposten' also reported on this phenomenon:
'The residents of Moscow in the Soviet Union could not believe their eyes on May 5th this year. The sky above them turned green and when it started to rain, even the drops were green. Now Soviet scientists have solved the mystery. 80% of the 'rain' was pollen and not water. The reason for this is the unusually late spring this year. A large number of trees and bushes have bloomed in an incredibly short period of time. Strong winds brought a lot of this pollen into the air and the usual rain fell again on May 5th. This will be reported in a broadcast by Radio Moscow.'
A hair-raising explanation! Or maybe a weather war warning to the Soviets??

Eine Wolke „schluckte" unseren Aufklärer! Eine unheimliche Begegnung

Lawrence Wagner, ehemals Radartechniker der US-Marine, berichtete vor einer Versammlung von Piloten im Marineflughafen Lemoore in Kalifornien über das aufregendste Erlebnis seiner Pilotenzeit. Wagner erklärte unter anderem:

„Anfang der 60er Jahre war ich in einer Marinestation bei San Diego in Kalifornien stationiert und flog eines Abends mit neun Kameraden einen Aufklärungsflug. Wir hatten die empfindlichen Apparate an Bord, um eventuelle Objekte auf See oder in der Luft zu entdecken. Plötzlich sahen wir eine blaue Wolke. Der Radarschirm hatte allerdings festgestellt, daß das Objekt metallen war, daß es Radiosignale aussandte und Gewicht besaß.

Wir flogen direkt auf das Ding zu, um es von oben betrachten zu können. Aber als wir näherkamen, begann es mit hoher Geschwindigkeit zu steigen, so daß ein Zusammenstoß unvermeidlich schien. Eine oder zwei Sekunden später war das Innere unserer Maschine von einem grellen Licht erfüllt. Ich erinnere mich noch genau an die erschreckten, gespannten Gesichter meiner Kameraden. Zugegeben, ich hatte auch Angst, denn wir wußten ja nicht, was passieren würde. Eine Kollision drohte. Immer noch von außen angeleuchtet, jagten wir durch einen Nebel in die Dunkelheit, während das Objekt seinen steilen Aufwärtsflug fortsetzte und in großer Höhe verschwand.

Kurz danach wurde jeder von uns von UFO-Untersuchungsbeamten der Regierung ausgefragt, die von allen fast gleichlautende Erklärungen aufnahmen. Aber bis heute habe ich nichts mehr von dieser Sache gehört und habe auch niemals irgendwo einen Bericht in den zahlreichen Artikeln über solche Zwischenfälle gelesen."

Suezkanal wurde wegen Sandsturms geschlossen

Ismailia (dpa) - Der Suezkanal ist wegen eines Sandsturmes gestern geschlossen worden. Wie die Kanalbehörde in Ismailia mitteilte, mußten 51 Schiffe im Kanal aus Sicherheitsgründen vor Anker gehen. Darunter seien auch fünf britische Kriegsschiffe, vier Fregatten und ein Versorgungsschiff. Es ist das erste Mal seit der Wiedereröffnung des Kanals im Jahre 1975, daß er wegen eines Sandsturms geschlossen wurde. Zuvor waren bereits Kairos internationaler Flughafen und der Hafen von Alexandria geschlossen worden, da die Sichtweite unter 100 m betrug.Die Stürme, sie erreichen bis zum 100 km/h, sollen, so die Meteorologen, noch zwei Tage andauern.

Klirrende Kälte in Sibirien: Minus 57°

Moskau (dpa) - Seit einer Woche herrscht im sibirischen Jakutsk klirrende Kälte. Die Temperatur ist auf minus 57 Grad Celsius gefallen. Durch den Kältenebel beträgt die Sicht nur fünf Meter. Die Schulen sind vorübergehend geschlossen.

Bei extremer Kälte ist die Luftfeuchtigkeit äußerst gering. Der sogenannte 'Kältenebel' kann also nur künstlichen Ursprungs sein.

Moskau bleibt unter Nebelglocke gefangen

„So schlimm wie seit 107 Jahren nicht mehr“ / Chaos am Flughafen

R.-M. BORNGÄSSER, Moskau

Bleischwer und grau hängt der Nebel über Moskau. Kein Sonnenstrahl vermag durch die dicke Wolkendecke zu dringen. Die weißen Scheinwerferlampen der Autos geben nur meterweise die Sicht auf die Straßen frei. Nur schemenhaft vermag man die einzelnen Gestalten an den Haltestellen zu erkennen. Nie zuvor war die Stadt stiller. Der Nebel schluckt alle Geräusche wie Watte, lastet wie eine Glocke über Moskau.

Seit fünf Tagen leidet die Stadt an der Moskwa unter dieser extremen Herbstwitterung. Ein „Jahrhundertereignis“, sagen die alten Frauen und hüllen sich fröstelnd noch fester in ihre Mäntel, ziehen das Kopftuch über die Stirn. Der Nebel hat die sowjetische Luftfahrtgesellschaft Aeroflot bereits eine halbe Million Rubel (1,4 Millionen Mark) gekostet. Die Flughäfen in der Sowjethauptstadt blieben auch gestern geschlossen. 35 000 Passagiere, die Hälfte von ihnen Transitreisende, warteten an den drei zivilen Flugplätzen auf ihren Weiterflug. Nach Angaben der amtlichen Nachrichtenagentur Tass bilden die jetzigen Witterungsverhältnisse einen meteorologischen Rekord: Seit 107 Jahren hat es in Moskau nicht mehr so viele Nebeltage gegeben.

Für die meisten Wartenden gibt es keine Hotelplätze mehr. Viele werden in vor Hotels abgestellten Eisenbahnwaggons untergebracht. Sogar ein Pionierlager vor den Toren der sowjetischen Hauptstadt hat man als Nachtlager für die Passagiere eingesetzt. Auf den Moskauer Flughäfen stehen nach einem Bericht der Zeitung „Sowjetskaja Rossija“ so gut wie keine Flugzeuge mehr. Diese seien auf Ausweichflugplätzen in Leningrad, Wilna, Riga und Woronesch gelandet.

Schlimm sind die hygienischen Verhältnisse. Lange Schlangen stehen vor den Toiletten draußen vor dem Flughafengebäude. Wenn es auch bei der Unterkunft hapert, so ist die Versorgung aber gewährleistet. Die Buffets im Halleninneren sind gefüllt, es gibt „Freßbeutel“ mit Brot, Wurst und harten Eiern für einen Rubel. Außerdem steht eine dampfende Feldküche bereit, aus der Suppe ausgeteilt wird. Clevere Händler bieten auf offenen Wegen Äpfel und Pflaumen an. Die größere Schlange der Wartenden aber – man staunt – drängt zu einem Eisstand. Ungeachtet der tristen Umgebung und der kalten Temperaturen lecken die Fluggäste ihr Eis.

Anzeichen für eine baldige Wetterveränderung scheint es noch nicht zu geben. Nach Angaben von Tass sagen die sowjetischen Wetterexperten eine Abschwächung der Nebelfront erst für heute voraus. Das bedeute aber noch nicht, daß sich dann die Sichtweite wesentlich verbessere. Nach Moskauer Angaben hat das sowjetische Ministerium für zivile Luftfahrt sogar eine Krisensitzung einberufen, um die außerordentliche Lage zu beraten.

How the world military situation has changed! While the USA - or more correctly, the anonymously ruling background power of Zion - managed to center the main theater of war in Europe in two world wars in order to eliminate or at least greatly weaken the economic competition of the European states, but above all to ensure that the country that had become independent and the German Reich, which had separated itself from the dictates of high finance, was to be razed to the ground by mass bombing. After 1945, a new, changed situation was gradually created, still unnoticed by the world public. The predatory state of the USA was able - together with its foster child, the USSR - to occupy the German motherland and to maintain a brutal reign of occupation and terror with nuclear, bacteriological and chemical pressure and threats for decades, but despite all this violence, this state, of all people, is from that one Starting from the subjugated people in the heart of Europe, in a way that is hardly imaginable, the greatest danger that they have ever faced in their history arises. Not only that the German flying discs on and over the American mainland have given the mafia ruling there constant insecurity for four decades now, breathing down their necks in a nerve-wracking way, they don't even know when, in what strength, from where exactly and with what new intentions they come back, but also in the huge lake area on her own doorstep, she feels like she is on a powder keg. One of the few options left to her was to conceal the continued existence of Imperial German power, to divert attention to 'aliens' and to trivialize the defeats.

Isn't it understandable that not only the USA, but also the other Allied states have tried everything in the past to locate the bases, hideouts and nests of the flying discs at all ends of the world? Of course with the intention of excavating and destroying them! Always assuming that you also have the technical superiority in weaponry.
If the enemy were at least localized, then a large part of the uncertainty for the Allies would be eliminated.

Because over the course of many years there have been countless reports about the entry and appearance of 'UFOs/USOs' in seas, lakes and rivers, with clusters in certain areas, it was reasonable to assume that these occurred not only over land, but also have underwater bases (which we will report on in Part II of this document). However, since more than 70% of the earth's surface is covered by water masses and the world's oceans are several thousand meters deep in some areas, there is a three-dimensional space beneath the sea surface of a size that is almost unimaginable. This means Allied searches are more like a game of chance, especially since tracking options such as radio, radar, echo sounder, etc. often fail when it comes to UFOs/USOs.

Seabed puzzles!
The American ship 'Eltanin' managed to capture something strange on the seabed. A camera in a metal cylinder, which was lowered from the ship with a cable, made it possible to take pictures of the seabed. On August 29, 1964, 1000 miles west of Cape Horn, at a depth of 4500 meters, an inexplicable

A piece of machinery photographed that, with a series of masts, looked like the intersection of a television and a telemetric antenna. Dr. Hopkins, the marine biologist, said this thing couldn't be a plant or any form of coral because of the great depth. When pressed that it must be a technical structure, he evaded and said, 'I don't want to claim that people built it, because that would raise the question of how they got there - at a depth of 4,500 meters ! - brought. Above all, we don't yet have any underwater vehicles to reach such depths. 'Dr. Hopkins spotted this object on the 45,000-mile-long fault line that circles our planet. So it could be a placed seismograph. Accordingly, an extraterrestrial organization would have to collect vital geodetic and seismographic information about our Earth. One becomes a little uneasy when one considers that either visitors from outer space or an as-yet-unknown terrestrial organization have more knowledge about the dangerous subterranean movements of our Earth than the leading edge of our science. .....

In December 1967, 'Saucer Scoop' (presumably a US UFO newspaper) received numerous reports from commercial fishermen complaining of 'holes' in the Gulf of Mexico and places where the water was 'boiling' in circles, in addition, to UFOs diving into the water and rising out of it. We believe that sea water can only boil if something generates the appropriate heat. We can therefore only assume that someone in these stormy waters is cooking something up for us ('brewing' would be a more accurate translation; HUGIN note). And we cannot resist the photograph of the 'Eltanin' of an alien machine on the 45,000 mile long fracture zone of our planet, reports of 18m long UFOs hovering over the ocean and all these underwater machines appearing next to frightened fishermen - to connect with each other. (UN, No.192, August 1972)

The 'Eltanin' is just one of the many 'research ships' that were used to search for the enemy and their various actions. Not only search operations by the Air Force and the Navy serve this task, but also, according to our assumption, deep diving attempts of an apparently private nature, such as those of the French. Naval officer and deep-sea explorer Jacques Cousteau.
With the headline 'Billions are pouring into exploring the unknown depths; Industrial nations play poker for treasures of the sea' ('Ruhr-Nachr.', August 7, 1984) although one diverts attention to the commercial side of deep-sea research, one also admits: The most fruitful advance is probably in the 'exploration of the unknown Territory as US President Lyndon B. Johnson once said, the US's efforts marked the 'Oceanological Decade': research and work submarines ventured into previously unknown depths, diving devices were developed that allowed free swimming at over 200 m Depth made possible, television cameras explored the seabeds, survey ships began to survey the submarine subsurface of our plan as planned.

Although outwardly the intentionally meaningless term 'UFO' is used for better secrecy, US military research also uses additional code names: Nobody knows how to explain to an astonished public that it corresponds to the complicated space surveillance system of NORAD (North Atlantic Defense Command). , which carries out 15,000 observations a day at altitudes of up to 3,000 kilometers, still gives unidentifiable signals - even though all observations are evaluated. ... But even after the computer evaluation, there are still around a dozen 'boogies' (ghostly apparitions) that remain every day that the NORAD technicians cannot explain. (Correct would mean, 'don't explain may' ; Note: Hugin). They call the unidentified signals "zoo animals." Why? Probably to avoid the term UFO. The unknown flying objects that NORAD registers within the atmosphere are also given a seemingly innocuous name in this organization's reports: UCTs (uncorrelated targets) . Since all of these observations are subject to confidentiality, it is not known whether NORAD technicians have ever compared the mysterious signals they receive with the satellite tracking systems with the ground-based UFO observations (why wouldn't they use every opportunity to register the flying disks? ; Note by HUGIN).

From the series: 'The Mystery of the Century; UFO - spooky or reality?' . 'Colorful Illustrated'; Episode II: 'NASA's Secret Protocols'. 1982. . No. 10, 4. 3

Just as NORAD - the secret North American early warning system - uses very special cover names, the Navy also uses meaningless expressions, for example in underwater searches: I assume that America's scientists are on the trail of one of the greatest secrets of our time. You've probably already figured out most of where the planes and ships have gone. Triangle has disappeared. Under the name 'Sky Traps', the investigation is in full swing. The associated . in recent years off the American coast in what is known as Bermuda processes are concentrated in an area between Florida, Bermuda and the Greater Antilles. ...

Before I address this question, I would like to talk about another study by US scientists called 'Vile Vortices' . This term means something like 'sneaky' or cunning whirlpools'. This investigation is also carried out in the murderous Bermuda Triangle.

From the report: 'Mysterious Bermuda Triangle'; 'U.N' , No. 191, July 1972.

As early as 1945, this zone became a scientific mystery (8*), and the 'Project Magnet', led years later by the Canadian Wilbert Smith , which was intended to bring greater clarity about UFOs, their propulsion and the electromagnetic disturbances they emanate, was also included commissioned to research the processes in the marine areas (16*; also, report from the 'Nürnberger Nachrichten' on page 28). For a time, a group of 160 researchers also worked on the marine phenomena, which was led by Franck von Loeffeli, a former major in the German Wehrmacht who came to the USA with Wernher von Braun and has been working at NASA ever since (8*).

Strange whispering sounds are also reported to come from the Bermuda Triangle. As John Keel writes, the National Bureau of Standards recorded these sounds using microphones and special equipment when it conducted a study of high-frequency sounds in 1965-66. The origin of these whispers could not be determined (16*, p.142)

The American journalist John Keel, who has connections to the Pentagon, reported that the NSA (National Security Intelligence Service), an organization more secret than the CIA, installed a total of 66 listening devices along the American east coast in the direction of the Bermuda Triangle in 1965 ; according to the Norwegian magazine 'Vi Menn', No.6/1988. The report went on to say that in 1967, the NSA conducted additional secret investigations in collaboration with the U.S. Navy carried out in this maritime area. According to John Keel, the seabed was searched using specially equipped research vessels. A large and strange antenna-like installation was found at a depth of 300 m. Nobody knows how it got there, who put it there and for what purpose. The antenna was probably recovered, but the American authorities refused to comment. As far as the 'Vi Menn' , Norway. The report inevitably reminds us of the secret German weather station in northern Canada. About 30 km south of Cape Chidley on the northern tip of Labrador, the German U-537 secretly set up a small weather station in 1943, which was only discovered 38 years later (RN, August 3, 1981; WAZ, August 4, 1981;) and Even that, only due to research by a German, no one in Canada had noticed them (RN, May 31, 1984).

An American setback in the investigation?: On December 18, 1967, in the early morning of December 18, 1967, a fire destroyed the product of 17 years of research at a cost of 5-10 million dollars at the University of Miami's Marine Science Institute. While we don't believe that a 'Black Man' set the institute on fire, we can't help but assume that in this 17 year work there were many clues about these underwater bases and/or what else is actually going on at the bottom of the ocean. It's all turned to ashes now. As the situation is now, officials will deny the inexplicable underwater vessels, just as they have already denied atmospheric UFO activity. (From 'Saga', USA, No. 6/1970; taken from 'UFO-Nachrichten', Wiesbaden, No. 192, August 1972).

American/Soviet Bermuda Research

In the 1970s, new and probably even larger research projects began. There is the American project MODE-I , but also the Soviet POLYGON-70. After an Italian 'expedition' carried out in 1977, a joint American-Soviet project, also in the Bermuda Triangle, began its research activities in the same year under the name POLYMODE , a combination of POLYGON and MODE (8*; 16*)

The announcement of this, as well as the previous, projects was made in the world press with more or less trivializing or meaningless reasons. It's about huge whirlpools of water, about waves that run in the opposite direction to the wind, or about the fact that the Navy just needs to renew its maps of the earth's magnetic fields, or about the fact that at the bottom of the ocean and only in the Bermuda Triangle, something extraordinary strong magnetic fields exist that cause these recurring accidents; or similar distracting excuses. the report 'Region of Terror; News from the Devil's Triangle in the Atlantic' is the headline: Some time ago, reports about the so-called Devil's Triangle, the 'Bermuda Triangle', appeared in the world press again, according to which an American-Soviet research team discovered the phenomenon of gigantic water whirlpools that develop between the Bahamas and the The Bermuda Islands in the Atlantic are able to be formed, examined and explored. MITTELSCHWERER BEWAFFNETER FLUGKREISEL, TYPE „HAUNEBU I"

Durchmesser: 25 Meter
Antrieb: Thule-Tachyonator 7b
Steuerung: Mag-Feld-Impulser 4
Geschwingigkeit: 4800 Kilom.p.Std. (rechn. bis 17000)
Reichweite in Flugzeit: 18 Stunden
Bewaffnung: 2 x 8cm KSK in Drehtürmen und 4 x Mk 108, starr nach vorn
Außenpanzerung: Doppel-Victalen
Besatzung: 8 Mann
Weltallfähigkeit: 60 %
Stillschwebefähigkeit: 8 Minuten
Allgemeine Flugfähigkeit: Tag wie Nacht
Grundsätzliche Einsatztauglichkeit: 60 %
Frontverfügbarkeit: Nicht vor Jahresende 44

Bemerkung: Die SS-E-IV hält Konzentration auf bereits im Versuch stehende „Haunebu II" für sinnvoller als an beiden Typen parallel weiterzuarbeiten. „Haunebu II" verspricht entscheidende Verbesserungen in nahezu allen Punkten. Höhere Herstellungskosten scheinen gerechtfertigt - besonders mit Blick auf Führer-Sonderbefehl, Flugkreisel betreffend.

'Vril' is a well-known expression in esotericism, which therefore does not need to be discussed in detail here. There was even a Vril society in Berlin before 1945.

The expression 'Haunebu' appears in Jürgen Spanuth's books 'The Atlanteans' and 'The Philistines', on a sketch in the area of the North Pole. Haun or Haune means in North German and Frisian: Hune = Giant.

Ungefähres Weltbild der Ägypter um 1200 v. Chr. Um den „Erdkreis" fließt der „Große Wasserkreis" (= sin wur, griech. okeanos). Der Erdkreis ist im „Neun Bogen" geteilt, daher kann der ganze bewohnte Erdkreis auch „alle neun Bogen" heißen. Der neunte Bogen liegt an den „Enden der Erde im fernsten Norden". Die Griechen nannten die „Himmelssäule" „stele boreios" = Nordsäule, den Himmelsträger „Atlas". Die antiken Völker glaubten, daß die Himmelsstütze unter dem Polarstern als dem einzig festen Punkt unter dem sich drehenden Himmelsgewölbe steht.
Obige Darstellung der „Himmelssäule" stammt von einem Schmuckkasten aus Elfenbein aus dem Grabe Tut-Ench-Amons (um 1350 v. Chr.).
Haunebu = eine Bezeichnung für die Nordmeervölker.

One of our readers suggested that the abbreviation used under 'armament': 'KSK' could possibly mean power beam cannon.

In the flying disk sketches 'Haunebu' and 'Vril' the name 'Schumann' appears several times, as well as the Schumann group and Schumann levitators. The name could possibly refer to: 1) Prof. Dr.-Ing. WO Schumann; Worked at the Technical University of Munich in 1926; tested together with his colleague Prof. Dr.-Ing. M. Klose (TH. Berlin) the magnetic current apparatus of the German inventor Captain at sea, Hans Coler (see: 'Secret Wonder Weapons', vol. III, p. 54/55)

2) Prof. Dr. Erich Schumann, head of the German Army's research tasks and scientific advisor to Field Marshal Keitel during the war (see: Secret Miracle Weapons Bd. III, S. 27).

While we Germans who remained in the occupied motherland were unable to recognize the new post-war situation, or rather did not want to, our enemies were very busy in two groups. One group then worked to completely explain away the German flying disc sightings around the world as natural celestial phenomena from the general world public. The other group, like the American Major Keyhoe (in German: Key Hook), or during the war at the English. The Jewish woman Elisabeth Klarer (now South Africa) who worked in the Secret Service, or the Polish-born Georg Adamski (Jew?) together with Desmond Leslie (English fighter pilot in the WWII and grand-nephew of the mass murderer Churchill) and many other people in Allied service, interpreted for individuals and groups who became aware of the German flying discs as space travel operated by 'aliens' and thus launched the topic into an implausible sideline, which then aroused hardly any interest.

Adamski claims to have had contact with a 'Venus man' who landed in the Californian desert on November 20, 1952, who allegedly left footprints and a message (see sketches) and later gave him pictures of his 'Venus spaceship' (see one of the pictures) by drop. What is interesting is that the footprint and message clearly contain swastikas and that his 'pictures' of the 'Venus spaceship' are almost identical to the type shown previously

'Haunebu II'.

While we assume that Adamski knew the origin of these flying disks and only used his - perhaps feigned - 'contact' to pass off the German thing as coming from Venus, Ing.
Erich Halik, who knew very well about German developments, in his 1954 report 'No Invasion from Space', still assumed that Adamski himself was the one who was deceived. Halik wrote: There are now two recent book publications that focus on; I chose 'Cosmic People' as a concept and thus seem to contradict my own interpretation. . . There's the book 'Flying Saucers Have Landed' (Flying Saucers Have Landed) by Desmond Leslie and George Adamski. . . . In the second part of the book, Leslie hands over the pen to his colleague Adamski, who now strictly claims to have had an hour-long encounter with the crew member of a landed 'Flying Disk' on November 20, 1952 in a desert in the state of Arizona, USA. Adamski's description of this event contains a number of details that make the matter seem credible, but which must escape the superficial observer because their recognition requires a certain esoteric knowledge - which, incidentally, Adamski himself seems to be completely lacking. First of all, he lets it be known that from the beginning there must have been at least a mental connection between him and the crew, because he leaves it to the circumstances to lead him to the right place, or at least acts that way to his companions. Once he has found his way there and is confronted with the improbable, he supposedly continues this connection as a supplement to the otherwise limited possibility of communication (poor English, facial expressions and gestures). And here the dramatic break in events occurs that Adamski has not been able to undo to this day: he falls under the spell of his bias, which devalues the entire encounter. Adamski believes that despite his counterpart's completely feminine appearance, he is looking at a 'man from Venus'. His conclusions arise entirely from the notorious 'space consciousness' of North Americans, the scientific and technical fiction. And with that he loses the opportunity to pay attention to the details that could have opened up the whole incident to him. He knows nothing about those dark ones or black badges (HUGIN note: the signs of the 'Black Sun', the esoteric SS) that his companion Dr. Georg Williamson (the very etymologist quoted by Leslie), as a wartime aircraft recognizer, could see on the flanks of the cigar-shaped mother ship from which the small flying disc that his counterpart emerged from came. He no longer recognizes the deep meaning in the color combination of the clothing of his interlocutor, who wears a dark brown, metallic shimmering overalls and blood-colored shoes (HUGIN note: i.e. the colors of the NS blood and soil theory, red and brown). He also stands quite helplessly in front of the footprints left behind, to which his fictional 'Venus man' emphatically pointed out and which show some symbols that can be assigned to a very earthly esotericism: a type of swastika, here definitely used as a circulating symbol of the 'Great Bear' to be understood as representing the North Star, and a representation of Saturn, which Mr. Ing. Lambert Binder believes he recognizes as such. When Adamski finally parted on friendly terms, he was left with a feeling of wistful longing for the supposed home planet of his extremely beautiful 'friend' from 'outer space'. On December 13, 1952, Adamski had one last chance to see things correctly: Near his residence in Palomar Gardens in California (the 'Venusians' must have a well-functioning information service here on earth!), a low-flying disk of the same thing struck him Type dropped a photographic plate, which Adamski gave to the stranger upon his request when he met him on November 20th. In place of the deleted recording, it bears a series of cursive handwritten characters that pose new, almost unsolvable puzzles to Adamski.

Again on top there is a depiction of a cigar-shaped object with the swastika and the black discs (note. HUGIN: symbolic for 'Black Sun'), which Dr. Williamson noticed. And underneath, curly characters in the writing from another world are what Adamiski dreams of to this day. Well, by a lucky 'coincidence', I was able to read this text a few days after receiving the book: It is a text in Old Church Slavonic script and Latin! It mainly points out, in emphatic, concise words, the uselessness of pursuing the objects . This brings us to a point that seems to move the whole affair dangerously close to the possibility of clever mystification. But even if the Adamski team did mystify - and there are several people here who gave notarized statements about their observations - there are enough details in the descriptions that allow the esotericist to classify the entire Adamski story in a group esoteric way. DAS WUNDER VON SCHWEINFURT 1944

DEUTSCHE UNTERTASSEN VERNICHTEN 145 SUPERFESTUNGEN

WOCHEN-Echo

21. Mai 1950 (V. b. b.) 4. Jahrgang, Folge 21, 80 Groschen

das oberkommando der wehrmacht gibt bekannt:

ein starker nordamerikanischer bomberverband flog gestern vormittag nach mitteldeutschland ein, und warf bomben auf mehrere orte. ueber dem gebiet von schweinfurt wurden allein 145 viermotorige bomber vernichtet..........

The one-sided report associated with the above sensational report is largely misleading, like all the relevant reports at the time about German flying disc developments before 1945. In the years 1950 to around 1957, the occupation press tried to dispel existing and justified German hopes by also using them German 'miracle weapons' made the claim or at least expressed the assumption that these fell into the hands of the Allies when they invaded, just like all other military developments. That was or had to be largely believed at the time.

Decades have now passed and evidence has accumulated showing that the Americans and the Soviets in particular are in a constant battle against the so-called 'UFOs'. Therefore, from today's perspective, it is completely illogical that the enemy powers came into possession of the German flying disc technology in 1945!
As in so many areas of anti-German lies, agitation and enemy propaganda, we have to realize that this topic is no different.

Der Frachter „Flying Enterprise" kurz vor seinem Untergang am 10. Januar 1952. Bis zum letzten Moment hatte Kapitän Carlsen sein vom Sturm schwer angeschlagenes Schiff nicht aufgeben wollen. Der Versuch, den havarierten Frachter in den rettenden Hafen von Falmouth zu schleppen, schlug fehl.

Deutsches Zirkonium war für erstes Atom-U-Boot der Welt bestimmt

Taucher bargen geheime Fracht des See-Helden Kapitän Carlsen

Von JOSEF LUCKE

Hamburg (dpa) - Tagelang hielt der Todeskampf des amerikanischen Frachters „Flying Enterprise" und das Schicksal des einsamen Kapitäns an Bord des Havaristen die Welt in Atem.

Gebannt blickten die Menschen auf den Mann, der um die Jahreswende 1951/52 bis zuletzt auf seinem Schiff ausharrte, allein, durchnäßt, ohne Essen, ohne Schlaf, und schließlich doch aufgeben mußte: Kapitän Kurt Carlsen, der sein angeschlagenes Schiff retten wollte.

Am 10. Januar vor 35 Jahren versank die „Flying Enterprise" im Atlantik vor der britischen Küste. Carlsen wurde auf dem Broadway in New York eine solche Konfettiparade bereitet, wie sie bis dahin nur Charles Lindbergh nach seiner Atlantik-Überquerung zuteil geworden war. Was die Öffentlichkeit nicht wußte und erst später Taucher ans Licht brachten: Sein Schiff hatte geheime, nicht deklarierte Fracht an Bord.

Das Barometer fällt. Das keiten von 175 Stundenkilometern peitschen die See zu meterhohen Wellen. Am ersten Weihnachtstag erschüttert ein schwerer Schlag den Frachter. Das Schiff zeigt Risse und droht auseinanderzubrechen. Mit 30 Grad Schlagseite treibt die „Flying Enterprise" in der tobenden See. Carlsen lehnt dennoch die Hilfe des französischen Hochseeschleppers „Abeille 25" ab.

Vier Schiffe - „Noordam", „Greeley", „Golden Eagle" und „Southland" - halten sich am 29. Dezember in unmittelbarer Nähe der „Flying Enterprise" auf. Seine Schlagseite beträgt bereits 50 Grad, als die Passagiere in das eiskalte Wasser springen und von den Rettungsbooten der Hilfsschiffe aufgefischt werden. Die Besatzung der „Enterprise" verläßt noch am gleichen Tag das sinkende Schiff.

Nur Kapitän Kurt Carlsen bleibt an Bord und hofft noch immer, daß sein Frachter gerettet werden kann. Allein treibt er auf dem manövrierunfähigen Wrack in den Wellenbergen, bis am 3. Januar 1952 der britische Bergungsschlepper „Turmoil" am Unglücksort eintrifft. Dem ersten Steuermannn Kenneth Dancy gelingt es, an Bord der „Enterprise" zu kommen. stellen. Mit dem Wrack auf dem Haken macht die „Turmoil" drei Meilen Fahrt in der Stunde zum nächsten Hafen Falmouth am südlichsten Zipfel der britischen Insel. Die „Abeille 25" und der US-Zerstörer „Williard Keith" begleiten den Schleppzug.

Keine 80 Seemeilen - etwa 150 Kilometer - vom rettenden Hafen entfernt, bricht die Schlepptrosse. Der Frachter hat sich inzwischen fast völlig auf die Backbordseite gelegt. Es gibt keine Rettung mehr für das Schiff. Am Nachmittag des 10. Januar verlassen Kapitän Carlsen und „Turmoil"-Steuermann Dancy das todwunde Schiff. 13 Tage hatte Carlsen um sein Schiff gekämpft.

Vieles an dieser Schiffahrtskatastrophe blieb lange Zeit rätselhaft.

Gerüchte

Die sowjetische Marine-Zeitschrift „Rote Flotte" behauptet später, das Schiff wäre zu retten gewesen, wenn der Kapitän als Nothafen Brest angelaufen hätte. Das habe ihm die Reederei aber streng verboten. Damit erhielten Gerüchte neue Nahrung, die „Flying Enterprise" habe geheime Fracht an Bord gehabt. Sie werden lauter, als bei die Bergung von sechs kleinen Stahlkisten, die unter strengster Geheimhaltung nach New York gebracht werden. Sie enthielten reines Zirkonium, ein Metall, das in der Atomindustrie verwendet wird. Die Lieferung war für die amerikanische Atomenergiebehörde bestimmt. Das Geheimnis der sechs Kisten war so sorgfältig gewahrt worden, daß selbst Kapitän Carlsen ihren Inhalt nicht kannte.

Überall, wo Material durch besonders hohe Temperaturen beansprucht wird, etwa in den Brennkammern von Düsenjägern oder Raketen wird das stahlartig glänzende Metall benötigt.

Für dic „Nautilus"

Besser als das bis dahin benutzte Schwere Wasser oder Graphit hemmt es die Kettenreaktion in Atommeilern. Die Bundesrepublik war damals das einzige Land, das die technische Ausrüstung besaß, reines Zirkonium herzustellen.

Ein amerikanischer Atomwissenschaftler gab das Geheimnis der Ladung erst vier Jahre nach dem Untergang der „Flying Enterprise" preis. Wie es hieß, war das Metall für den Kernreaktor des ersten atomge-

15000-Tonner mit 37 Mann im Bermuda-Dreieck verschwunden

b.l. New York — Das mysteriöse Bermuda-Dreieck — ein Gebiet im Atlantik, dessen Dreieckspunkte Puerto Rico, Bermuda und Norfolk sind — hat ein neues Opfer in die tödliche Meerestiefe gezogen:

Der fast 200 Meter lange Erzfrachter (15 000 t) „Sylvia L. Ossa", der unter der Flagge Panamas fuhr, ist verschwunden. Mit ihm 37 Besatzungsmitglieder.

Die amerikanische Küstenwache und andere Schiffe haben keinerlei SOS-Rufe des Erzfrachters, der auf dem Weg von Brasilien nach Philadelphia war, aufgefangen.

Als einzige Spur entdeckte die Küstenwache einen riesigen Ölfleck auf dem tiefblauen Wasser, ein gekentertes Rettungsboot und einen Rettungsring mit Brandspuren.

In dem „Bermuda-Dreieck", von Seeleuten als „Friedhof des Meeres" gefürchtet, sind in letzten Jahrzehnten Dutzende von Schiffen und Flugzeugen und viele hundert Menschen verschwunden, ohne daß logische und natürliche Erklärungen dafür gefunden wurden.

Die „Sylvia L. Ossa" hatte am vergangenen Mittwoch letzten Funkkontakt mit dem New Yorker Eigentümer. Ihre Position: 145 Meilen westlich von Bermuda. Zwei Tage später sollte das Schiff im Zielhafen sein.

Hamburger Morgenpost 25.10.76

Niemand weiß, wo der Erzfrachter „Silvya Osso" geblieben ist: Zuletzt meldete sich Kapitän El Bakh am 13 Oktober um fürf Uhr morgens

Bermuda-Dreieck: Riesiges Schiff spurlos verschwunden

at Miami, 2. November

Drei Schwimmwesten — nicht benutzt. Ein Rettungsfloß — nicht aufgeblasen — das war alles, was nach tagelangem Suchen von dem Frachter „Sylvia Ossa" entdeckt wurde. Der 180 Meter lange Erzfrachter ist vor zwei Wochen mit 37 Mann im berüchtigten Bermuda-Dreieck verschwunden.

Und wieder stehen die Experten vor einem Rätsel: 21 Schiffe, 16 Flugzeuge und mehr als 1000 Menschen sind in dem Teufelsdreieck zwischen Puerto Rico, Florida und den Bermudas verschollen. Eine logische Erklärung für diese Fälle gibt es nicht — auch nicht für das letzte Unglück.

● „Das Schiff ist nicht explodiert — sonst hätten wir Wrackteile finden müssen", schrieben die Experten in ihrem Bericht.

● Die „Sylvia Ossa" (15 000 Tonnen) kann auch nicht bei Sturm untergegangen sein. Sogar ein 8,50 Meter langes Segelboot erreichte im gleichen Gebiet sicher den Yachthafen.

● Das Schiff kann auch nicht auseinandergebrochen sein. In diesem Fall hätte der Kapitiän Zeit für SOS-Signale gehabt. Von der „Sylvia Ossa" kam überhaupt kein Signal.

Kapitän El Bakh, der seit Jahren Eisenerz von Rio nach Philadelphia bringt, meldete sich zuletzt am 13. Oktober um 5 Uhr morgens, 210 Kilometer westlich von Bermuda. „Einen Tag zuvor ließ er sich an unseren Computer-Rettungsdienst anschließen", sagt Francis Eyre von der US-Küstenwache . . .

Lloyds fällt Todesurteil für „Kiki"

Mitte Januar auf der Fahrt nach Jugoslawien spurlos verschwunden

LONDON (ap)

Mitte Januar dieses Jahres lief der in Famagusta (Zypern) beheimatete 3750-BRT-Frachter „Kiki" von Emden nach Jugoslawien aus. Am 21. Januar meldete sich das Schiff zum letzten Male. Was danach geschah, wird vermutlich immer ein Geheimnis bleiben. Am heutigen Mittwoch wird bei der Lloyds-Versicherung in London das Todesurteil über Schiff und Besatzung gesprochen: Die „Kiki" wird, nachdem alle Suchaktionen vergeblich blieben, auf Beschluß des Lloyds-Vorstandes offiziell als „vermißt" geführt.

Der Eigner kann jetzt seine Versicherungsansprüche anmelden, die Ehefrauen der Besatzungsangehörigen werden nun auch amtlich Witwen. Die Eintragung in den Lloyds-Listen bedeutet, daß weder Überlebende, noch Tote, noch Wrackteile gefunden wurden, das Schiff ist einfach spurlos verschwunden.

UFO-Schock und Rettung im Bermuda-Dreieck

von Riki Moss

Forscher auf den Bahamas untersuchen Berichte, wonach ein UFO eine Familie vor dem sicheren Ertrinken bewahrte, nachdem ihr (Urlaubs)-Boot im Bermuda-Dreieck sank. Dr. Leopold Stinson berichtete einem Symposium in Caracas/Venezuela, daß der Vorfall, welcher sich am 5. Mai 1986 ereignete, alle Anzeichen einer nachweisbaren Begegnung mit Außerirdischen trägt.

Stinson zitierte die Familie, wie sie ausgesagt hat, daß das UFO aus der See in die Höhe stieg, gerade Sekunden, nachdem ihr 11 m langes Boot unterging. „Unglaublich, sie nahmen die Hilfe des Raumschiffes an und retteten sich in das herabgelassene Rettungsboot, das die Insignien der US-Air-Force trug.“

Stinson meinte, daß die Suche nach einer entsprechenden Nummer, infolge der großen Anzahl von Flugzeugen, die im Bermuda-Dreieck verschwanden, Wochen, Monate oder Jahre in Anspruch nehmen könnte.

Unterdessen konzentrieren sich die Untersuchungen auf Berichte der geretteten Familie.

Gemäß Dr. Stinson war die Familie auf einer mehrmonatlichen Segeltour durch die Karibik. Sie meldeten sich gerade auf ihrem Weg zu den Bahamas, als ihr Boot Wasser aufnahm. Ihr eigenes Rettungsboot war in einem inneren Teil der Yacht verstaut, aber das Boot sank so schnell, daß sie es nicht herausbekommen konnten. Sie berichteten mir, daß sie SOS funkten, aber insgeheim rechneten sie sicher mit dem Tode.“

Die Familie weiter: „Das UFO – goldfarben und sternförmig aussehend – schoß ca. 70 m aus dem Wasser heraus. Zu dieser Zeit waren sie alle wie von Sinnen vor Angst“, äußerte sich Stinson.

Sie berichteten mir: „Das Raumschiff schwebte einige Sekunden über ihren Köpfen, dann verschwand es am Himmel. Die sprachlose, aber dankbare Familie schwamm zum Schlauchboot und kletterte an Bord. Erschüttert von ihren fürchterlichen Erlebnissen, drängten sie sich in der Finsternis der nächtlichen See eng zusammen,“ fügte Stinson hinzu.

Etwa 20 Minuten später fand die Besatzung eines Sportfischer-Bootes der Bahamas die schwimmende Familie in ihrem Boot und brachte sie ans Ufer“, sagte Stinson.

Sie berichteten den Fall gegenüber offiziellen Stellen, die Dr. Stinsons UFO-Forschungsgruppe für das Bermuda-Dreieck benachrichtigten. Carlos Garcia, ein Wissenschaftsreporter in Caracas, meinte, die Reaktionen unter Stinsons Symposiums-Kollegen waren geteilt.

„Jetzt sind sie gespannt auf seinen Bericht in den Zeitungen, dann können sie die Beweise selbst bewerten.“ sagte er.

US-Marine hebt ein UFO aus dem Puget-Sound

Ein abgestürztes UFO, das aussieht „wie solides Gold", und von zwei Tauchern nahe der US-Küste unter Wasser gefunden wurde, ist mysteriös verschwunden. Jedoch wächst der Verdacht, daß das abgestürzte Flugobjekt außerirdischer Herkunft, von der US-Navy in einer geheimen Mission geborgen wurde. Die Regierung verheimlicht den mysteriösen UFO-Absturz nahe Seattle.

Vergl. auch „Taucher suchen nach UFO" in UN Nr. 292, März/April 1985, wo schon einleitend über den Absturz in USA berichtet wurde, mit dem Hinweis auf Ergänzungen, die nun hier folgen.

UN Nr. 296, Jan./Febr. 1986

Das metallische, mit einer Kuppel ausgerüstete Flugobjekt wurde genau an dem gleichen Platz gefunden, wo vorher Augenzeugen berichtet haben, daß ein „glühendes UFO" in das kalte Wasser des Puget Sound von Bellingham, Washington, gestürzt sei. Die Augenzeugen berichteten, das Weltraumschiff schleuderte einen Schauer von Funken und Flammen mindestens 70 Fuß (22 m) hoch in die Luft und verwandelte das Wasser in einen kochenden Schaum.

UFO crash mystery

A submerged UFO, found off the U.S. coast by two divers, has mysteriously vanished. But there is growing suspicion that the downed alien craft was recovered — in a secret cover-up mission carried out by the Navy!

Witnesses say impact hurled sparks & flame 70 feet in air

Did a Navy team secretly recover wreckage found by two divers?

Einige Wochen später haben die Taucher namens John Walker und Richard Burke aus Seattle drei Tauchversuche gemacht, am gleichen Platz, wo das UFO ins Wasser stürzte. Beide berichteten, daß sie ein großes, kuppelförmiges Objekt fanden, goldfarben und 60 m tief unter Wasser halb im Schlamm steckend. Trotz seines gespenstischen Aussehens in den turbulenten und schlammigen Tiefen, verleitete das versunkene Objekt Burke zu aufgeregten Schreien. „Mann! Ich stehe auf dem UFO", schrie er durch seinen Helm-Sprechfunk. „Es ist verdammt groß". Burke beschrieb das Objekt als etwa 6 m im Durchmesser und aussehend wie eine umgedrehte Untertasse. Halb vom Schlamm bedeckt mit etwa 45° Schräglage. „Als ich mich draufstellte, konnte ich ein nieder-frequentes Brummen hören", sagte er. „Das hat uns sehr nervös gemacht. Es schien etwa 3,5 m hoch, aber wir konnten es nicht genau sagen, weil es im Schlamm steckte."

Burke und Walker machten noch zwei Tauchversuche, an zwei darauffolgenden Tagen. Drei Tage später kamen sie zurück, um das UFO zu bergen. Aber diesmal konnten sie es nicht mehr finden.

Unter wachsendem Verdacht, daß das Pentagon die Bergung veranlaßte, haben die Regierungs-Offiziellen jegliches Wissen über das UFO abgeleugnet und sich geweigert, dazu Stellung zu nehmen. „Ich weiß nicht, ob wir das Objekt haben oder nicht", erklärte ein hochrangiger NAVY-Offizier in Washington/D.C. „Wenn das so ist, wäre es sowieso eine Geheimsache. Es könnte ja auch ein militärisches Gerät sein."
Bruce Maccavee, Physiker vom Verteidigungs-Minsterium sagte: „Das untertassenförmige Objekt könnte ein hochgradiger UFO-Beweis sein, der jedoch niemals an die Öffentlichkeit kommen würde! „Puget Sound ist vollgeladen mit Navy-Ausrüstungen", sagte Dr. Maccavee der „Weekly World News". „Ich denke, wenn die Navy das Objekt bergen wollte, könnte sie es gemacht haben, ohne daß es jemand merkt. Meine Meinung ist, daß da was dort war, und jetzt eben ‚verschwunden' ist. Aber wenn es die NAVY hat, dann weiß ich nicht, wie man sie dazu zwingen kann, das UFO herauszugeben."

Biskaya-

Von HANS ILG-MOSER

In der Biskaya, dem berühmt-berüchtigten Meer zwischen dem französischen Brest und dem spanischen La Coruna, tobt seit dem frühen Nachmittag ein gewaltiger Orkan. Haushohe Wellen, Hagel, gefährliche Strömungen – die Biskaya ist in dieser Stunde ein brodelnd-kochendes Wasserinferno.

Mittendrin: der italienische Frachter „Tito Campanella" mit 25 Männern an Bord.

In Brest versuchen die Funker der französischen Marine-Präfektur seit Stunden verzweifelt mit dem 13 000-Tonnen-Frachter in Kontakt zu kommen.

Doch die „Tito Campanella" meldet sich nicht mehr . . .

Am nächsten Morgen, als der Orkan abgeflaut, die Sicht besser geworden ist, steigen Suchflugzeuge der französischen Marine auf. Sie sollen das Schiff orten und feststellen, was mit ihm geschehen ist.

„Nackte Angst"

Die Piloten fliegen die Route des Frachters nach, halten nach Trümmern, Rettungsbooten und Ölflecken Ausschau – ohne Erfolg: Die „Tito Campanella" bleibt verschwunden, hat sich spurlos aufgelöst . . .

Das war am 19. Januar 1984. Wieder einmal hat das Schicksal im Atlantik zugeschlagen – im tödlichen Biskaya-Dreieck!

Die Schreckensnachrichten reißen nicht ab:

- ● Der Panama-Frachter „Radiant Med" wird in der Biskaya wie ein Streichholz geknickt, säuft ab. 17 Seeleute sterben. Das Wrack wird Tage später an die gefährlichen Klippen südlich von Brest geworfen.
- ● 13 Tage später sinkt aus bisher ungeklärter Ursache der ebenfalls in Panama registrierte Frachter „Midnight Sun" – acht Menschen ertrinken.
- ● 30 Seeleute sterben, als der 32 000-Tonnen-Frachter „Marina de Equa" bei einem Orkan auseinanderbricht und in wenigen Minuten sinkt. Die Besatzung hatte noch nicht einmal Zeit, einen Notruf zu funken . . .

Die Liste des Schreckens, des Todes, läßt sich beliebig verlängern.

Die Biskaya – ein neues, unheimliches „Bermuda-Dreieck?"

Die englische Reederei mußte die 150 Kreuzfahrt-Passagiere mit dem Flugzeug nach Lissabon bringen, die „World Renaissance" wurde von einer eilends angeheuerten Not-Crew nach Lissabon überführt – unter weiträumiger Umgehung der Biskaya.

Liegt auf der Biskaya ein tödlicher Fluch?

„Ich habe Angst vor diesem Trip", schrieb der 2. Offizier der „Tito Campanella", Marco Incorvaia, an seine Mutter in Neapel, kurz bevor er mit seinem Frachter in Malmö auslief.

Marco Incorvaia und 24 seiner Kameraden sind mit ihrem Schiff verschwunden . . .

Immer mehr Seeleute fragen sich: Wer wird der nächste sein? Wen von uns trifft's?

Über 50 Schiffe sind in den letzten zehn Jahren in der Biskaya gesunken, mehr als 150 Menschen fanden zwischen Brest, La Rochelle, Santander und La Coruna ihr Seemannsgrab.

NASA-Physiker entdeckt

UFO-Basis vor der Küste Floridas

Von Frank Nelson

BEWEISE DEUTEN DARAUF HIN, DASS DAS VERSCHWINDEN VON MEHR ALS 120 SCHIFFEN UND FLUGZEUGEN IM GEHEIMNISSVOLLEN „BERMUDA-DREIECK" AUF FLIEGENDE UNTERTASSEN ZURÜCKZUFÜHREN IST.

Unidentifizierte Fliegende Objekte benutzen eine abgelegene Bahama-Insel als Basis für die Überwachung der US-Raumflüge und als Ausgangspunkt, um menschliche „Musterexemplare" von der Erde wegzuholen.

Dr. Jonathan Wright, NASA-Physiker, enthüllte diese aufsehenerregende Nachricht letzte Woche in seinem Hotel in Nassau (Hauptstadt der Bahamas. D. Ü.), nachdem er von einer dreiwöchigen Forschungs-Kreuzfahrt durch die abgelegene Inselwelt zurückgekehrt war.

Dr. Jonathan Wright ist überzeugt, eine UFO-Basis auf den Bahamas gefunden zu haben.

„Es besteht kein Zweifel darüber", sagte Dr. Wright, „wir haben eindeutige Beweise dafür, daß UFOs regelmäßig auf einer winzigen Insel landen, ungefähr 50 Meilen von Grand Cayman entfernt."

Die „Dreieck" genannte ‚unheimliche Zone' umreißt das Gebiet vieler merkwürdiger „Verluste". DC-3-Flugzeuge (wie das oben abgebildete) verschwanden spurlos 1948 und 1949. Insgesamt 56 Passagiere waren an Bord der beiden Flugzeuge.

Zahlreiche Boote, die in dieses Gebiet segelten, verschwanden auf unerklärliche Weise.

Dr. Wright ist der Leiter einer besonders vorrangigen UFO-Forschungsabteilung der NASA. Er war auch Mitarbeiter der UFO-Studie, welche vor 2 Jahren von der Universität von Colorado für die Air-Force durchgeführt wurde.

und das Flugzeug verschwanden, entschlossen wir uns, der Sache nachzugehen" fuhr er fort. „Mit einem kleinen Boot, bestückt mit elektronischem Gerät, fuhren wir zu einer der kleinen Inseln hinaus und warteten ab."

Nach zwei Wochen berichtete Dr. Wright, daß sein Forscherteam drei glänzende kreisförmige Objekte sichtete, die in nicht allzu großer Entfernung am Horizont niedergingen.

Eine Woche später stiegen sie dann wieder auf und verschwanden im Nachthimmel. Dr. Wright fuhr mit seinem kleinen Boot näher heran, um besser beobachten zu können; und zwei Wochen später landeten die drei Objekte von neuem.

Dr. Wright berichtet, daß seine Mannschaft auf der kleinen Insel an Land ging und auf die fremdartigen Maschinen zuging, aber er möchte nicht sagen, was er sah, als er davorstand.

Dr. Wright sagt, daß ein bestimmter Zusammenhang besteht zwischen den in Kap Kennedy empfangenen mysteriösen Radiosignalen und dem Verschwinden von kleinen Flugzeugen und Luxusyachten im Bermuda-Dreieck.

Die NASA läßt nicht sehr viel über die Radiosignale verlauten, aber jedermann kann von den spurlos verschwundenen Flugzeugen und Booten lesen, die alle im Monat Dezember in verschiedenen Jahren verlorengingen.

Am 5. Dezember 1945 starteten sechs Marine-Flugzeuge von Fort Lauderdale und verschwanden spurlos. Ein Mitchell-Bomber mit 13 Mann Besatzung, der sie suchen sollte, verschwand

Dr. Wright ist der Leiter einer besonders vorrangigen UFO-Forschungsabteilung der NASA. Er war auch Mitarbeiter der UFO-Studie, welche vor 2 Jahren von der Universität von Colorado für die Air-Force durchgeführt wurde.

Das NASA-Team wurde kurz vor Weihnachten auf die Bahamas beordert, als wieder einmal zwei Schiffe und ein Flugzeug auf rätselhafte Weise verschwanden; in einem Gebiet, welches „das Bermuda-Dreieck" genannt wird.

Mehr als 120 Schiffe und Flugzeuge sind bis jetzt in dem Dreieck zwischen Bermuda, Miami und den Bahamas spurlos verschwunden.

„Jahrelang verwunderten wir uns darüber, was sich in dieser Gegend abspielte", sagte Dr. Wright. „Im Kontrollzentrum von Kap Kennedy empfingen wir zu den Startzeiten immer wieder seltsame elektronische Signale. Unsere Instrumente zeigten an, daß sie aus diesem Gebiet stammten."

Es gab dann auch dieses „berühmte" Verschwinden von Flugzeugen und Schiffen in diesem Dreieck. Und insbesondere lagen uns von einigen dieser Inseln verschiedene Berichte über UFO-Sichtungen vor.

„Als schließlich im Dezember die zwei Schiffe verschiedenen Jahren verlorengingen.

Am 5. Dezember 1945 starteten sechs Marine-Flugzeuge von Fort Lauderdale und verschwanden spurlos. Ein Mitchell-Bomber mit 13 Mann Besatzung, der sie suchen sollte, verschwand ebenfalls nach dem Funkspruch, daß er die Orientierung verloren habe.

Die Marine entsandte einen Flugzeugträger in dieses Gebiet und 50 Flugzeuge suchten nach Überresten der verlorengegangenen Maschinen, aber sie fanden nichts — nicht einmal einen Ölfleck.

Im Dezember 1948 verschwand im Gebiet des „Dreiecks" eine DC-3 mit 32 Passagieren an Bord, und im Dezember 1949 verschwand spurlos eine weitere DC-3 mit 24 Menschen an Bord. Von keinem der beiden Flugzeuge wurde auch nur ein einziges Wrackteil gefunden.

Im Dezember 1957 verschwand eine Regatta-Yacht südlich von Bermuda.

Im Dezember 1963 verschwand eine weitere DC-3 zwischen San Juan und Miami.

1967 verschwand spurlos ein Kajütboot genau nördlich von Grand Cayman. Die neuesten Fälle vom Dezember 1970 betreffen zwei weitere

Segelboote und ein Sportflugzeug.

Dutzende von Suchflugzeugen fanden auch nicht eine Spur in dem genau bestimmten Gebiet, aus dem die Bootskapitäne und der Pilot ihre letzten Funksprüche durchgaben.

Sehr merkwürdig ist, daß alle UFO-Sichtungen auf den Bahamas immer im Monat Dezember gemacht wurden!

Eine unbewohnte Insel wie diese wird nach einer bis jetzt noch nicht freigegebenen NASA-Untersuchung von UFOs benutzt.

ganz in der Nähe eines der wichtigsten Wissenschaftszentren Amerikas liegt.

Nun haben sie das eigenartige Geheimnis um das Bermuda-Dreieck einmal geschaffen — und das ist für sie von großem Wert.

Sie können weiterhin im Dezember vereinzelte Schiffe und Flugzeuge rauben, und sie sorgen dafür, daß es dann so aussieht, als ob ein unbekanntes Naturphänomen die Ursache sei, damit sich die Menschen nicht ängstigen.

Die Leute werden eben sagen: „Ach ja, im Bermuda-Dreieck ist wieder ein Flugzeug 'runter. Das paßt ihnen so!"

Das sind solche, wie wir sie auf der Insel sahen, und aufgrund dessen, was sie da machten, können wir sagen, daß sie unseren Mondstart vom 25. Januar überwachten.

Sie sind bei dem ganzen Unternehmen sehr vorsichtig, so, als wollten sie die Menschen auf der Erde nicht in Panik versetzen. Sie beobachten lediglich ein wissenschaftliches Projekt, unser Mond-Programm, und nehmen nur ein oder zwei „Musterexemplare" alle 2 bis 3 Jahre mit."

Dr. Wright möchte keine detaillierte Aussage darüber machen, wie er sich das Verschwinden von Schiffen und Flugzeugen denkt, aber er deutet die Möglichkeit an, daß das riesige UFO-Mutterschiff zur Erdoberfläche herabkommt und in der Tat ganze Yachten aus dem Wasser hebt, oder neben einem kleinen Flugzeug herfliegt und es in der Luft kapert.

UFOs über dem Michigan-See/USA

Von William Gryzik

Die große „Untertassen-Jagd“ des Jahres 1960 über dem Michigan-See ging planmäßig im Oktober zu Ende. Sie wurde von vielen Augenzeugenberichten umrahmt, wonach viele Unbekannte Fliegende Objekte sowohl im Michigan-See, nordöstlich von Chicago, als auch in der Bucht von Guantanamo (Stützpunkt der US-Marine) auf Kuba gelandet sind.

„Raumschiffe, allgemein „Fliegende Untertassen“ genannt, benutzen die Tiefen der Gewässer als Treffpunkte,“ erklärte der Chicagoer Patentingenieur und Weltraum-Enthusiast Radiokommentator John Otto.

Eine Gruppe von 75 Mitgliedern der „Great Lakes Identified Flying Objects Association“ (Vereinigung der Ifo-Studiengruppen der Großen Seen) fuhr mit elektronischer Spezialausrüstung an Bord von Fischerbooten von Waukegan aus hinaus auf den See, um ernsthaft zu versuchen, mit diesen Raumschiffen Kontakt aufzunehmen. Diese von Normann Jack Maynard aus Waukegan geführte Gruppe wurde durch den Obermaat Charles V. Dillon von der Marineschule der Großen Seen zu diesem Unternehmen veranlaßt.

Dillon, ein „Achtzehnender“ der Marine, hatte dieses Phänomen während seiner Dienstzeit in Kuba beobachtet und zum ersten Mal öffentlich bei einer Zusammenkunft der Forschungsgruppe Maynard in Waukegan darüber gesprochen.

Er war damals am 21. Juli 1959, Führer einer Wachmannschaft in der Bucht von Guantanamo, als er und seine Männer ein „orangefarbenes Glühen“ an einem Berghang bemerkten. Sie näherten sich der Stelle weit genug, um „zwei große, orangefarbene Dinger, so wie Augen“ erkennen zu können. Er wies seine Leute aber an, nicht näher heran zu gehen. Am nächsten Morgen untersuchte er die Stelle selbst. „Es gab dort keinerlei Hufspuren oder andere Anzeichen dafür, daß dort irgendwelche Tiere gewesen sind,“ sagte er, „aber das Gras war umgelegt, so, als ob irgend etwas darüber hinweg und den Abhang hinunter, direkt in den Ozean geglitten sei. So, als ob jemand eine große Bratpfanne von 2 m Durchmesser genommen hätte und sie in das Meer gleiten ließ.“

Dillon sagte, er hätte — subjektiv gesprochen den Eindruck, daß der Bodeneindruck durch ein Ufo entstanden war. „Was mich anbetrifft, so glaube ich, daß es von sonstwo her kam. Woher? Ich weiß es nicht. Das Universum ist ja sehr groß. Ich meine; es kam aus einer anderen Welt.“

Maynard, der von sich behauptet, mehr als 50 „sichere“ Sichtungen gehabt zu haben, sagte auch, daß er seit sechs Jahren UFO's über dem Michigan-See beobachtet habe.

„Am Heiligen Abend 1954 sah ich ein Objekt aus dem See heraus aufsteigen und im Raum verschwinden. Ich sah es so klar, daß ich sogar den Sprühregen erkennen konnte,“ berichtete er der UFO-Studiengruppe. „Meine letzte Sichtung hatte ich vor einigen Wochen, als ich die Zollstraße entlang fuhr und ein sehr gro-

Am 13. Februar 1963 suchten ein Hubschrauber der Marineflieger-Station Glenview und ein Küstenschutz-Kutter, die „Raritan“, in der Dämmerung den Michigan-See vor der Küste von Evanston ab, weil ein Student der Nordwest-Universität gemeldet hatte, er habe etwas beobachtet, was wie Leuchtsignale aussah. Auch habe er eine Explosion auf dem See gehört. Hubschrauber und Kutter fanden im bezeichneten Gebiet aber nur ein kleines Fischerboot und einen Tanker der „Sinclair Oil Co.“, bei denen aber alles in Ordnung war.

In einem anderen Fall, am 21. April 1963, abends, wurde von vielen Einwohnern Chicagos eine glühende, flammende Kugel beobachtet, die anscheinend im Michigan-See verschwand. Man glaubt, es sei ein großer Meteor gewesen. Doch zu gleicher Zeit wurde in einem Gebiet von drei Staaten eine starke Stoßwelle wahrgenommen. War es ein Flugzeugabsturz? Ein Meteor? Fachleute gerieten durch eine rätselhafte Stoßwelle aus der Fassung, die in verschiedenen Teilen des Mittelwestens, darunter Illinois, Kentucky und Ohio verspürt wurde.

Die unerklärliche Explosion gegen 19.30 Uhr war besonders stark in der äußersten Südostseite Chicagos und den Indiana-Vororten spürbar. Wegen der Vielzahl der einlaufenden Meldungen waren sich die Behörden nicht darüber klar, ob mehr als ein ungewöhnliches Ereignis eingetreten war oder ob alle Anfragen die gleiche Ursache hatten.

Sergeant W. M. Kacak von der Polizei in Whiting erklärte: „Es hat mich fast von meinem Stuhl gehauen“. Zahlreiche Einwohner meldeten ratternde Fenster und andere, wahrscheinliche Effekte der Stoßwelle.

Einem unbestätigten Gerücht zufolge soll der Stoß durch das Auskippen von Schlacke in den Michigan-See in der Nähe der Industriegebiete von Indiana verursacht worden sein. Leitende Männer der Ölraffinerie erklärten, sie wüßten nichts über eine Explosion. Die Luftwaffe war der Ansicht, der Stoß könnte von einem Meteor verursacht worden sein, der ungefähr zu der Zeit die Stelle überquerte, als die Effekte der Stoßwelle wahrgenommen wurden.

Eine Meldung aus Canton, Kreis Fulton, Illinois, daß ein Flugzeug „wie eine Feuerkugel“ abgestürzt sei, erwies sich als falsch.

Eine andere Meldung, datiert vom 25. Juni 1963, daß ein Flugzeug auf dem Michigan-See notgelandet sei, erwies sich glücklicherweise ebenfalls als Irrtum.

Der Alarm brachte die Polizei, die Feuerwehr sowie die Marine und den Küstenschutz zum Einsatz. Es wurde jedoch kein Flugzeug gefun-

Über die Ergebnisse der „Untertassen-Jagd" wurde nichts bekanntgegeben. Zwei Versuche, brieflich mit dieser Studiengruppe Kontakt aufzunehmen, blieben erfolglos. Als Letztes erfuhr ich, daß sich diese Gruppe aufgelöst hat.

In den letzten Jahren gab es viele Meldungen über „Flugzeuge", die man in den See stürzen sah. Niemals wurden jedoch Ölflecke oder Wrackteile gefunden und was noch merkwürdiger ist... es wurden nirgends Flugzeuge als verschollen gemeldet!

daß ein Flugzeug auf dem Michigan-See notgelandet sei, erwies sich glücklicherweise ebenfalls als Irrtum.

Der Alarm brachte die Polizei, die Feuerwehr sowie die Marine und den Küstenschutz zum Einsatz. Es wurde jedoch kein Flugzeug gefunden.

Die Aufregung begann, als ein Mr. Viktor Walter (61) aus West Jarvis bei der Polizeizentrale anrief und meldete, er habe aus seiner im 3. Stock gelegenen Wohnung mit dem Fernglas ein Flugzeug beobachtet, das in den über dem See gelegenen Dunst herunter gegangen und nicht wieder heraus gekommen ist. Er meinte, es habe sich in einer Entfernung von mehreren Kilometern vor der Küste befunden und er hielt es für ein viermotoriges Düsenflugzeug.

Vier Polizeiboote, drei Küstenschutz-Kutter und mehrere Privatboote rasten los und suchten, zusammen mit einem Hubschrauber, über eine Stunde lang das ganze Gebiet ab. Sie fanden aber nicht einmal einen Ölfleck. Daraufhin wurde die Suche eingestellt.

Weder von der Flugsicherung der Flughäfen O'Hara und Meigs Field noch von den militärischen Stellen in Glenview und Bunker Hill A. F. B. in Peru, Indiana, wurden Flugzeuge als vermißt gemeldet.

Viele Chicagoer Einwohner wurden in den letzten Jahren durch zahlreiche sogenannte „Schallmauer-Knalle" erschreckt. Einige davon waren durch Flugzeuge verursacht worden, andere blieben ungelöste Rätsel. Der „rote Schein", der manchmal im südlichen Teil Chicagos beobachtet wird, wird mit „Reflektionen des Stahlwerkes in Gary, Indiana", wegerklärt. Rätselhaft bleiben auch die „blauen Blitze", die hauptsächlich in den Wintermonaten gesehen werden. Sie scheinen aus der Gegend südlich von Chicago zu kommen. Erwecken Chicago und seine Umgebung, einschließlich des Michigan-Sees, etwa eine besondere Neugier der UFOs?

UFO breaks through polar ice

German translation from the magazine 'People', Australia, May 27, 1985:

Many marine experts are convinced that UFOs operate from bases that lie deep beneath the surface of the sea. This theory gained enormous momentum during the US Navy Operation Deep Freeze in Antarctica.

Crew members aboard an icebreaker in Admiralty Bay watched in amazement as a massive, silvery vessel broke through the thick ice and then hurtled into the night sky. According to the logbook, the ice that tore through the bullet-shaped object was at least 12 m thick. Huge blocks of frozen seawater were thrown high into the air and cascaded down around the outlet where the sea was boiling and spewing steam.

This incident was just one of hundreds that have occurred between ships and UFOs over the past 40 years. So many saucers appeared over the seas around Australia that in 1966 the US Navy sent Professor McDonald here to study them. His discoveries of 'drifting reefs' and glowing balls of light observed submerging in Bass Strait (between Australia and the island of Tasmania) were never released to the public. But this overwhelming evidence shows that something strange is going on beneath Australia's seas. Many sea captains and their officers have reported seeing gigantic, "seemingly alien" craft near their ships have seen.

A typical witness was Captain Julian Ardanza of the Argentine ship Naviero. While cruising off the Brazilian coast, he and his crew saw a 'giant glowing cigar' on the starboard side. 'She made no noise and there was no sign of a sea pipe to be seen'.....

UFO SMASHES THROUGH POLAR ICE

MANY NAVAL experts are convinced that UFOs operate from bases deep beneath the ocean.

The theory received a dramatic boost during the US Navy's Operation Deep Freeze in the Antarctic.

While crew-members aboard an icebreaker in Admiralty Bay watched amazed, an immense silvery craft smashed upward through thick ice and hurtled into the night sky.

According to the ship's log, the ice through which the bullet-shaped object sliced was at least 12m thick.

Huge blocks of frozen seawater, hurled high into the air, came cascading down around the exit hole, in which the ocean boiled and spouted steam.

This encounter was only one of hundreds reported between ships and UFOs in the past 40 years.

So many saucers have appeared above seas around Australia that in 1966 the US Navy sent a Professor McDonald here to study them. His findings, about "floating reefs" and glowing globes of light seen plunging into Bass Strait, have never been publicly released.

But the sheer weight of evidence suggests that something very strange is going on beneath Australia's oceans. Many sea captains and their officers have reported seeing gigantic, seemingly alien craft near their ships.

UFO ATTACKS SOVIET SHIP IN THE ARCTIC

Soviet icebreaker fooled by UFO

A Soviet. Icebreaker cruising in the Kara Sea located a bizarre object using sonar.

By William Schandler:

The crew of a Soviet icebreaker played cat and mouse for over 72 hours with a mysterious underwater object later described by a reliable East German source as the size of a football field .

The exciting encounter began when the Soviets spotted the object - said to be a black disk surrounded by red, flashing lights - on radar in the Kara Sea. According to the report, the object did not respond to the Soviet radio message that was intended to force it to the surface.

It has been officially confirmed that depth charges, which are occasionally used to break up thick ice floes, were thrown onto the pane without success. It is said that at least one Soviet sailor was washed overboard when the object crashed through the polar ice and disappeared into space. The East German informants also said that the icebreaker sustained surface damage from huge chunks of ice falling from the disk as it shot into the sky.

"My understanding is that after the object rose from the sea it hovered over the ship for 20 minutes," said a source who asked to remain anonymous. 'It was described as bright black, like onyx, with flashing red lights around the edge. Strangely, nothing was said about whether it made any noise, although it appears to be an object whose size suggests this.'

The informant said that Soviet fighter pilots ascending from a Siberian base failed to intercept the object, which soared north, then south and suddenly disappeared into space.

Soviet military spokesmen angrily denied that any such encounter took place. The Kremlin bosses added that the icebreaker "may have had an encounter with a pod of sperm whales."

But a Swedish amateur radio operator, Lars Gundersonn, told the press that he heard the Soviet pilots talking about the object during the pursuit. 'They said they were after a flying disc,' said Gundersonn. 'One of them said it was the size of a football field. Another said: "Don't shoot. We don't want to hurt you."'

The sighting of the object followed a year of unprecedented UFO activity in and around the Kara Sea.

Asked to explain the alleged Soviet encounter, French UFO researcher André Poinot said: 'There are reasons to believe that something is going on there'.

Now UFO researchers are speculating about what the UFO was doing there. Some believe that strangers from outer space have collected samples of terrestrial underwater life in the cold waters of the Arctic Circle (nice nonsense; note HUGIN). Others believe the UFO may have hidden under the ocean to make some makeshift repairs. # End of report.

In our opinion, the same maneuvers and battles with the Soviets are taking place here in the northern Arctic Ocean (Kola Peninsula, Barents Sea, Novaya Semelya, Kara Sea) as with the Americans in the Bermuda Triangle. One also thinks of the explosive destruction of the military installations on Kola in 1984 (see the red HUGIN font: 'World Bolshevism'). Furthermore, it cannot be ruled out that the UFOs/USOs also have an underwater base here that the Soviets tried to locate and destroy. If so, then it is an endeavor that will remain fruitless.

MIND-BOGGLING MYSTERY IN THE ARCTIC CIRCLE

RUSSIAN FIGHTER JETS attempted to intercept the object described as a "shiny black disc with flashing lights on its edges." A stunned pilot said the object was as "big as a soccer field."

Soviet icebreaker matches wits with UFO

SONAR EQUIPMENT first recorded starship's presence.
DEPTH CHARGES were dropped off the massive ship's stern.
SUPERFICIAL DAMAGE was sustained when the "black disc" broke free of polar ice.

SOVIET ICEBREAKER cruising the Kara Sea used sonar to locate the bizarre object.

„The crew of a Soviet icebreaker played cat and mouse for more than 72 hours with a mysterious underwater object that was later described as being big as a soccer field, East German sources report.

The nail-biting confrontation began when the Soviets spotted the object — allegedly a black disc surrounded by flashing red lights — on sonar in the Kara Sea.

The object reportedly did not respond to Soviet radio transmissions ordering it to surface.

And it is believed by officials that depth charges, occasionally used to break up heavy ice floes, were dropped on the disc without effect. At least one Soviet sailor is said to have been washed overboard when the object crashed through the polar ice and vanished into space.

The East German sources also said the icebreaker suffered superficial damage from huge chunks of ice that fell off the disc when it made its ascent to the heavens.

"It is my understanding that the object hovered over the ship for 20 minutes after it emerged from the sea," said one source, who requested anonymity.

"It was described as being shiny black, like onyx, and having red, flashing lights on its edges. Curiously, nothing was said about it making any noise, even though it seems like an object that big would have to."

The source said Soviet fighter jets scrambled from a base in Siberia failed to intercept the object as it traveled south, then north, and then suddenly vanished into space.

72-hour standoff ends when starship crashes through polar ice cap!

I SAW A PHANTOM SUBMARINE

From the Norwegian illustrated weekly magazine 'Vi Menn' , No.3, 1986. Translated into German by Olaf Braun, Norway:

Unknown submarines are reported again and again in our waters. But they disappear without a trace. Spy submarines from a foreign power? Not always. The American Navy has admitted that phantom submarines exist. These USOs are the sea's answer to the UFOs.

Submarine hunts in Norwegian and Swedish waters end as usual. The intruders disappear without being identified.
Officially, it is said that the unknown underwater vehicles that plague Scandinavian waters year after year belong to a foreign power. What they actually are, who owns them, who mans them and why they operate secretly is a world-spanning mystery.
The fact that the open seas and coastal waters were visited by USOs was a well-kept secret until 1962. But then the American naval intelligence service, ONR, was forced to admit their existence.
The world's naval forces are powerless against these mysterious invaders and have so far only managed to confirm their fantastic properties. They appear unexpectedly in shallow waters. They resist mines and anti-submarine missiles. They can rise from the water and fly away at rocket speeds, disappearing into space within a few minutes.

The Swedish journalist Jan-Ove Sundberg, who is writing a book about these mysteries, has collected unique material about these mysterious submarines, which VI MENN is publishing here for the first time in Norway:

On January 27, 1962, a US Navy icebreaker was in the waters of Admiralty Bay in Antarctica. He was part of a fleet that carried out clandestine military operations . Suddenly you heard a rumble coming from the ice. The next moment 'something' shot out of the sea. Through seven meters thick ice. An approximately ten meter long, shiny silver vehicle resembling a submarine rose into the clouds and disappeared with dizzying speed. Enormous blocks of ice were thrown around and water cascades 30 meters high rose up from the hole. A scientist on the icebreaker, Rubens Villela from Rio de Janeiro, leaked the news to the mainstream media in Brazil. And when American journalists took up the matter and presented it to the Navy, the Navy had to admit that there was a type of unknown underwater vehicle called USOs or Phantom Submarines. This unveiling was not a sensation in South America, as phantom submarines have been visiting there since the 1950s. Just after midnight in July 1952, the crew of the Brazilian cargo ship 'Naviero' outside El Salvador got the shock of their lives. A self-luminous, submarine-like craft emerged from the storm-tossed sea and set itself on a collision course. It was at least 30m long, glowed blue-white in the darkness and looked menacing. 'Naviero' turned the engines aft. But the phantom submarine suddenly increased speed, swerved, and disappeared like a missile over the foaming waves. In February 1957, the crew of an Argentine patrol boat saw a giant glass-domed vehicle slide into the Rio de la Plata. Two hunters (certainly meaning hunting boats) blocked the exit. Helicopters equipped with hydrophones searched. And five corvettes simultaneously began to drop mines into the bay. The hunt lasted five days. Several contacts were registered. Since then the submarine had disappeared without anyone knowing how. When the Antarctic event became known, another sensation filtered through: 'Captain Nemo has risen,' joked a retired American naval officer in an interview with the New York Times. 'I saw a phantom submarine in the North Atlantic myself. We were near Greenland on a submarine hunting exercise when it appeared.

The episode happened during World War II. And believing he was dealing with a Nazi German submarine, the captain of the hunter gave the order to open fire. The Phantom submarine, which had a glass-like structure with a very fast rotating periscope, was hit by several volleys. But it was still undamaged. As the bombardment continued, it dived vertically and disappeared into the depths.
In the 1960s, submarines began to operate in the Baltic Sea. Fruitless hunts for them followed each other. At the same time, the Swedish Navy registered an increase in collisions between trawlers and 'something' in underwater position.

On June 23, 1968, the Norwegian tanker 'Texaco Bogota' left Norrköping; a 19,000 ton truck that had extinguished gasoline. The port of destination was in England. The following morning the tanker passed Kapelludden on Öland. Suddenly he was shaken by a dull explosion. Two port tanks were blown and a large portion of the side was torn open. The ship started to burn. The captain and crew were rescued under dramatic circumstances. But one man died in the sea of flames. The ship was moved to the naval shipyard in Karlskrona, where divers examined the hull. There was never an explanation for what was found there. Beneath the blast damage were two mysterious holes, 15 cm in diameter and triangular in shape, with the point facing upwards. But the most sensational thing was that the edges of the two holes were bent inwards. There were many theories. Spontaneous combustion, torpedoing, mine blasting and grounding. But after detailed examination of the explosion damage, experts were able to do all of these

Drop theories. Afterwards it was only said that an underwater object could have caused this damage. And this must have hit the 'Texaco Bogota' with tremendous force. A month later, the Japanese tanker 'Yoho Maru' left the Persian Gulf with oil for Japan. Suddenly the crew noticed a tremor in the hull. The 88,000 ton truck then began to vibrate. Investigations showed that 11,000 tons of oil spilled out through a giant hole in the center tanks just below the waterline. (Someone is wrong here. The center tanks are located in the middle of the ship, viewed lengthwise. They can only be reached from below. According to the photo, this means the side tanks, starboard, approximately amidships; note Olaf Braun.) Four months later there were The Japanese Classification Society made a sensational statement: an unidentified underwater object collided with the hull of the ship. He tore a hole that was 16 m long, 3 m high at the forward edge and 7 m high at the aft edge.

In Swedish waters, one submarine hunt replaces the other. Of course, the geographical proximity of the Eastern Bloc and the fact that there are spy submarines in the Baltic Sea does not rule out the possibility that one or two foreign submarines belong to a foreign power. But according to the 'unwritten law' of these submarines, they always leave Swedish waters when they are discovered. The Phantom Submarines, on the other hand, have proven to have nothing to fear and can fool the Navy for as long as they want.

There is no doubt that there are phantom submarines operating in Swedish waters. Only a few residents of the coast were allowed to say publicly that they had seen something like this. They contacted the Navy about their sighting and were muzzled. Civil engineer Gunnar Lindberg from Öckerö outside Gothenburg is an exception. It happened on the night of May 26, 1976, when Lindberg was ten nautical miles east of the Skagen light with his yacht 'Cybel 11' . 'A mysterious light suddenly appeared 50-100 m in front of my boat. "It was above the water at first, but sank below the surface as I approached," Lindberg said. The vehicle was large, but the luminous surface did not exceed 2 m in diameter. He is certain that it was not a foreign submarine. The large, dark mass that hid under the mysterious light was shaped like a torpedo with a curved, closed deck and was at least 25 m long. (HUGIN's note: by 'foreign submarines' we still mean conventional ones, such as possibly Soviet boats; the others are therefore the 'phantom submarines'.)

Other recreational sailors in the Skagerrak have reported similar vessels. In the Kattegat as well as in the Baltic Sea, trawler crews have seen 'luminous, submarine-like objects' rise from the water like gliders and disappear silently.

In the waters near Gotland at the end of the 1970s, a cargo ship most likely fell victim to a fast Phantom submarine. It was April 2, 1977. North of Gotska Sandön, the 4,600 ton freighter 'Immen' was slogging through darkness and storm when it was suddenly hit by something from below. The ship developed a leak and water ingress. The 13-man crew went into the rubber rafts and, after a dramatic operation, was brought to safety by the maritime rescue service's helicopters to Visby. There are divided opinions about what sank the 'Immen'. The wreck at a depth of 140 m was filmed by a TV camera from Saab Scania's underwater robot 'Saab Sub' and a new type of diving bell, and was also videotaped by a diver sent down. According to the accident commission in Gothenburg, 'a large and heavy object must have collided with the 'Immen' from behind, where it must have torn a 1 x 0.5 m triangular hole in the aft end'. But that's not official. Nobody in the Karlstad shipping company Ahlmark, which owned the 'Immen', wants to speak out. You point to the navy.

The Navy? Yes, the navy plays a confusing role in the most puzzling accident in Swedish maritime history.

Three days after the Immen sank, a helicopter flew to the site and lowered a hydrophone. It registered something sensational: 'Regular, metallic crunching', which, according to the press release from the naval staff, 'came neither from the 'Immen' nor from a foreign submarine'. The Navy quickly retracted the news of the mysterious sounds, but added that the "helicopter thing" is classified as classified.

What does the Navy know about phantom submarines? As far as the phrase 'security of the empire' is concerned, we will probably never hear anything about it. In 1978, the American fleet quietly inaugurated the advanced long-range sonar system ASW. It cost $10 billion and can track any underwater vehicle up to 10 miles away, wherever it is in the world. Despite the use of ASW, vehicles, aircraft and helicopters, specially equipped hunting submarines and other super technology: the phantom submarines continue to hunt. We in Scandinavia will often receive visitors. But next time you shouldn't say that the navy is too poorly equipped. Because so far no country has managed to catch one of these mysterious phantom submarines.

Havets uløste gåte

-JEG SÅ EN FANTOM-UBÅT

Gang på gang rapporteres det om ukjente ubåter i våre farvann. Men de forsvinner sporløst. Spion-ubåter fra en fremmed makt? Ikke alltid. Den amerikanske marinen har innrømmet at det eksisterer fantom-ubåter. Disse *USO*ene er havets svar på UFO.

Slik ser et ekko fra en gjenstand under vann ut (den lille tingesten ovenfor frekvenslinjen). Det er meget vanskelig å avgjøre eksakt hva det er. (Foto: Sveriges marine.)

Om natten den 26. mai 1976 dukket en fantom-ubåt opp nær Gunnar Lindbergs havseiler «Cybel II» i Skagerrak. (Foto: UFO-information.)

Ubåtjakter i norske og svenske farvann ender som de pleier. Inntrengerne kommer seg unna, uten å være identifisert.

Offisielt heter det at de ukjente undervannsfartøyene som år etter år hjemsøker skandinaviske farvann, tilhører en fremmed makt. Hva de egentlig er, hvem de tilhører, hvem som bemanner dem, og hvorfor de opererer i hemmelighet er en verdensomfattende gåte!

At verdenshavene og kystfarvannene besøkes av USOs — Unidentified Submarine Objects (uidentifiserte undervannsfartøyer) — var en vel bevart hemmelighet inntil 1962. Da ble den amerikanske flåtens etterretningstjeneste, ONR, tvunget til å innrømme at de eksisterer.

Verdens sjøstridskrefter står maktesløse overfor de mystiske inntrengerne og har til nå bare klart å kartlegge deres fantastiske egenskaper. De dukker opp uventet og i grunne farvann. De motstår synkeminer og antiubåtraketter. De kan heve seg fra vannet og fly av sted med rakettfart, for så å forsvinne i rommet på noen minutter.

Den svenske journalisten Jan-Ove Sundberg, som skriver en bok om gåten, har samlet et unikt materiale om de mystiske ubåtene, som VI MENN her publiserer for første gang i Norge:

Den 27. januar 1962 befant en isbryter fra US Navy seg i farvannet ved Admiralty Bay i Antarktis. Den deltok i en flåteeskadre som utførte en hemmelig militær operasjon.

— Et uidentifisert undervannsobjekt kolliderte med skipets skrog og rev opp et hull i skipssiden som var 16 meter langt på «Yohu Maru» i Den persiske bukt. (Foto: UFO-information.)

Plutselig hørtes et bulder fra isviddene. I neste øyeblikk skjøt «noe» opp av havet. Gjennom syv meter tykk is!

En cirka ti meter lang, sølvglinsende og ubåtlignende farkost steg mot skyene og forsvant med svimlende hastighet. Enorme isblokker ble kastet vidt omkring, opp av hullet sprutet 30 meter høye vannkaskader.

En vitenskapsmann på isbryteren, Rubens Villela fra Rio de Janeiro, lekket nyheten til massemedia i Brasil. Og da amerikanske journalister tok saken opp med marinen, ble ONR tvunget til å medgi at det eksisterte en type ukjente undervannsfartøyer som de kalte USO eller fantom-ubåter.

I Sør-Amerika ble ikke avsløringen mottatt som noen sensasjon, for der har man hatt besøk av fantom-ubåter siden 1950-tallet!

Straks etter midnatt i juli 1952 fikk besetningen på det brasilianske lasteskipet «Naviero» utenfor El Salvador sitt livs sjokk. Et selvlysende, ubåtlignende fartøy dukket opp av det stormpiskede havet og la seg på kollisjonskurs!

Det var minst 30 meter langt, glødet blåhvitt i mørket og virket truende. «Naviero» slo bakk. Men fantom-ubåten økte plutselig farten, vek unna og forsvant som en rakett over de skummende bølgene.

I februar 1957 så besetningen på en argentinsk patruljebåt et kjempefartøy med glasskuppel som gled inn i Rio de la Plata. To jagere sperret utløpet. Helikoptere utstyrt med hydrofoner søkte. Og fem korvetter begynte systematisk å slippe synkeminer i bukten. Jakten pågikk i fem døgn. Flere kontakter ble registrert. Siden forsvant ubåten, uten at man visste hvordan.

Da hendelsen i Antarktis ble kjent i USA lekket ytterligere en sensasjon ut:

— Kaptein Nemo har gjenoppstått, spøkte en pensjonert marineoffiser i et intervju med New York Times. — Jeg har selv sett en fantom-ubåt i Nord-Atlanteren. Vi befant oss nær Grønland på en øvelse i ubåtjakt da den dukket opp. Episoden inntraff under Den annen verdenskrig. Og i den tro at ubåten tilhørte nazi-Tyskland, ga jagerens kaptein ordre om å åpne ild.

Fantom-ubåten, som hadde en glasslignende overbygning med et snurrende periskop, ble truffet av flere salver. Men den var likevel uskadd! Mens beskytningen fortsatte, dukket fartøyet rett ned og forsvant i dypet.

På 60-tallet begynte ubåtene å operere i Østersjøen. Resultatløse jakter på dem avløste hverandre. Samtidig noterte den svenske marinen en økning av tallet på kollisjoner mellom trålere og «noe» i undervannsstilling.

Den 23. juni 1968 gikk det norske tankskipet «Texaco Bogota» på 000 tonn ut fra Norrköping etter å ha losset bensin. Bestemmelsesstedet var England.

Om morgenen dagen etter passerte tankskipet Kapelludden på Öland. Plutselig ble det rystet av en dump eksplosjon. To babords tanker ble sprengt, og en stor del av skipssiden revet opp. Skipet begynte å brenne.

Kapteinen og besetningen ble reddet under dramatiske omstendigheter. Men en mann omkom i ildhavet. «Texaco Bogota» ble buksert til Karlskronas orlogsverft, der dykkere undersøkte skroget. Det man fant der har aldri fått noen forklaring. Under selve eksplosjonsskaden fantes to mystiske hull, 15 cm i diameter og triangelformede med spissen vendende opp. Men det mest sensasjonelle var at platekantene i de to hullene var bøyd innover!

Mange teorier ble lansert. Selvantennelse, torpedering, minesprengning og grunnstøting. Men etter inngående undersøkelser av eksplosjonsskaden kunne ekspertene avskrive alle disse teoriene. Siden fastslo man at bare en undervannsgjenstand kunne ha forårsaket skaden. Og den må ha truffet «Texaco Bogota» med uhyggelig kraft.

En måned senere forlot det japanske tankskipet «Yoho Maru» Den persiske bukt med olje til Japan. Plutselig merket besetningen en rystelse i skroget. Deretter begynte det 88 000 tonn store fartøyet å vibrere. Undersøkelser viste at 11 000 tonn olje fosset ut gjennom et kjempehull i sentertankene like under vannlinjen.

Fire måneder senere avga det japanske klassifiseringsselskapet en sensasjonell uttalelse om årsaken:

— En uidentifisert undervannsgjenstand kolliderte med fartøyets skrog. Den rev opp et hull, som var 16 meter langt og med en høyde av tre meter i forkant og syv i akterkant.

I svenske farvann avløser den ene ubåtjakten den andre. Den geografiske nærheten til østatene og det faktum at det finnes spion-ubåter i Østersjøen utelukker naturligvis ikke at en og annen ukjent ubåt har tilhørt en fremmed makt.

Men ifølge den «uskrevne lov», som gjelder for disse ubåtene, begir de seg alltid ut av svensk farvann etter å være oppdaget. Fantom-ubåtene har bevislig ingenting å frykte. Og kan holde marinen for narr så lenge de vil.

At fantom-ubåter opererer i svenske farvann hersker det ingen tvil om. Få beboere ved kysten har fått anledning til å uttale seg offentlig om at de har sett en slik. De har henvendt seg til marinen med sin observasjon og er blitt pålagt taushetsplikt.

Sivilingeniør Gunnar Lindberg fra Öckerö utenfor Göteborg er et unntak. Det hendte natten til den 26. mai 1976, da Lindberg med sin havseiler «Cybel II» befant seg 10 distanseminutter øst om Skagens fyr.

— Et mystisk lys dukket plutselig opp 50 til 100 meter foran båten. Det lå først på vannet, men sank under overflaten da jeg nærmet meg, forteller Lindberg. Fartøyet var stort, men dets lysende ytterflate ikke mer enn to meter i diameter.

At det ikke dreide seg om en fremmed ubåt er han sikker på. Den store, mørke massen som skjulte seg under det mystiske lyset hadde nemlig konturene av en torpedo med hvelvet, lukket dekk. Og den var minst 25 meter lang.

Andre fritidsseilere i Skagerrak har rapportert om lignende fartøyer. I så vel Kattegatt som Østersjøen har trålerbesetninger sett «selvlysende, ubåtlignende gjenstander» heve seg fra vannet som glidefly og forsvinne lydløst.

I farvannet omkring Gotland falt på slutten av 70-tallet et lastefartøy med største sannsynlighet som offer for en hurtiggående fantomubåt. Det var den 2. april 1977. Nord for Gotska Sandön stevnet det 4600 tonns lastefartøyet «Immen» i mørke og storm, da det plutselig ble truffet av noe nedenfra. Skipet sprang lekk og begynte å ta inn vann. Den 15 mann store besetningen gikk i gummibåtene og ble etter en dramatisk innsats av sjøredningstjenestens helikopter i Visby brakt i sikkerhet.

Hva som senket «Immen» er det delte meninger om. Vraket på 140 meters dyp er blitt filmet med TV-kamera av Saab Scanias undervannsrobot «Saab Sub» og en avansert dykkerklokke, og er blitt videofilmet av en nedsendt dykker.

Ifølge havarikommisjonen i Göteborg må «en stor og tung gjenstand ha kollidert med «Immen» bakfra, der den i akterenden rev opp et 1 × 0,5 meter stort, triangulært hull». Men det er ikke offisielt!

I Karlstad-rederiet Ahlmark, som eide «Immen», vil ingen uttale seg. Man henviser til marinen! Marinen? Ja, i dette det mest gåtefulle havari i svensk sjøfartshistorie, spiller marinen en forvirrende rolle.

Tre dager etter «Immen»s forlis fløy et marinehelikopter til stedet og senket ned en hydrofon. Den registrerte noe sensasjonelt: — «Regelmessige, metalliske knakinger», som ifølge en pressemelding fra marinestaben «hverken skrev seg fra Immen eller en fremmed ubåt».

Marinen trakk raskt tilbake opplysningen om de mystiske lydene, men la samtidig til at «helikoptertilfellet» var hemmeligstemplet!

Hva vet marinen om fantom-ubåtene? Med henvisning til frasen om «rikets sikkerhet» får man formodentlig aldri vite det.

I 1978 innviet den amerikanske flåten i stillhet et avansert langdistanse sonarsystem kalt ASW. Det kostet ti milliarder dollar og kan lokalisere hvert undervannsfartøy på 16 kilometers avstand. Hvor den enn befinner seg i verden.

Trass i ASW, innsats av fartøyer, fly og helikoptre, spesialutstyrte jaktubåter og annen superteknikk, jager fantom-ubåtene videre. Vi i Skandinavia får nok nye besøk. Men si ikke at marinen er for dårlig utstyrt neste gang. For ennå har ikke noe land klart å fange en av de gåtefulle fantom-ubåtene! ●

THE CIRCLE OF DEATH

German translation by Olaf Braun, from the Norwegian magazine 'Det Ukjente', P.Ir.4/ 1987. The five-page report was adapted to the presentation of the 'Texaco Bogota' and 'Immen', which we already know from the previous translation. shortened:
'Strange things happen not only in the American Bermuda Triangle. Something similar is also happening in the Swedish waters near Öland and Gotland. Swedish sailors call this area the 'Circle of Death' (Dodens Sirkel: Circle of Death).

«DØDENS SIRKEL»

Det er ikke bare i det amerikanske Bermudatrianglet det skjer merkelige ting. Også i de svenske farvannene rundt Öland og Gotland skjer noe tilsvarende. Svenske sjøfolk kaller disse områdene for «Dødens sirkel».

Tekst: Jan-Ove Sundberg

Tidlig om morgenen den 24. juni 1968, ble tankbåten «Texaco Bogota», truffet av mystiske gjenstander, som luget et triungelformet hull på babord side. Gjenstandene forårsaket brann og eksplosjoner, og en av mannskapet døde. Foto: Pressens Bild.

Siden våre forfedre sjøsatte det første skipet, har utallige fartøyer forlist her. Men ikke før i nyere tid, har man etterhvert fått mistanke om at det er noe mystisk med disse forlisene.

«Dødens sirkel» ble også hjemsøkt av fremmede undervannsfartøyer lenge før de begynte å dukke opp andre steder i svenske farvann. Og bare i et fåttall av disse hendelser, mener marinen det kan ha vært involvert fremmede makters ubåter.

I luften har man dessuten observert uidentifiserte flyvende gjenstander siden 1950. Enkelte har lignet de klassiske UFO'ene, andre har hatt en helt ukjent form.

Om morgenen 8. november i 1984, var kaptein Björn Somnell på vei hjem i sin Viggen til base F-13 i Norrköping. Klokken var 11.29, pluss 50 sekunder, når han ga følgende melding til basen på fastlandet: «Jeg stiger fra 300 til 1000 meter».

Deretter ble radiokontakten plutselig brutt, og Viggen-flyet forsvant fra radarskjermene.

Mystisk og uforklarlig styrtet det i dypet mellom Oland og Gotland — like i «Dødens sirkel»!

I hele syv minutter etter krasjet, registrerte landbasens radar via en radar i lav høyde ved Smålandskysten — en eller annen gjenstand med direkte tilknytning til ulykkesstedet. Men av radarbildene fremgår det ikke om gjenstanden befant seg på vannoverflaten eller i luften.

— Etter det jeg vet, har vi aldri tidligere sett noe lignende, sier oberstløytnant i luftforsvaret, Gösta Edwards.

Vraket ligger på 80 meters dyp. Statens havarikommisjon har klart å berge noen vrakdeler, men mysteriet er bare blitt mere uforklarlig.

Da det ikke fins noe som helst tegn på at flyet eksploderte i luften, spør man seg f.eks. om hvorfor kaptein Somnell ikke hoppet ut fra flyet? Flyhøyden var tilstrekkelig, sikten svært god og været bra.

Oberstløytnant Edwards sier at hverken vrakdeler, brannrøyk eller fugler, kan ha forårsaket det mystiske radarekko, som de mottok fra nedslagsfeltet.

Ennå, drøye to år etter kaptein Björn Somnells uforklarlige dødsstyrtning i

Der «Immen» forliste, spilte et helikopter fra marinen inn metalliske lyder, som aldri har fått noen forklaring.

Since our forefathers launched the first ship, countless ships have sunk here. But only recently

There was a suspicion that there was something mysterious about these ship accidents.
The 'Circle of Death' has been plagued by strange underwater vehicles long before they appeared elsewhere in Swedish waters. The Navy believes that foreign submarines were involved in only a small number of these events.

However, unidentified flying objects have been observed in the air since 1950. Some resembled classic UFOs, while others had completely unknown shapes.
On the morning of November 8, 1984, captain Björn Somnell was in his Viggen (Swedish fighter: O.Br.) on the way home to the F-13 base in Norrköping (southwest of Stockholm: O.Br.). The clock read 11 hours, 29 minutes and 50 seconds when he sent the following message to the base on the mainland: 'I am climbing from 300 to 1000 meters'. The radio connection suddenly broke off and the Viggen aircraft disappeared from the radar screens.
Mysteriously and inexplicably it fell into the depths between Öland and Gotland.. into the 'circle of death'.
For a full seven minutes after the crash, the radar on the F-13 land base registered some object on the radar at low altitude on the Saamland box, directly related to the crash site. But it wasn't clear from the radar image whether this object was on the surface of the water or in the air. 'As far as I know, we've never seen anything like this before,' says Air Force Lieutenant Colonel Gösta Edwards. The wreck lies at a depth of 80 meters. The state accident commission has recovered a few pieces of wreckage, but that has only made the mystery even more inexplicable.

Since there is no sign at all that the plane exploded in mid-air, one wonders, for example, why Captain Somnell didn't jump out of the plane. He had enough altitude, visibility was very good and the weather was good too. Lt. Col. Edwards says that neither debris, smoke from the fire, nor birds could have caused the mysterious radar echoes received from the crash area.
So far, a good 3 years after the inexplicable crash in the 'Circle of Death', the state accident commission has not yet solved the mystery.

A police officer is always seen as a 'trained observer' or 'trusted witness' and no one doubted what detective assistant Ernst Aakerberg saw on Gotland one evening in 1957.
On August 5th this year, at around 10 p.m., Aakerberg and his wife Karin drove a few acquaintances to a fishing hut on Lergravsvik in northeastern Gotland. Suddenly the group saw two strange flying vehicles gliding across the bay from the sea. The discus-shaped vehicles passed dangerously close to some high cliffs and the only sound that could be heard from them was a strong draft of air that rippled the surface of the water and moved the trees.

The vehicles were approximately 25 meters in diameter and streamlined. The color on the bottom half was silver gray and shone like stainless steel. In a rotating capsule on the top half, two 'protruding parts' could be seen, with edges curved upwards. They saw no badges, windows or portholes - just the outline of an elongated engraving. 'When I later inquired with the military authorities, I was told that the Luftwaffe had no aircraft in the area at the time,' said Ernst Aakerberg.

During an exercise on the morning of January 27, 1965, the submarine 'Springaren' suddenly collided with an unknown underwater object! The collision was not severe and, according to the Navy, the 'Springaren' sustained only minor damage. But the submarine had to abandon the exercise and go to port for repairs. The matter about who collided with the 800-ton Swedish submarine has been kept secret. According to newspaper reports at the time, a source within the armed forces said that it was 'a type of underwater vehicle that was completely unknown to us'.

This mysterious vehicle operates all over the world and is called USO, Unidentified Submarine Object.

'OBSERVED THROUGH BINOCULARS. During a LV 2 firing exercise at the Tofta firing range, the military saw 'an enormous unidentified flying object' over the sea, just north of Öland.
It was Wednesday, August 23, 1978. It was 8:10 p.m. The two conscript radar observers Kenneth Kurkiaho and Kenneth Berg stood in the radar tower at the Tofta shooting range, about 20 km south of Visby on Gotland.

During the exercise, their task was to look over the sea with the help of battery-operated binoculars and radar and to inform any ships that might appear about the bombardment zone.

The sun had already set. The weather was clear and visibility was good. Both radar observers spotted the object at the same time and Kenneth Kurkiaho said: 'First we saw it with the naked eye, then through binoculars. It was enormously large and was relatively far away, at an altitude of 1500 meters. It lay still in the air and gave off white light. The incredible one

Machine Translated by Google

Object slowly descended to the water, to the 'circle of death'. 'The object was a good 60 km away from us, just north of the northern tip of Öland, but the radar echo was as large as that of a merchant ship about two miles away,' continues Kenneth Kurkiaho. (HUGIN's note: From the description it must have been a huge object.)

Their boss, Ensign Lars Olowsson, immediately notified coastal surveillance. But before vehicles and planes could examine the matter more closely, the object disappeared into the depths!
Afterwards, the commander-in-chief of the Eastern Military Area tried to explain the object as 'part of an exploded satellite'. But the Air Force's leading experts had another explanation: 'It was the northern tip of Öland that had been seen! 'The many witnesses call this an attempt at a cover-up. -

The final mystery in the 'Circle of Death' took place on July 22, 1986, when the minesweeper 'Skaftö' was almost hit by a USO in Kalmar Sound. The strange underwater vehicle was discovered at a so-called 'family day', which means that close relatives are allowed to be on board the vehicle. For this reason, the commander did not dare to open fire on the vehicle. (The Swedish press reported on this incident; the 'VG' on October 6, 1986 and the 'Dagbladet' on October 7, 1986; the men of the Swedish Navy had women and children on board. Apparently in full knowledge of this situation, has let us look at the 'USO' up close; note HUGIN.) But parts protruding from the water could be photographed and recorded on video. All USO images were secretly stamped by the Defense Staff.

So many mysterious things have happened between Öland and Gotland so far that professional fishermen, recreational sailors and others are confronting the authorities with questions: What is actually in the depths that threatens our lives? What caused the holes in the Norwegian tanker (Texaco Bogota)? What sank the 'Immen' and why were the investigations declared secret? What did the Navy actually discover on the seabed and now later on the surface? What do we know about the tragic fatal crash of the Viggen plane?

While the authorities remain silent, mysterious lights flicker in the sky over Öland and Gotland and unknown vehicles race across the sky and into the depths of the 'Circle of Death.'

Der Skjervøy-Fall

Der nachfolgende Bericht aus den UFO-INFORMATIONEN, Oslo, behandelt eine sehr interessante norwegische Sichtung aus dem Jahre 1963.

Die Beobachtung wurde auf der kleinen Insel Skjervøy im nördlichsten Teil Norwegens gemacht. Nachfolgend eine Zusammenfassung des Geschehens, wie es von dem Beobachter, Helge Mikalsen, Skjervøy, beschrieben wurde:

Am 21. oder 22. August 1963, nachmittags 5 Uhr, machte ich mich mit meinem Boot zu einem Fischfang im Kagsund, in der Nähe von Skjervøy auf. Das Wetter war klar, kein Wind. Gegen 6.30 Uhr änderte ich meine Position, mehr zu dem versunkenen Felsen „Skjervøyskjeret“; westwärts sah ich zur Insel Arnøy. Plötzlich sah ich eine Flamme, wie aus einer Rakete, dem Abschuß nach kam sie aus den Bergen. Erst dachte ich, die Marine hätte einen Übungsauftrag. Wenn dem so war, mußte es sich um etwas Neues handeln, denn ich sah eine etwa 2 m hohe orangefarbene Flamme. Dann sah ich ein Objekt, das kerzengerade hochstieg, jedoch war die Geschwindigkeit nicht so groß wie die einer abgeschossenen Rakete! In einer Höhe von etwa 1830 m verlosch die Flamme und ich erkannte die scharfen Umrisse eines grauen Objektes. Ich hielt es für eine Art Ballon oder Fallschirm. Dann bewegte sich das Objekt ostwärts gegen den Wind, behielt die gleiche Höhe und überflog eine Bergspitze (ca. 720 m) sowie ein kleines Dorf. Als es aus dem Sund sich mehr mir zuwandte, kam es tiefer und ich stellte fest, daß es weder Ballon noch Fallschirm war. Dann kam mir plötzlich der Gedanke, es könnte ein UFO sein. Nun konnte ich zwei Objekte ausmachen, ein größeres und ein kleineres. Das Größere hatte 5 große Fenster in der mir zugekehrten Seite, die etwa 1,85 m hoch und an der Spitze oval waren. Die Entfernung zu dem Objekt betrug ca. 150 m. Es schwebte etwa 15 Meter über dem Wasser. Auf einmal gingen zwei Schienen aus dem größeren Objekt runter und das schmalere hängte sich hieran und wurde in das große hineingezogen. Das schmalere war oval und etwa 3 m groß. Weder Flamme noch Rauch konnten beobachtet, auch kein Laut gehört werden.

Es war jetzt etwa 6.40 Uhr nachmittags. Ich muß gestehen, ich war nervös und hatte Angst. Ich sah mich wegen anderer Zeugen um, konnte aber kein anderes Boot sehen. Der Wind verstärkte sich, die See war dunkel, jedoch blieb unterhalb des Objektes alles ruhig und blank. In einem der Fenster des Objektes sah ich ein grünes Licht (etwa 30 cm ∅), dessen Strahl auf mich gerichtet war. Dieses runde Licht änderte die Farbe von hell zu dunkelgrün. Irgendetwas schien sich hinter dem Licht zu bewegen. Ich versuchte, einen Fisch ins Boot zu heben, aber es gelang mir nicht. Ich war wie gelähmt. Ob dies auf der Erregung oder auf anderer Ursache beruhte, kann ich nicht sagen.

Ich schätzte die Größe des UFOs etwa 9 m hoch und etwa 36 m lang (resp. Durchmesser?). Ich kann nicht mit Bestimmtheit sagen, ob das Objekt rund oder oval war, als es sich während der Beobachtungsdauer mir näherte. Die Unterseite war flach, oben hatte das Objekt eine Kuppel. Das Objekt stand genau über einem großen, im Jahre 1944 hier versunkenen deutschen Frachter, der eine Metall- und Quecksilber-Ladung hatte. Ich konnte etwas beobachten, weiß aber nicht, ob es aus dem Wasser gezogen oder in das Wasser hinabgeworfen wurde. Man konnte zwischen dem Objekt und der See nur ein paar kleine dunkle Dinge sehen. Mir schien mehr, daß etwas aus dem Wasser kam und durch die Unterseite des Objektes heraufgeholt wurde. Während dieser Zeit von etwa 10 Minuten stand das Objekt bewegungslos. Dann schwenkte das UFO ein wenig nach der einen Seite und begann zu beschleunigen. Plötzlich war die Geschwindigkeit stark erhöht und innerhalb einer Minute war es in nördlicher Richtung aus dem Sund von Kvenangen entschwunden.

Die Farbe des Objektes war metallisch oder silbergrau.

Die erste Skizze (Figur 1) zeigt das Objekt, wie ich es vor mir stehen sah. Durch das mit XX bezeichnete Fenster auf der linken Seite war der kleine Gegenstand in das Innere gezogen worden. Aus dem auf der rechten Seite befindlichen, mit X bezeichneten Fenster kam das grüne Licht.

Die zweite Skizze stellt das Objekt von unten in einem Winkel gesehen dar. Hier ist ein Detail zu sehen, das ich im Bericht nicht erwähnt habe: eine Reihe runder röhrenförmiger Öffnungen, die meiner Ansicht nach flexibel waren, denn ein Teil zeigte nach unten, andere in andere Richtungen. Ich kann diese nicht besser beschreiben, da ich sie nur wenige Sekunden erblickte.

UFO mystery solved!

They're leftover Nazis bent on establishing a bloody Fourth Reich

THE SOLUTION to the UFO mystery has been found at long last — the aliens are actually Nazis bent on establishing a bloody Fourth Reich!

And world governments have known about it all along, but they're scared to death, says a leading researcher.

Nazi Germany had built a small fleet of UFOs as early as 1940, according to Christof Friedrich, author of UFOs: Nazi Secret Weapon? (Samisdat, Toronto, Canada).

Friedrich claims that German UFO scientists escaped from their war-torn homeland as the Allied armies were closing in.

ANTARCTICA was the site of secret UFO bases con-

Writes Friedrich: "That some key scientists were obviously missing became clear, and though some plants and their installations were located, the staff with their machinery and prototypes had disappeared. Even the test pilots had vanished."

And Friedrich contends Hitler and his wife, Eva Braun, tricked the world into believing they committed suicide in a Berlin bunker during the last days of World War II.

Among the evidence Friedrich presents that Hitler is alive:

- The bodies of Hitler and Braun were never produced.
- The items introduced as evidence are only circumstantial — two of Hitler's hats, one pair of panties with the initials EB, and a few bones.
- The bloodstains found on the furniture in Hitler's quarters in the bunker were not of his blood type.
- The most important witnesses and the men closest to Hitler have never been found.
- There are too many reports and sightings, eyewitness reports, and even evidence that the suicide attempt was a brilliantly successful, carefully staged scenario.

The researcher says Hitler and Braun were flown world's first jets. The pair then boarded a submarine and were delivered to a secret base in South America.

Friedrich claims Hitler's U-boat convoy engaged in a fierce battle with the British Navy and the Germans destroyed a British blockade with secret high-tech weaponry.

Wrote Friedrich: "It would seem that the secret weapons, which Goebbels had spoken of in such glowing terms only a few days previous, were now put to use for the first time in an actual battle situation.

"The result was one sole survivor from a British destroyer and it was from this, the captain, that the words were uttered, 'May God help me, may I never again encounter such a force.' The report of the captain was carried in El Mercurio, a Santiago, Chile, newspaper."

HITLER TRICKED the world into believing he committed suicide.

Friedrich contends that Hitler's secret agents used

British pounds to finance the construction of secret military bases in South America and UFO bases in Antarctica.

"Hitler had planned far ahead and at long range," according to Friedrich. "Obviously guided by the possible occupation and subsequent loss of Germany itself, he had cast around for land still available for colonization and found that Antarctica was, at that time, the only continent still unclaimed."

Added Friedrich: "The secret Nazi expeditionary force was headed by Kapitan Ritscher and took place in 1937-38. The force landed in the area of Queen Maud Land and established bases there. Over 11,000 photographs were taken for mapping purposes."

Incredibly, the researcher says the US and Soviet governments have known about the secret Nazi UFO bases for more than 40 years, but have covered up the truth because they do not know how to deal with it.

Friedrich claims Nazi spacecraft could have become sophisticated thanks to extraterrestrials who befriended the Nazis while they were hiding in Antarctica.

Writes the researcher: "Did Hitler's scientists perform their miracle alone, unaided, or did flying saucer people, perhaps visitors from other galaxies give them a helping hand because they had mastered the new technology and consequently spoke the same or at least similar technological language?"

Friedrich believes Hitler's so-called "Last Battalion" will spring into action with a worldwide economic collapse. Then the saucer Nazis will invade strategic military areas and rule the world.

- It seems that the secret weapons that Goebbels mentioned in his propaganda speeches just a few days earlier were used here for the first time in combat.
- Friedrich claims that Hitler's agents were responsible for the establishment of secret military bases in South America and UFO Bases in Antarctica, used counterfeit US dollars and English pound notes.
- Hitler planned ahead with great foresight and, among other things, took possession of abandoned land in Antarctica. The German expedition took place in 1938/39 under Captain Ritscher. She landed in the area of Queen Maud Land, where she established bases.
- The American and Soviet governments have known about the secret German UFO bases for 40 years, but have concealed the facts.
- Friedrich believes Hitler's so-called 'Last Battalion' will spring into action in the event of a global economic collapse. Then the Nazis' flying saucers will take over strategically important areas and rule the world.

Wave of sightings sparks secret superpower treaty

U.S. and Russia vow to join forces against UFO onslaught

RECENT sighting of a gigantic starship prompted Ronald Reagan to sign an agreement with Kremlin kingpins.

SOVIET leader Mikhail Gorbachev vows to join forces with the U.S.A.

By MICKEY McGUIRE and VLADIMIR CHIENKO

In a superpower pact more secret than the A-bomb or the Normandy invasion, President Reagan and Soviet Premier Gorbachev have agreed to combine their military might — to defend planet Earth if it's attacked by space aliens!

The authenticity of the mutual defense alliance was confirmed in a highly classified Soviet military briefing paper leaked to a Western journalist by a top echelon official in the Kremlin.

The mutual defense agreement calls for both the U.S. and Russia to muster all of their nuclear missiles, supersonic jet aircraft, manned and unmanned spacecraft — including the Shuttle — in an all-out operation to repel alien invaders from our skies.

The astonishing pact was signed, sealed and delivered to Reagan and Gorbachev only three days after Alaskan radar trackers confirmed that an immense UFO was plotted as it hovered near a Japan Air Lines 747 jetliner last November. That UFO — described as "bigger than two aircraft carriers" — was just one of literally hundreds of UFO sightings that have been reported from every country since October 1986.

"We have strong reason to believe that there is a definite routine being carried out by what can only be spaceships from outer space," the briefing paper stated.

"There are also intelligence data from our field agents that indicate some of the alien craft have landed on Soviet territory.

"In light of these confirmed reports, the Soviet Union and the United States of America agreed to take prudent steps to insure a united capability to defend Earth in the event of an invasion by alien forces from other worlds."

The paper outlines the "mobilization" of conventional air, sea and ground forces and the immediate dispersal of Soviet and U.S. nuclear-armed submarines.

Of greater importance, however, will be the activation of strategic satellites already in Earth orbit which will fire their laser rays at attacking alien starships while they are still in deep space.

"Everyone has been terrified that President Reagan's so-called Star Wars Initiative posed a threat of world annihilation. But an invasion of Earth by space aliens would bring a global holocaust no one can even begin to imagine," a Pentagon official said. "I cannot help remembering something President Reagan said in 1980," the official continued. "He told the audience, 'We may be the generation that sees Armageddon.' But this pact with the Soviets could be the salvation of Earth."

Reagan sieht „Jüngstes Gericht"

Washington (ap) – Der amerikanische Präsident Ronald Reagan hält es für durchaus möglich, daß sich die Welt gemäß der Offenbarung Johannis dem Jüngsten Gericht und der Entscheidungsschlacht von Armaggedon zwischen Gut und Böse nähert. Thomas Dine, Geschäftsführer eines für gute Beziehungen zwischen den USA und Israel werbenden Komitees, sagte, Reagan habe ihn am 18. Oktober empfangen und ihm erzählt, daß er am Abend zuvor mit den Eltern eines in Beirut ums Leben gekommenen US-Marineinfanteristen gesprochen hat. Der Präsident habe das Gespräch mit den Worten fortgesetzt: „Wie Sie wissen, gehe ich immer wieder auf Euere alten Propheten im Alten Testament und auf die Anzeichen zurück, die Armaggedon ankündigen. Ich ertappe mich dabei, daß ich mich frage, ob wir die Generation sind, die erlebt, wie das auf uns zukommt. Ich weiß nicht, ob Sie in letzter Zeit eine dieser Prophezeiungen wahrgenommen haben. Aber glauben Sie mir, sie beschreiben ganz gewiß die Zeit, die wir jetzt erleben."

Last attempt by the occupiers?

Has the Allied alliance against Germany, which has existed for decades, now been expanded into an even closer military alliance in a secret pact? Will the USA and the USSR now cooperate closely on land, at sea and in the air against the German flying disc power?

German translation:

The USA and Russia vow to join forces against UFO attack

The last sighting of a gigantic spaceship caused Ronald Reagan to sign an agreement with the Kremlin rulers.

In a super-secret pact, more secret than the A-bomb or the Normandy invasion, President Ronald Reagan and Soviet leader Gorbachev have decided to combine their military forces to defend planet Earth against attack by enemy spaceships .

The credibility of the mutual defense alliance was confirmed by a high-quality short military paper that reached a Western journalist via a leak in the Kremlin.

The mutual defense alliance obliges both the United States and Soviet Russia to unite all of their nuclear missiles, spy planes, manned and unmanned spacecraft - including the shuttle - in a universal operation to repel enemy aggressors from space.

The astonishing pact was signed, sealed and delivered to Reagan and Gorbachev just three days after radar control centers in Alaska confirmed that a monstrous UFO was approaching a Japanese airliner, No. 747, last November. This UFO, larger than two aircraft carriers, was just one of hundreds of UFO sightings reported from that country since October 1986.
We firmly believe that a specific exercise is taking place here that will demonstrate what spaceships are capable of from space, the brief written statement states.
There are also certain reports from our secret agents that some of the enemy spacecraft landed on Soviet territory.

In view of these confirmed reports, the Soviet Union and the United States of America are obliged to take immediate steps to combine their military forces so that they can defend the Earth in the event of an attack by hostile forces from space.

The paper covers the mobilization of conventional air, sea and land forces and the immediate deployment of Russian and American nuclear submarines.
Of greater importance, however, is the availability of military satellites already in Earth orbit, which can direct their laser beams at attacking space ships while they are still in distant space.

Everyone was alarmed that President Reagan's Star Wars initiative was a threat to world peace.
But an attack on Earth by enemy spacecraft would trigger a global holocaust that no one could imagine, a Pentagon official said.
'I remember President Reagan saying in 1980,' the Pentagon spokesman mentions, 'that we were the generation that would see Armageddon.'
But this pact with the Soviets could mean saving the Earth. (HUGIN's note: A big mistake on the part of these 'gentlemen', because the impending 'end-time judgment' is - to use the words of the Bible - directed against these 'Satan powers' that dominate the world today).

German translation from:
'Weekly World News', USA - April 14, 1987 - Mickey McGuire and Vladimir Chienko.

This 'super secret pact' between the two great powers was preceded by the report in the American press, which we read here again from the Berlin 'taz' from February 17th. To quote 1987: 'At the meeting in Geneva, the President of the United States expressed the idea that if Earth were threatened by an alien invasion, the United States and the Soviet Union would unite to repel that invasion. '(See also the report in the 'New York Post', dated December 4th, 1985, reproduced in the HUGIN publication: 'Germany; Occupied why; Liberated whereby', p.70)

According to the 'Weekly World News', this secret pact was made shortly after the 'UFO' event over Alaska on November 17, 1986. The local press covered this remarkable event - a flying object twice as large as an aircraft carrier - only very miserably (see report in the 'Westdeutsche Allgemeine Ztg.', Essen, from January 2, 1987 on page 92). With the note 'Beaujolais on board', the previously described event becomes immediate ridiculed again! We now have 76 pages of photocopied material about this Alaska event from the American Federal Aviation Department (FAA), which is circulating in the USA on a gray market relating to this, and which was kindly sent to us by one of our readers - a German living in the USA was sent. While the FAA officials created pages of interrogation protocols about this one incident on November 17, 1986, the world public is still left in the dark about these sensational giant spaceships.

On January 2, 1987, in the presence of two other officials and a Japanese interpreter, FAA inspector Richard O. Gordon interrogated Japanese flight captain Kenju Terauchi of the 'Japan Air Line' (JAL). The interrogation protocol consists of 19 pages. Flight Officer Takanori Tamefuji was interrogated by FAA Inspector Peter E. Beckner on January 5, 1987; Protocol: 23 pages. On January 15, 1987, Beckner also interrogated the flight engineer Yoshio Tsukuba about the event, which was also reported by the Americans. Radar stations in Alaska were observed. The protocol consists of 5 pages. The protocols prepared each have the corresponding signatures such as 'Gordon', 'Beckner', even the interpreter Sayoko Mimoto signed.

The following would be of some interest: During the thirty-two minutes of accompaniment by the huge flying object, the Japanese heard some radio interference and some strange noises over the radio. FAA Inspector Gordon now asks Terauchi: 'Did you say these were similar to the German language?' What a question, considering that the 'UFOs', if anything, only have to come from space and should be manned by 'aliens'. Here Gordon asks about German-sounding noises; well?!

Let's go back to the super secret pact above. If this was concluded shortly after the Alaska incident, i.e. in November 1986, then with his statement at the beginning of December 1985, Reagan knew exactly what he was talking about, namely this pact that was certainly already in preparation.

So we see that the one and the other reports complement each other excellently. If we also take into account the most recent meeting between Reagan and Gorbachev in the White House in Washington at the beginning of December 1987, when the former offered the latter a first-name friendship with the words "Say Ron to me," then there can hardly be any doubt about the super secret pact that actually came about remain. It should now be clear to any attentive political observer that this meeting was not about medium-range missiles, as was officially announced, because they are not functional anyway. Rather, this first-name gesture could symbolize a secret but clear signal for this even closer collaboration.

In any case, Reagan's statement about joint action against the 'enemies from space', the 'super secret pact' and the close friendship in the White House show that the East-West antagonism that has been hyped up in propaganda for decades was a huge hoax that had been carried out for decades The armament of the East and the West can somehow be plausibly justified: the West out of fear of the Bolshevik East and the latter out of fear of the capitalist West. In truth, the two Siamese twins have armed themselves and equipped themselves so that they can be prepared against the German flying disc force in an emergency!!!

While in the 1970s and early 1980s the impending danger of a nuclear war, a total war of annihilation that was to be waged in Europe, if possible limited to Germany, was dramatically exaggerated, a new and changed situation has arisen in the last two years .

The cross-powers are increasingly talking about withdrawing their troops from Europe and Germany - and are already partly implementing this - as well as about nuclear and conventional disarmament.

One speaks of zero, zero/zero (i.e. latrine solution) and triple zero solution. Barracks are being evacuated in all occupied parts of Germany; the American headquarters was moved out of Germany to England years ago. The Soviets want to clear the Mediterranean with their warships and withdraw from Afghanistan. The Americans have to vacate Spain and thus give up their longest runway in Europe, in Torreon.

If it's not all a big bluff in order to strike at the last moment, then the previously unknown 'peaceful behavior' of the great powers is of a forced nature. The big brothers, who were once obsessed with the madness of nuclear mass destruction, have not invested billions in armaments in order to disarm nothing or nothing. They will be under pressure from ABOVE!

Could their new strategy look something like this: release Europe, withdraw to their own territories and from there joint defense with air, sea and land forces?

Let's continue to monitor developments.

As early as the 1960s, political experts had already come to the realization that UFOs are the revolution with the longest staying power!

Whatever detours or moves our occupiers try, there can be no doubt about one fact:

IN THE END THE REICH GERMAN FLYING DISC POWER WILL WIN!

SECRET WONDER WEAPONS

Flying saucers, UFOs, aliens, green men are neologisms and deliberate diversionary hoaxes by the Allied Powers and their media in East and West.

The fact is: flying discs, flying tops and fireballs were developed and built in super-secret German workshops before 1945. Proven by BRD press reports from 1950-1957 and Bundeswehr reference works and other sources.

These so-called miracle weapons did not fall into enemy hands, as was misleadingly claimed or assumed at the time.
During the last two years of the war, and partly earlier, people and material were transported, partly by the 'secret squadron KG 200', partly with giant cargo submarines and flying discs, to remote German restricted areas overseas that were no longer attackable thanks to super technology. promoted. Restricted areas of up to 26,000 square kilometers in size have become known. Germans of both sexes were brought along on organized escape, or rather deportation, routes well into the 1950s. The 'UFOs' that have been sighted again and again around the world are clearly and almost completely detectable, the result of these connections!
At a higher physical level, revolutionary propulsion and weapon technologies were developed.

These seemingly fantastic facts can be revealed today, even if the media - at least in the overall context - is still keeping it quiet!

PREFACE

Why would you even bother? History has no preface. It is just one lie built upon another, and one con built on another until no commoner can understand what is going on because no commoner really knows what happened before.

To understand history you have to understand corruption. Government corruption rules our lives and its history is one con built upon the next until it reaches the pinnacle of war – Government's ultimate con. Each time we are conned there is less and less for the common man.

In order to understand history, you have to understand the modus operandi of the con. Once you understand the con, you can remove its influence. This should be the duty of every citizen.

The first arm of war is the media. Without its lies, war could not be sold to us. Politicians lie. That's what they do. It's pretty much all they do. Rarely does a politician wreak any benefit for their country. Rather they do their utmost to serve anyone and anything except their country.

Most political figures are elevated because of some great shame and this is used to control them. The world is run on shame. When you break the code of shame in politics, you are more educated than the best academic and have more freedom than the worst hippy.

Royalty are controlled through shame, especially their illegitimacy. Royals can call armies into war. When you know which royals are illegitimate and who fathered them, you can counter their actions.

The choice is yours, but being a century or so late on the publishing, most of the major players are now dead.

How the French say, "such is life", and such is the power of shame. C'est la vie and speak up loudly, because no one in the NEW WORLD ORDER media wants to hear you.

England

Dear Your Majesty The Queen,

Not only are you related to Churchill, but you are also related to Hitler, Stalin and the Rothschilds.

Your grandfather's brother was Winston Churchill, making Churchill your great-uncle.

Churchill was first cousin with Adolf Hitler's father.

Stalin was second cousin with Adolf Hitler's father.

Churchill and Stalin were second cousins.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Hitler's great-grandfather was your great-great-grandfather.

Stalin's great-grandfather was your g-g-great-grandfather.

Churchill, Stalin, Hitler and yourself are all descended from Rothschilds, and all of you are illegitimate stock.

With these connections, your great-uncle Winston Churchill was a major instigator in police corruption, the attack on Pearl Harbor and gifting the United Nations to his second cousin Stalin.

Stalin was also second cousin with your grandfather King George V .

Within these pages lies the fourth volume of your family history.

Yours sincerely,

Greg Hallett

The British Police

Crime Creation and Paedophile Movement

1723–2007

Something must be said of Britain's police force. They started up in Saxon times and have a history of trial and error that supported crime for anyone who new how they operated. In this way, the police became an internal army for any corrupt elite – a gang of plodders. Occasionally they had sincere intentions, but these were dominated by failed results for the benefit of those who owned them.

The police can be analysed like any company that wants to grow, become a multinational and increase their market share. They took over crime in their immediate neighbourhood, but also did this on a larger scale. As a result, England's history is littered with 'convicted innocents' and 'free guilt'.

In broader social terms this is called 'black magic'. In real terms it is 'blue magic'. With the introduction of a corrupt police force, life became complicated in England and could only be understood when viewed through a silly mirror.

In the old Tudor system, prior to the introduction of London's Metropolitan Police in 1829, authorities had few resources to cope with crime, disorder or riot. Troops were used to keep order. Local militias were used for local problems and spies were used to track down those who were suspected of crime, which was then called 'disaffection', with the criminals called 'rascals'. Small market towns and country parishes had constables, the local watch and ward, the Night Watch, and the Peace Guild.[1]

From Saxon times, policing used 'Tithings'. These were a group of ten males over the age of 12 who would report on each other's crimes. This created gangs of ten covering for each other's crimes and is still the model for gangs at every level today.

Every inhabitant in the City of London was liable for a turn on the watch. Members on the 'Night Watch' were called the 'Peace Guild' and later the 'Frankpledge' because they were responsible for the damages to property on their watch for which no arrests were made. This led to a pattern of false arrests and 'verballing' – lying by the police. This 'proud' police history of fitting up innocents for crimes is still in practice to this day and covers 33–40% of those in prison, many convicted for crimes the police committed. Bad dentalwork has a lot to do with it.

[1] Principle sources for this chapter are the web: City of London Police, 150 years of Service 1839 to 1989; Metropolitan Police Service History Timeline; Marjie Bloy, PhD, The Metropolitan Police, The Victorian Web; Martin Short, A Firm in a Firm: Freemasonry and Police Corruption.

From Saxon times the rate of false arrest and conviction was much higher, around 90%, with people deported for stealing a loaf of bread or having bad dentalwork and giving lip to the Peace Guild, who would then steal-and-blame on their behalf. In this way the slums became the blaming grounds for others' crimes and a cycle of police mistrust was imbued from a very young age. By the age of 12 every male was in on it.

The Penal Code was so severe that almost two hundred offences were rewarded with the death penalty, while many lesser crimes resulted in deportation and the destruction of families. The cry of the hungry in search of food was, "I might as well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb". This provided an incentive for ruthless crimes and bigger crimes with more organised planning, hence organised crime.

These nightly false arrests led to natural resentment of the police and a refusal to assist them in any way. It served to alienate citizens from the law and to plot against the police. This created a plethora of false leads and evidential sabotage amongst citizens, the police, the elite, and the owners of the police. This meant that correct crime-solving was very limited and the Night Watch were more effectively a spy network for the City Corporation (the Mercers who owned the police), who would use the new information to their advantage the next morning, or soon thereafter.

Those convicted, apart from being hungry, giving lip and having bad dentalwork, tended to be those who didn't have associates who were credible witnesses, tended towards visual madness (tics and stinks), were immigrants living in immigrant slums, had poor English and didn't belong to any protective group or society like the Freemasons who controlled the police, or the Mercers who owned the police. They also didn't belong to any form of local and national government, the aristocracy, the monarchy; the purveyors, creators, participants, or heroes of war; or any of the elements in between.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -

In this way 'criminals' became a 'predetermined focus group' for those in authority, who farmed them in crime. As a result, the policing 'Night Watch' became bottom feeders with a vengeance. This has carried on through the proud tradition of the police who are bottom feeders to this day. As a result, pride-before-fall became the ongoing cycle of police history. The result was strikes and riots, mistrust and misdeeds, crime solved with the guilty elite let off scot-free . . . and innocent bystanders convicted.

The Mercers were fully funding the police prior to 1829 and up to 1919 through their Justices of the Peace (the Peace Guild) and their High Constables. The Justices of the Peace would pay the High Constables to police the streets. They soon got sick of the beat and paid their deputies bribes to do the work for them. These deputies became known as Petty Constables (PC) and 'Guinea-a-Day Men', as this 1861 report shows:

> "'Men, dwarfs in height, and old in years, of diverse bodily deformity, mentally weak, and with little or no character, had no hesitation to apply' to the Commissioner's renewed cry for more recruits in 1861. Applicants had to be under 40 years of age, 5' 7" [1.7 metres] without shoes, able to read and write and keep accounts, and to possess a decent suit of clothes and a hat. Poor wages and conditions meant an average length of service of four years and the continuing need for new recruits.
> "Three shillings a day was the wage for a top rate constable [£52 annually] but many existed on far lower sums down to as little as 12s 6d a week [£31 annually] for some probationers [apprentice Petty Constables]. Because of the Commissioner's insistence that policemen had to live in the [square mile of the] City itself this meant that not only was a large part of the wage spent on rent but that frequently the men were competing for and sharing slum accommodation with the very thieves that they were working against."[2]

[2] City of London Police, 150 years of Service 1839 to 1989.

In 1824 each police officer in the City of London Police (CoLP) had to live in the square mile[3] of the City of London and they had to have their name and title painted on their front door or surround, so that it was visible from the street. This made the distraction of the police as simple as preoccupying them with a chat, alerting them to a crime elsewhere, or inviting them for a 'drink and pudding'.

Constables on the beat were often old, crippled, ignorant, uncouth types, too disfigured to do the job and resorted to bribes and scandals to make ends meet. It was hard to distinguish them from the criminals, apart from the uniform. When these factors were added up the police became a natural focus of crime and resentment. As a result, the police have been repeatedly convicted of fraud, criminal complicity, planting evidence, mental illness, murder, alcoholism, substance abuse (meths), absenteeism, and later, drug dealing. They are yet to be charged for running international car theft rings and trafficking Afghan heroin within their country.

The Commissioner and both Assistant Commissioners were paid enough to keep silent on any measure. In 1857 the Commissioner was paid £1883 and the two Assistant Commissioners £800 each. The Commissioners' wage was 36 times a well-paid constable and 60 times a poorly paid one. The two Assistant Commissioners were paid 15 times a well-paid constable and 26 times a Guinea-a-Day constable.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

Apart from paying the High Constables, the Justices of the Peace also subcontracted out the administration of relief to someone who would feed, clothe and house the poor for a weekly rate from the parish. Between 1723 and 1750, 600 parish workhouses were established in England and Wales. This was a work-for-the-dole scheme with accommodation provided. By 1776 there were 2000 workhouses each with 20–50 inmates – 75,000 people who worked to stay alive in euphemistically named Poor Houses under Poor Tax. These were slave camps.

The New Poor Tax provided a place to stay for poor and displaced people at the beginning of the Industrial Revolution. In reality these were workhouses where people were forced to work several hours a day, seven days a week, just for terrible food and shared mass lodgings. This meant that a man with a wife and three children had to work six 12-hour days just to accommodate his family and feed them.

[3] "Square mile" refers to the Freemasons' control of the centre of London. It was the area under CoLP, hence? the C17th words 'culpable' and 'culprit' (CoLP-writ).

St Marylebone workhouse in 1886.

From 1782, parishes were allowed to form unions. From this union the parishes jointly built enormous houses for the 'relief of the sick, elderly and infirm' called the 'Big House'. These were the most destitute buildings with the able-bodied paupers not allowed in. When you got sick from work in the Poor House you were transferred to the Big House where you worked until you died. Relatives from the Poor House were not allowed to visit their sick relatives in the Big House.

The 'Overseers of the Poor' profited from this seven-day-a-week slavery and paid a special 'Parish Rate' to the Parishes who had built these work prisons. Part of the Parish Rate was then used to fund the police, who sent many of the criminals to the Poor Houses, which then increased the Parish Rate and the money the police got.

This 'slavery of the poor' was the initial method of crime control used by the police and it started to make deportation look handsome. Criminals started to target their crimes to the punishment they would get, giving further weight to the saying, "I might as well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb".

> The Poor House and the Big House made the police crime statistics look magnificent and took the weight off the Justice of the Peace and the Chief Constables who took their money and paid out fewer bribes to lazier and lazier Petty Constables, many of whom did not exist, but were merely names on paper whose wages were paid back to JPs and Chief Constables who then encouraged fewer and fewer police to be more and more demonstrable (violent and corrupt).
> The courts became a liar's court with a vengeance. Crime-solving has always had a rort aspect to it and this makes criminals of us all.

The Poor Tax was high-decibel social engineering across several fronts. At the beginning of the Industrial Revolution it made slaves of families, who correctly called these 'Prisons of the Poor'. Eventually they rioted, which resulted in more police controls. This has been a pattern of the police ever since. The police enforce conditions so bad, riots occur.

The police periodically fail at riot control and then demand more protective and lethal equipment. The socio-economic system that created the unrest is then changed while the police remain armed at the higher level. In this way, the police become heavily armed over an ever more peaceful society until the cycle is repeated again . . . hence London's history of rioting.

After the riots against the Poor House and the Big House the formula for 1984 was gradually developed. High society think tanks gave much weight to what to do with the leftover human population. War was a good way of killing them and when a war ran out of steam another was created elsewhere, or war-in-peacetime was practised at home.

The Wilkes riots of 1768 was an attempt by the police at anti-democracy. They tried to prevent common voters from electing their own MP. Nothing much changed and by 1818 a man was still given a vote for every £50 of land he owned, and another vote for every £25, to a maximum of six votes for land worth £175 or more. Unlanded gentry and women had no vote. The Poor Tax was introduced in 1834. This continued the 'No Poor Vote', placing the poor in prisons to work for food and lodging, for which the landed gentry voted.

The Poor Relief Act, introduced in 1598, was left in the hands of individual parishes who handled it very badly and people marked as poor were taken from their homes and placed in Poor Houses where they were worked as white slaves. In 1834 the Met Police began to very slowly spread through the boroughs of London. The Poor Law Amendment Act (1834) was introduced and populations were exaggerated and conditions deliberately made to look poor in order to become a recipient of Poor Tax, rather than a donor to it. This meant that as soon as the police came into the area and did an audit, they had already achieved miraculous results, with less population and improved conditions, thus proving their worth.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

The Act also allowed for Justices of the Peace (overseers of the Peace Guild) to appoint Chief Constables who would then pay smaller bribes to Petty Constables to carry out their work, ensuring that there was one police officer per 1000 people. This was hardy policing and more a mark of conformity to the expansionist goals of the Guild/Mercers/Livery Company/City Corporation and Freemasons.

The patrolling watchmen had to follow rules set up in The Complete Parish Officer (1729), with steps to improve these resulting in the Bow Street Runners (1742), who lit the lamps, called out the time, watched for fires, were bailiffs, traffic cops and patrolled the highways on horseback.

The Bow Street Police Station and Court with the prison van 'Black Maria' in the foreground. Below: Police Commissioner Colonel Young plodded in the middle of 1960s police dressed as the Bow Street Runners. Looks like Monty Python got it right.

Bow Street Runners.

From 1754 this was expanded by John Fielding into the earliest form of detective work. In 1763 the blind John Fielding introduced the Bow Street Horse Patrol to light the street lamps as a method of crime prevention and to maintain law and order on the highways. But funding only lasted 18 months.

The Horse Patrol was in the powerful position of despatching orders. In 1840 they came under criticism for their lack of circulation of the details of the wanted murderer Daniel Good. In 1910 the telegraph (Radio Telegraphy/ Marconi telegraph)was used for the first time to solve a crime. This resulted in the capture of Doctor Crippen for the murder of his wife. It wasn't until 1920 when the police started to experiment with radio communications that there was a lull in the selective sabotage of despatch orders. This has now been corrected and the sabotage of despatch orders is rife once again.

Doctor Crippen.

In 1796 the Marine Police started at Wapping and crime fell rapidly in that area, but moved to other areas, took on other forms and grew so rapidly that the names of towns changed (Wandsworth to Black Wandsworth). These areas weren't policed until their Guild membership came up to scratch and they'd paid their controversial Poor Tax.

The Police Marine Support Unit patrolled the Thames by rowing from 1796 to 1905.

Essentially Guilds are philanthropic Companies that began in medieval times as Guild fraternities to protect the interests and practitioners of particular trades. In 1878 a group of 16 Companies, together with the Corporation of the City of London, founded the City and Guilds of London Institute to promote and foster the teaching of technical trades.

Boy Scouts' Baden-Powell (22) was elected a member the following year in 1879 and was placed in the powerful position of Master of the Mercers' Company from 1913. Up to 1919 the Mercer's City Corporation funded the entire Police Force after which the government took over a third of the expenditure. This left the Mercers with two-thirds majority financial control over the London and Metropolitan Police Forces – hence no sodomy or murder charges against Baden-Powell.

Robert Peel became Home Secretary from 1822. On the back of the Poor House and the Big House he eventually managed to persuade the House of Commons to pass the Metropolitan Police Act (June 1829). The Met started three months later on 29 September 1829 and was based in Scotland Yard, a Freemasons' stronghold. Both the CoLP and the Met were controlled by the Home Secretary whose offices were also in Scotland Yard.

Robert Peel.

Home Secretary Robert Peel sought to combine the two forces but the City Corporation (the Mercers) strenuously resisted. The Chief Office of the Police was in Guildhall. The Mercers owned Guildhall, the Guilds, and financed two-thirds of the police. This was majority control and prevented any Guild hierachy from ever being charged and allowed them to commit crimes with impunity.

The Met had jurisdiction in the Metropolitan London area. This excluded the City of London and the provinces around London. The Met's jurisdiction was limited to the areas the Mercers' Guilds had socio-economic control over. The Met then followed the Mercers' Guilds into the provinces who set up Guild influence beforehand, thus ensuring the Guilded elite were never charged with crime.

Those who belonged to the Mercers' Guilds were promoted and those who did not were robbed, beaten and downgraded. In this way the Guilds financed the police and all those who came into power. This provided inroads to all local body politics and was the basis for judicial, police, economic, social and class control.

Sir Charles Rowan.

Richard Mayne.

Sir Charles Rowan and Richard Mayne were appointed the first Justices of the Peace in charge of the Metropolitan Police Force on 29 September 1829. Soon after, Sir Richard Mayne wrote: "The primary object of an efficient police is the prevention of crime . . . detection and punishment of offenders . . . The protection of life and property, the preservation of public tranquillity, and the absence of crime, will alone prove whether those efforts have been successful and whether the objects for which the police were appointed have been attained.

"In attaining these objects, much depends on the approval and co-operation of the public, and these have always been determined by the degree of esteem and respect in which the police are held. One of the key principles of modern policing in Britain is that the police seek to work with the community and as part of the community."[4]

> From 1829 the definition of 'Police' has been "the arrangements made in all civilised countries to ensure that the inhabitants keep the peace and obey the law. The word also denotes the force of peace officers employed for this purpose."[5]

The Metropolitan Police were licensed to control taxi cab drivers, messengers, shoe shiners, all pedlars and the supervision of common lodging houses. Virtually every working-class person had to prove to the police, and hence the Mercers, that they were of good character.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

The easiest way to do this was to join the Mercers' Guild that controlled their profession. In this way virtually every working Londoner paid a bribe to the Guilds, who then used this to fund the Justices of the Peace (JPs), who patronised the Chief Constables, who bribed the Petty Constables, who harassed those who hadn't paid the bribe.

Policeman beaten by the public. Such PR increased police rights.

The background of police violence and cover-ups from day one led to further mistrust by the public who thought that their social rights had been infringed. "'Bobbies' or 'Peelers' were not immediately popular. Most citizens viewed constables as an infringement on English social and political life, and people often jeered the police."[6]

The police have a funny way of dealing with PR and this has been embedded since their inception in 1829. "The Metropolitan Police were involved in crowd control from their earliest days. After an experiment with passive control, baton charges were used in 1830." Passive police control was given up within the first twelve months and levels of police violence have been continually tested ever since.

Cold Bath.

How much would the public allow before they rebelled? At what level of violence would the police distance themselves from their co-workers? It seemed that the public would tolerate a lot of violence before they rebelled, but there were no limits to police violence. Support of one's own was always acknowledged even if the police were killed using excessive violence.

In 1833 the Cold Bath Fields Riot went down at Grays Inn Road. The Metropolitan Police used excessive violence to disperse the crowd and in the process PC Robert Culley was killed. An inquest was held and in 1834 the jury returned a verdict of 'Justifiable Homicide'.

[6] Marjie Bloy, PhD, The Metropolitan Police, The Victorian Web.

PC Culley was found posthumously guilty of using excessive force. This indicates the level of violence the Met were using after just five years of street control. Regardless of the excessive police violence, the police were treated as heroes and PC Culley was acknowledged posthumously as a hero.

In order to quell public opinion on this, to cover up the police celebrating their right to be excessively violent, the police created the 'The Culley Cup'. This has been presented ever since 1834, although with great reservation, 'to those who justifiably return the verdict of guilty against police officers who use unnecessary force'.[7]

The police give out multiplicitous messages and each message is different. The dominant message they try to maintain is that the police are 'God's gift to the public and peace', that they never provoke violence, and will only use violence to maintain 'peace and order'.

However, the victims of police violence experience two very different messages, prior to police violence (active aggressive) and after police violence (passive apology). The police also send different messages to the police prior to a demonstration and after any riot control. The first is 'active aggressive' and the second is 'dismissive passive' or 'denial in practice'.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

The interesting spectacle of class-dominated London is that it has a history of rioting and this rioting has become more frequent the more the police are present. As a result, the police have became one of the major groups to riot against. They are viewed by the public, and not incorrectly, as covering for crime rather than solving it. As a result, the Police are considered the force behind all social engineering and a happier society would exist without them.

A year after The Culley Cup was created, The Municipal Corporations Act (the Mercers' City Corporation) of 1835 ordered all incorporated boroughs to set up police forces under the control of a watch committee.

This structure is basically carried on to this day. JPs still hold sway over constables and are the paedophile minders of their areas, reporting to the Governor-General in colonial countries who are still in charge of suppressing all information about paedophiles, paedophile enablers, paedophile minders, computer paedophiles, paedophile locations, the murders of paedophile victims and the crimes committed by the victims of paedophilia. The Governor-General is also always the head Boy Scout of their country, of which Baden-Powell was the world Chief Scout.

> Boy Scouts' creator Baron Lord Baden-Powell put this paedophile crime cover system in place and this is commonly referred to today as "The Police".
> The victims of paedophilia fill up the jails (and gangs) and make for over half of all inmates, thus employing the police.
> From Governor-General, to Justice of the Peace, to Chief Constable, to paedophiles, to paedophile victims, to jail – the ORDER OUT OF CHAOS scenario reigns supreme.

With a thousand new police (1829) on a weekly wage of 16 shillings costing £40,000 annually, the new recruits were carefully selected and trained from the sons of Freemasons and Mercers. The other recruits were substantially made up of alcoholics, no-shows, schizophrenics, planters of evidence, fraudsters, criminals, gang members, Russian Jews with anarchist connections, foreigners with revolutionary connections abroad, and pseudonyms for police constables who did not exist, but claimed a wage.

> On top of this, no bonus for solving a crime meant no incentive for solving crime. Since the Mercers and Freemasons were the only ones ever promoted within the police force (98% true until 1980, 95% true until 1995 and 90% true thereafter) there was little point in solving crimes, other than to save face when one fell in one's lap and couldn't be removed quick enough.
> The Freemasons and Mercers advanced within the police force against no competition, while providing plenty of fuel for the ORDER OUT OF CHAOS fire.

The Freemasons and Mercers appeared to be the good cops, and the criminals within the police force appeared to be the bad cops. This led to a plethora of high and low crimes within the police force, in the community, and abroad. It also led to misleads within the force, especially at the rank of Detective, Inspectors and Detective Inspectors, who proffered warnings to criminals as to when to do a job, when to leave and which officers were on their payroll, who would roll over and who could be shot.

[7] Perhaps I deserve The Culley Cup, or more aptly The Gulley Cup for being gullible enough to criticise 'the police actions, inactions, violence and sabotage for the purposes of creating war and war-in-peacetime' – from their own records no less.

In this way foreign anarchy was practised in London, especially the East End. Revolutions then happened abroad, with British street training, and no surprise, carried out British policy and British social experiments once they had succeeded.

> The British social experiment is most commonly known as Communism. Such was the case with Stalin in the Houndsditch robbery/murders and in the Sidney Street Siege.

The response to having police around was so poor in England that the Rural Constabulary Act had to be passed in 1839. This meant that every London borough had to reorganise their own police along the Mercers' Guild lines or pay the higher expense of being involved in the county forces. The county forces were ordered to be uncooperative so the borough forces could move in. This still took decades as many saw the police as a challenge to the liberties of England, and correctly so . . . ditto the world over to this day.

By 1841, 35% of the boroughs had no police force and those that were policed had a ratio of 1 police officer per 900 people – half the desired rate. The police were running at a profit.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

Crime was not the issue – chaos was.

Due to the expense and unpopularity of the police, by 1848, 22 of the 171 boroughs still had no police force. This was significant for foreigners committing crimes and training for revolutions in England. By 1853, only 22 of the 52 counties had police forces, with Yorkshire being the poorest served. It was not until 1856 that Parliament mandated that provinces establish police forces. Policing remained grossly inadequate until after 1856, by which time the police had been failing to solve crime and keep law and order for some three decades.

The early officers (1829) spent their time strolling in the best areas and avoiding locations where crime was most likely, even though they carried cutlasses (swords). For this they were paid 16 shillings a week or £40 annually.

> Britain has a history of strikes and riots against the police, strikes within the ranks, pronounced mental illness, drunkenness on duty, and absenteeism; and every two decades there was a clearing of corrupt cops, with larger clearings occurring every 100 years.

Throughout the history of the police, officers have been arriving to work in order to drink or sober up. In 1847, 238 police officers were dismissed, many were not turning up to duty and others were arriving drunk. The same year the police officer allocated Warrant No. 1 was dismissed for drunkenness after only four hours' duty. In 1863, 215 officers were dismissed for drunkenness, and in 1922, 80 police officers were convicted and dismissed for being drunk on methylated spirits no less. Discipline was a real problem in the Met Police Force and the problem has persisted.

Two years after the formation of the Met Police there were riots at the home of the Duke of Wellington (1831) and all of his windows were smashed. There were the Cold Bath Fields riots in 1833. In 1848 during the Chartists' Riots over 22,000 untrained and undisciplined people were sworn in under the 1831 Special Constables Act. They lacked training and leadership, and were prone to create and provoke the riots themselves. There was a riot in Hyde Park in 1866 and another in Trafalgar Square the same year.

Chartists' Riots in 1848.

On 13 November 1887 the second Trafalgar Square riot resulted in extraordinary violence against the police. The troops had to be called in, resulting in the first 'Bloody Sunday'. The Riot Act of 1715 was read – this draconian Act meant the death penalty for any rioter who did not disperse within the hour. As a result, one man died and 300 were injured.

In 1837 a Select Committee was appointed to look into the affairs of the police and they also proposed that CoLP and the Met be combined. Again, this did not happen.

Instead, the Bow Street Runners (est. 1742) and the Marine Police (est. 1796) were incorporated into the Met in 1838. The Bow Street Runners had carried pistols and these were removed when they joined the Met. The Marine Police continued to patrol the Thames in 14-foot rowboats that required two men to row and one to steer.

In 1840, in the Gould interrogation case, Police Sergeant Otway attempted to induce incrimination in the accused. This was "immediately discountenanced by the Courts" but became standard practice for the police ever since: "I put it to you that you are guilty of . . ."

By 1843 the Met began patrolling army arsenals (Woolwich), which made them incredibly easy to rob for any foreign terrorist capable of creating a distraction: "There is a damsel in distress over there. Could be your type."

By 1844 the police had rewards for stolen dogs; 540 dogs were stolen for reward each year and another 60 were used for dogfights and as food.

Scotland Yard's first 'Detective Force' was set up in 1842. It consisted of only two inspectors and six sergeants. By 1846 there were only two plain-clothed detectives per division in charge of crime-solving. In 1847, 50% of the people charged were dismissed by the courts and by 1856 there were only ten detectives in the whole Metropolitan Police.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Ten police were solving crimes while the rest were on the beat being seen to be solving crime. Even then, they weren't seen in some areas. The Met didn't start patrolling northeast London until 1865. The police tax, under the guise of the Guild levy, still hadn't come up to scratch in that area.

By 1869, 180 detectives were dealing with minor crime in outlying divisions, but serious investigations in London were left to only 27 officers out of 9000. By 1884 there was a new structure of 24 detectives at Scotland Yard and 254 in the divisions, all under the central command of a new Assistant Commissioner, who was always a Freemason. This was ORDER OUT OF CHAOS from the top and ensured that crimes were always solved selectively.

According to the 'Metropolitan Police Service History Timeline', in 1848, 150,000 police were sworn in on the day to control the Chartists' Demonstrations. More reliable historians like Marjie Bloy (PhD) cite in The Metropolitan Police, "over 22,000". This allows for misappropriated funds for the wages of 128,000 newly sworn police officers and amounts to a swindle of £100,000 per week. Such occurrences were regularly utilised by the top brass. As a result, rioting could turn a profit and was not beyond being encouraged. Most of the riots in the 1700s and 1800s were exacerbated by the police. The police, or those who controlled them, were using riots to turn a profit, and for leverage to purchase props like guns, and later helicopters.

The Chartists were in favour of universal suffrage for democracy still not available under monarchist/class-controlled England. They were described as "a knife and fork, a bread and cheese question".[8] Chartism was born of hunger, despair and desperation and their plight brought to light the class system in Great Britain. Workingmen saw it as a hope for prosperity, political rights and libertarian reforms. The sympathetic saw it as a cry of distress. The suspicious conservatives saw it as a disguise for pillage. The sophisticated conservatives saw it as a socialist restructuring of society, and old money classical conservatives saw it as an attack on property and civilised society.

As a result, Chartism had to be squashed in their best interests. Since the old money classical conservatives had control over the police through the Mercers and the Freemasons, the police blocked the bridges over the Thames. The Chartists were prevented from rallying on Kennington Common and thus from reaching Parliament. To get around this peacefully, the well-meaning, intelligent, underprivileged Chartists delivered the petition to Parliament by hailing a horse-drawn cab.

From day one the police have been involved in bluffing about their capability and lying about their efforts. The 1848 Chartist Demonstrations is a case in point. With 22,000 volunteers sworn in on the day, they drew wages for 150,000, a con of £17,000. By 1869 the Met said they had 5493 available officers when only 5288 were available for duty over the several shifts; 205 extra incomes amounted to £8,500 a year for whomever organised the racket.

[8] Joseph Rayner Stephens speaking at Kersal Moor, Manchester on 24 September 1838.

It was far worse in 1885 when the Met touted that they had 13,319 available for duty, but could only produce 1,383 for duty on any given day.[9] This 90% excess claim would explain the police as a very well-funded scam, either for individual gain or a larger scam higher up the ranks in which the Mercers were running the police at a profit from the one-third government funding. With a 10% force present, the Mercers were taking a profit of 23% of the police funding. The same year, there were explosions in the Tower of London and the Houses of Parliament. The 90% pseudo-police contributed to this.

There is another reason though. In boom times the police often turned to building and have a mate log on for them. In 1882, 8 miles of new streets and 4000 houses were built each year. At the same time, the Devonport Dockyard became busy with six major fires as developers cleared to build anew.

By 1854, from 5700 Met officers, 370 were Irish (6.5%) and 140 (2.5%) were Scottish. The British Commissioner Captain Hay (1852–55) did not trust anything that was not English and tried to remove the Irish and Scottish police officers from their racial areas. This is commonly known as 'divide and rule' and goes against the grain of 'peaceful understanding'. For his efforts, Commissioner Captain William Hay died the following year.

The Met and the CoLP were such a complete mess that in 1856 and 1863 there were protests to fuse the CoLP and Metropolitan Police Forces again. After this, Home Secretary Baron Sir George Grey (1799–1882) attempted a fusion by introducing a Bill to Parliament but it was protested by 3000 merchant bankers in Guildhall (Mercers) so that the Bill was withdrawn. These were a powerful group of lobbyists that essentially owned and funded the police. The current set-up provided an avenue of innocence for their crimes.

There had been many attempts to merge the two police forces but these were met with resistance from the highest levels and even protests from the business groups who profited from the crimes the CoLP and Met's inter-bungling made possible. This was played upon by their controllers, the Home Office, and all those assisting revolutions elsewhere – the Home Office were controlled by the Freemasons who took their orders from the British monarchy.

All the male heads of the British monarchy were Freemasons from King George I (1714) to King George VI (1952); 238 years of Freemasonry control over the Monarchy and the Guilds is a lot of power and was an all-encompassing infrastructure.

The formation of the British Police from 1829 to 1860 was well studied and became the model for the Mafia. 'Thieves Law' then became 'The Thieves of Law' and progressively gained a more respectable face. The Mafia influence then became the primary influence on politics worldwide . . . to this day . . . and beyond.

When everyone plays the game, it is added to the rules of the game. Many cons have now become common business practice. The sending of £20 bills every month to any and all companies has become common business practice and is standard amongst monopolies, which now sell them off as telephone, gas and electricity line charges.

The Mafia was a group of Spanish in Sicily, but shifted and reorganised with high finance and goals of world domination, with the first political/financial Mafia boss appointed in 1860 (Giuseppe Mazzini, 1805–72). Successive leaders of the Mafia then trained in London under police protection (Mazzini, 1840s, 1870) and took over Russia during the Bolshevik Revolution. They had a tendency to live in the slums on the Met/CoLP border. From here they were able to take over the world's social policy and re-infiltrate the British Police Force, with the Metropolitan Police Committee forming on 1 April 1995 – April Fools' no less.

In 1870 the standard height for Met Police officers was raised to 5ft 8ins, except for the short Thames Division which remained at 5ft 7ins. In 1872 the Met Police went on strike for the first time. This is partly due to the beat police carrying the load for the police who never turned up for work as they took advantage of the building boom. Various strikers were disciplined and dismissed, but then allowed back in the force to make up the numbers. Lucky for the police the boom meant crime was lower than in a bust.

> There are always long-term employees guiding shenanigans in the background of secret political societies, like the police force. These people have a tendency to stay out of the media spotlight but ensure ORDER OUT OF CHAOS is drawn out over every cigar, and crime-solving is derailed wherever and whenever it is politically correct to do so.

> The 52-year influence of Assistant Metropolitan Police Commissioner Sir James Olive (1873–1925) is a case in point. “In the 1870s most of this squad was itself a criminal conspiracy in which not only were the prime culprits Freemasons; Freemasonry was what brought them together.”[10] America had the same problem with the 33 degree Mason, J. Edgar Hoover (1924–72).

In 1877 the Metropolitan Police Force was exposed in the Turf Fraud Scandal for assisting and taking profits from a crime ring. There had been endemic corruption from the beginning, but it took 48 years to get around to laying the first serious charges.

In 1872 a confidence trickster named William Kurr was running a bogus betting operation. He realised the way to make real money was to cut detectives in on the profits early, rather than bribe his way out of arrest. The one safe place William Kurr could proposition policemen was at his Masonic lodge in Islington where he made friends with Inspector John Meikeljohn. In return for £100, nearly half his annual pay, Meikeljohn agreed to give Kurr advance warning of any police action.

At first Inspector John Meikeljohn kept the payoff to himself, but as the racket expanded, he involved three chief inspectors in the Detective Force whom he also knew to be brother Masons. Chief Inspector Nathaniel Druscovitch enquired into the scam and it was found he had £60 in gambling debts. Inspector Meikeljohn then suggested he go to Kurr for assistance. Kurr neutralised the debt and Druscovitch in one hit, at a cost of £60. Druscovitch’s boss, Senior Chief Inspector George Clarke, also agreed to lose the scent in return for a payoff, as did Chief Inspector William Palmer.

William Kurr expanded his operation with his new friend Harry Benson, a virtuoso con man. In 1872 Benson posed as a French Count and deluded the Lord Mayor of London of £1000 (for relief work in the wake of the Franco-Prussian War). He was soon discovered and sent to Newgate Prison where he tried incarceration incineration. He was released in 1873 a burnt and scared man. Kurr and Benson then planned new scams to separate suckers from their money.

With William Kurr’s contacts in the Met Police, Harry Benson was assured of total immunity and set up the newssheet Sport, which offered punters foolproof betting systems. In 1876, under the alias Hugh Montgomery, Benson seconded a £10,000 bet from the Comtesse de Goncourt of Paris. Several bets were placed on successful non-existent starters and the Comtesse was rewarded with full odds. She then invested a further £30,000 with a bookmaker of Benson’s choice (Benson).

When the French Comtesse became suspicious, she hired a London lawyer who reported William Kurr and Harry Benson to Scotland Yard. Superintendent Frederick Williamson then employed multi-lingual Chief Inspector Nathaniel Druscovitch to bring one of them back from Amsterdam where he had been arrested.

Chief Inspector Druscovich was ‘on the take’, ‘receiving the drop’, ‘taking backhanders’ and ‘on the square’. Being amenable to bribes, corruption and perjury, he arrived in Amsterdam but refused to return the fraudster. Three Met Sergeants were then sent to Amsterdam but Benson kept evading them at the last moment. Chief Inspector Druscovitch was tipping him off, just as he had done over the last three years, since 1873, for the princely sum of £60 (about four months’ wage).

During the trial at the Old Bailey in 1877 Kurr and Benson revealed the role of the bent Metropolitan cops, Inspector Meikeljohn, Chief Inspector Nathaniel Druscovitch, Senior Chief Inspector George Clarke and Chief Inspector William Palmer.

Williamson, discovered that a crime ring had been operating right under his nose and by the people he most trusted.

> He discovered that three of his four Chief Inspectors were ‘on the take’, ‘receiving the drop’, ‘taking backhanders’ and ‘on the square’, as was their ringleader Inspector John Meikeljohn, whom he had sent to Amsterdam to catch the fraudsters.

All four were tried at the Old Bailey. Senior Chief Inspector George Clarke was acquitted (they had no one to replace him), but Inspector John Meikeljohn, Chief Inspector Nathaniel Druscovitch and Chief Inspector William Palmer were convicted and sentenced to two years’ hard labour. They were all Freemasons.

> It was a bad day for the Metropolitan Police Force and the Freemasons, and brought into question the bending of their principles – ‘brotherly love, relief and truth’. It did, however, throw some light onto their real programme of chaos on society and chaos in positions of authority.
> Since the Metropolitan Police was founded there have been two complete reorganisations of its detective department. Both were provoked by massive corruption scandals that led to criminal trials in 1877 and 1977. In each scandal the Freemasons dominated in the organised corruption.

Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

As a result of the 1877 Turf Fraud Scandal, there was a Committee of Inquiry. Howard Vincent was put in charge of reorganising the Detective Branch into the Criminal Investigation Department. The C.I.D. (1878) was created on the back of high-ranking police taking bribes and tipping off criminals; 250 officers accepted the invitation to join the CID and 30 were based in Scotland Yard.

Crime-solving was then relegated to a newly created division and the job of the police largely became one of prevention – by being seen, hence the beat system (1829–1932). “PC William Hallett of Y Division (1879–1905) retired after 26 years as a mounted officer. In the course of his duty he rode 144,000 miles, equivalent to five times around the planet.”[11]

In 1957 the New Information Room opened at New Scotland Yard. In 1967 New Scotland Yard was moved again and more evidence, including that of Jack the Ripper, was lost. The Serious Crime Squad then became permanent in 1969 and ensured that Serious Crime became permanent. To this day, the CID carry out crime creation. The CID specialise in the introduction of drugs-which-induce-violence (heroin and meth) in order to elevate the levels of crime, further arm the police with weapons and give themselves dominance over citizen rights.

[11] Police Review, 1905. Those Halletts are in for the long haul.

In murder cases, taxis are now sent to the wrong address instead of police cars to the right address. The police have now been exposed as turning off their emergency reception, placing preference on writing traffic tickets and collecting money for the government-funded social services (fatherless children), instead of solving crimes as serious as murder. This is called ‘applied social breakdown’ and is a mark of the anti-patriotic movement and double-agent governments that now exist around the world (NWO).

NEW
YARD

Left: The red and white brick Victorian Gothic Scotland Yard (1890–1957) was specifically designed by the Freemason Norman Shaw as Police HQ but proved too cramped and hindered crime-solving. During construction a woman’s torso was found in the new vault on 3 October 1888. The police refused to make a connection between this “Whitehall Mystery” and Jack the Ripper … further indicating both were inside jobs. Right: New Scotland Yard (Met HQ) at 10 Broadway from 1967. In 2006 a locked room was discovered being used by high-ranking police officers for sadomasochistic group sex. Once again, Police bosses vowed to “get to the bottom of it” but forensics drew a blank after the room was cleaned and left sterile. The sign revolves 1400 times a day – an indication of Police creating 80% of all crime intergenerationally, recidivism, Police PR spin and Police Commissioners’ rapid revolutions whenever the public demand honesty. Who’s next?

In colonial New Zealand this has become so bad that court fines and traffic tickets now perfectly match the cost of fatherless families, with the rate of real crimes solved at an all-time low, such that the police move bodies again and again to ensure the other ‘investigating’ police do not find them.

In 1839 the first production camera weighed 55 kg (120 lbs) and by 1850 the photographer’s kit required a horse-drawn wagon. The first pocket camera was used in 1899. From 1862, copies of photographs of criminals taken by prison governors were sent to Scotland Yard and formed the ‘Rogues Gallery’. In the late 1870s, CoLP photography began and the criminal photographs were stored in the Old Jewery (an area of central London). There was no photographic studio and prisoners were taken to a professional photographer’s studio.

The first Met Police photographer was employed in 1901. CoLP employed their first official photographer, Arthur Cross, in July 1939. He was allowed 10 shillings a month for the use of a small plate camera and four hours to complete each photo before returning to normal duty. This meant he had to be selective about who he photographed, as did the police.

On 7 June 1879, the CID rules for murder cases were released: “The body must not be moved, nor anything about it or in the room or place interfered with . . .” This was, however, strictly not adhered to in the all-important Jack the Ripper murders (1888) nine years later. Only one of the bodies was photographed where it was found and much of the evidence went missing, initially, with Scotland Yard moving (1890), and with the frequent retirement of Police Commissioners.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

In 1886 Commissioner Sir Edmund Henderson resigned. In 1888 Commissioner Sir Charles Warren resigned. In 1890 Commissioner James Monro resigned. Frequent high-ranking resignations occur when evidence of police involvement in large-scale crime is being covered up. It takes two years to uncover what is going on, meddle with the appropriate evidence, promote and fire, steal the appropriate files, cover it up again, and develop a collusive reason to resign.

Each time this happens the retiring commissioner takes the important files with him, usually to his office at home. File theft by the retiring Commissioners of Police to cover up their complicity in crime and that of their secret society (Freemasons, Guild, Mercers, City Corporation, Golden Dawn coven) is standard practice. When they retire every two years, three in a row, the file theft is endemic. In this way, the Jack the Ripper murders and other failed case-solving (Whitehall Mystery) has become an ongoing national scandal for Britain. All of the above Commissioners were Freemasons.

A. Bertillon.

In 1879 the French Identification Bureau chief Alphonse Bertillon (1853–1914) invented a cumbersome system for identifying criminals. Humbly, he called it the Alphonse Bertillon System and rushed it to print in 1885. It was officially adopted by the police in America (1887), France (1888) and England (1894), although it had been in use in England long before it was officially adopted.

French criminologist Alphonse Bertillon attempted to classify criminals by measuring their skull shape and size, bones, describing the appearance and shape of the body, and describing peculiar marks from tattoos, diseased skin, to moles, warts and scars. He also used ear prints as identification although he did not have the equipment to cross-check.

He called this anthropometry (and later bertillonage in honour of himself) and it wasn’t too far from the falsification that anthropology specialises in. When anthropologists get tired in the heat and a skeleton is found, the body has to be old, otherwise the reward doesn't substantiate the effort. Funding of digs is also based on the premise that certain predicted things will be found and these have to be found in order to gain continued funding.

Similarly, the 'guilty' were sometimes 'found' when the police became tired of searching through the manual database of inked ear prints.

Alphonse Bertillon never dealt with the crime scene, photography or preservation of evidence. As such, he was a major distraction in crime-solving. But it was not to get any better for Alphonse Bertillon or his followers. Just as the British had accepted his method for identifying criminals he testified (having no qualifications) as a police handwriting expert. He erroneously attributed an incriminating document as being authored by French Army Captain Alfred Dreyfus (1859–1935) and his evidence convicted the Captain of high treason (1894). Dreyfus was not allowed to look at the evidence in order to question it. He was exiled for life on the penal colony Devil's Island, off the coast of South America.

This protected the guilty (Freemason) and brought about the required social engineering.

The French novelist Emile Zola then wrote an impassioned letter 'J'accuse!' (I accuse!), in which he charged the government witnesses with railroading an innocent man and deliberately framing him.

Captain Alfred Dreyfus was pardoned in 1899, exonerated in 1906 and awarded the Legion of Honour the same year.[12] Meanwhile the police were without a guilty person so they charged and convicted the writer of the letter, Emile Zola, with libel. The true culprit was eventually named as Major Walsin Esterhazy and found 'not guilty' to save face.

After two innocents had been found guilty and the guilty party had been found innocent, the public were too tired of the issue to protest. Exhausting the public is part of police desensitising the public to crimes the police either create or cover up. This is public programming and the overriding message from the police to the public is:

"Don't interfere with our ORDER THROUGH CHAOS."

This method is still a favourite of the police to this day.

Army Captain Dreyfus was the Jew in the Freemasons' sandwich. As a result, the Catholic Church was separated from the State in 1906.

This was Freemasons' goal all along. Freemasonry patterns of social engineering are well established, role-played and expertly executed within the army, police and courts. They continue to this day with the following notable patterns:

1. Police lie in court right up to the level of Bureau Chief.
2. Police pretend to be experts when they have no knowledge.
3. Police assume knowledge due to the position they are placed in or choose to place themselves in.
4. Some police are Walter Mitty type characters. They take on the speciality of whatever is required. We admire them for this when assisting victims, but in giving evidence it removes the truth from the courtroom and makes a 'Magic Roundabout' of justice.
5. Police charge and convict people who know more about a crime than they do. This prevents the authority of the police being challenged and any new evidence from coming forth.
6. Police assume guilt in whomever they charge and then try to substantiate this guilt by piling evidence around the accused.
7. The police regularly remove evidence that does not suit their case. Evidence is tailored to convict and tailored to read like a story.
8. Old files that resulted in convictions are reused with the names changed. Occasionally they remember to change the locations, but not always.
9. In the process (largely due to a lack of mental capacity), the police ignore all evidence contrary to their desired conviction, remove this from the file and do not present this in court. Thus the judge cannot decide what is evidence and what is not. The police decide it for him, making them 'judge and jury'. This creates a false trial and accounts for the majority of trials.
10. Police today are trained in 'verballing', which is the art of making 'flaky evidence' or 'no evidence' look authoritative enough to convict. In conjunction with omitted evidence this creates a 'Court of Injustice'.
11. The public's ill-founded assumption of police integrity in court is the cause of untold misery. Misery is what the police specialise in. It is their work and, in many cases, their life's work.
12. The police have dominant rights to remove jury members during the selection process while the defending lawyer has a limited capacity.

Police should be stripped bare before being allowed to give evidence. The first questions to ask are:

1. "Do you belong to a secret society, the Freemasons, the Mercers, the City Corporation, a Guild, or any occult organisation?"
2. "Are you bound to tell the truth in court?" Many police have 'leave' not to tell the truth in court and are promoted for telling lies.[13]
3. Lying in court is standard practice amongst the Freemasons, who swear on the Bible regardless. Freemasonry police have an agreement with Freemasonry judges and most cases operate on a pre-negotiated and pre-determined outcome – "Do you have an agreement with the judge?"
4. Lying in court also fits with the Catholics' Ascension Day and a similar Jewish day in which they dedicate the next 12 months to lying. This is why Catholics and Jews have been booted out of so many countries – for lying. The Catholics were even refused entry into New Zealand as it was forming: "Are you a Catholic or a Jew? Are you practising?"
5. Under questioning, many police officers have criminal records that should have prevented them from ever entering the force. Many police, stripped of uniform, would be considered unreliable witnesses and their evidence disregarded if their criminal and psychological histories were known – "Do you have a criminal record?"
6. "Do you have a history of mental illness?"

   After a failed assassination attempt on 23 August 2002, on my good self, 12 hours later Constable James Matawhinau Cassin assaulted me and charged me with dangerous driving, although I was just driving away from him, on his partner's agreement. In the Auckland District Court I asked Constable James Matawhinau Cassin if he had any convictions for assault and he admitted to two prior to joining the police. As a result, all the files, recordings and transcripts of the hearing went missing and I lost my licence, was charged the maximum fines ($2,000) and prevented from a High Court appeal for three months. The High Court overturned all decisions because the District Court and police could not produce any transcripts, recordings or evidence. Cassin's partner then left the Police Force and a Mr Cassin was found to be the Head of Detectives. Crimes are inbred within the Police Force.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

History though, has never challenged the authority of French Bureau Chief Quack Alphonse Bertillon (a Dr Morell type character). He assumed a role and then believed he was capable of fulfilling that role. He also believed he was the authority in whatever he was investigating.

The public need to realise that confidence and expertise are two different things, especially amongst the police. Verballing makes it so, as does the limited intelligence and experience of police officers, and the frequent collusion between the police and their consultants, who all too often offer mutual cover for each other. Fingerprints and DNA are cases in point.

The Police are constantly trying to fit crimes on their most hated subjects and those who know more than them. They refer to these people as "smart arses", saying, "We know you're guilty". They then rely on the judicial system to find that person guilty.

To achieve this, the Police pile evidence around the chosen accused and omit any evidence that questions their guilt or proves their innocence. Such evidence is often built up around "smart arses" for decades beforehand, and historical accusations are read out over Coms as convictions, followed up by "He's a real bad bastard".

Lawyers, police and judges swear to the Court, before their client accused. In this way, their allegiance is to the room and all its players, with the victim 'as witness to their own demise'. Most accused cannot believe it . . . how outrageous the Courts are. To take advantage of this, lesser charges are placed for guilty pleas and many change their plea to guilty when they recognise the problems they face attaining a fair hearing – ESL foreigners (English as Second Language) doubly so.[14]

[13] The affidavit of former Inspector Ross Meurant is a case in point. He lodged an affidavit in the High Court in February 2004 stating that his superior officers had asked him to lie in the decade-long trial of the famous Crew murders, 1970–80.

[14] Homosexual ESL foreigners rarely make it to Court, having the full PC advantage. In New Zealand they have heightened immigration status from the homosexual MP Chris Carter, who has had a long-term homosexual affair with the immigrant Paul Abdulatif, who was then given a job as a National Bank teller at the bottom of Queen Street, Auckland. Despite this, MP Chris Carter and his official partner Peter Kaiser became the role model for homosexual marriage, having cuckolded each other for 30 years. Homosexual marriage was granted under the lesbian PM Helen Clark. She is married to the homosexual child sex abuser Peter Davis and they cuckold each other as though there were no marriage. This is the problem with homosexual marriage. They can have a relationship in five minutes, from beginning to end. For Chris Carter it is gerbils . . . for Helen Clark it is fisting.

Judges who belong to the same secret society as the police are often held to 'convict and collect fines' for the Government because of the 'wood' on them. The 'wood' is most often sexual indiscretions and alcoholism and these have controlled the judiciary ever since the Magna Carta (1215) and the mini-camera (1899). King John was forced to sign the Magna Carta three times and was a prolific rooter with a plethora of unacknowledged illegitimate children.

In return for court fines collected today, the government funds its social policy (solo-mothers). This is heavily backed by Political Correctness which has found its way into the Police Force under such organisations as Metropolitan Police Committee (1 April 1995). It's a tragic cycle of effeminate backslapping and "we got 'em's" amongst the secret handshakes of paedophiles (who depend on fatherless children), crime creators (who depend on fatherless children), the Politically Correct (who depend on husbandless mothers and fatherless children), and the Freemasons, who control the Police Force and hence the methods of crime creation for the groups they serve . . . which is all of the above, including the paedophiles, who, historically, have the nasty habit of being promoted to the highest positions – especially in the Police, where they also have Freemasonry cover and backing.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

In the colonial countries, the scenario is still in full flight. New Zealand's Speaker of the House Jonathan Hunt is a case in point. As a known paedophile he was elevated with honours and then promoted to the highest position the country had to offer – High Commissioner to Britain (1 April 2005). The highest political position in New Zealand is occupied by a paedophile. The four next highest positions are occupied by paedophile minders.

Such are the knowledge and financial pathways of the erroneously named Police Force and Judiciary. As a result, PC also stands for Paedophile Country.

In the empirical world of the Victorians, what excited the imagination was often thought to be true, and the Alphonse Bertillon system was a cumbersome mixture of phrenology, superstition, prejudice and class distinction based on childhood diet. Administering it was only possible with cooperative suspects (innocents) and was not dissimilar to a four-hour doctor's exam prior to plastic surgery.

The police were a superstitious lot who settled the lines of class distinction. The Alphonse Bertillon system suited the police to a 'T' as it provided a scientific basis for their prejudice: "Look, 'ere's a scientific basis for our prejudice."

The nose, as it cannot be disguised, is extremely important in identification. The types above, taking them from the left, show a low, narrow nose, a hooked nose, a straight nose, a snub nore, and a high, wide nose.

From July 1901 the Fingerprint Bureau at New Scotland Yard was added as a supplementary measure to the Alphonse Bertillon system (1887–1901), which was soon phased out. The first conviction by fingerprint evidence was obtained in June 1902. There are no advertised convictions based on the Alphonse Bertillon system.

The Alphonse Bertillon system of anthropometric measurements was abandoned worldwide because it was an ineffective, cumbersome and superstitious system that failed to provide any reliable, unique, or singular measurements . . . and it took half a day to administer. The French Identification Bureau Chief Quack Alphonse Bertillon managed to sell a large amount of equipment and made suckers of the world's police departments, for which they are eternally ashamed . . . but they still protect the name of Alphonse Bertillon.

The Metropolitan Police History website refers to a page on the Alphonse Bertillon system but the entire page talks about fingerprinting. The Metropolitan Police are uniquely ashamed of their part in this history (1888/94–1901/02), but fingerprinting isn't that much better. It is 99% accurate at best and convicted innocents have only been accepted as such a century on.

DNA isn't that great either, with the data easily corrupted. DNA results are intermittently altered for Politically Correct purposes, and results announced in timeframes and locations where the tests were impossible to administer. The Husseins' 2003 DNA testing in a one-roomed tent, in just ten hours, is a case in point. DNA testing requires two separate isolated rooms, 48 hours and an isolated pre-tested identity-positive sample. Saddam Hussein received none of these, nor did his two sons.

With the advent of cameras filming virtually every public place, a database of the phrenology of ears is being built up for use as a method to identification. To date, they have established that in a sample of 10,000 ears, no two are the same. It's phrenology all over again, but without the superstition, class distinction and poor childhood diet. It's not a method of classifying criminals, but of identifying suspects, and in many cases, fingering Islamics for the crimes of presidents.

The problem with such digital databases is that they can be tampered with and this is very difficult to trace. Dissidents are easily framed and this makes for a more 'ordered' society. It also prevents the chaos of truth from reaching the light of day.

> Every day individual lives are still being sacrificed to the chaos of ORDER OUT OF CHAOS and all the chaos the police can muster. The world over, the police remain the strong arm of social engineering. Their role is misery. Their beneficial effect is limited to the strength of their character, which has revealed itself to be continually taking advantage of a misplaced trust from an all-too-gullible public.
> The police spend forever stealing files and interfering with history in order to cover their mistakes, crimes and blunders.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Under Political Correctness the Met changed their attitudes to the public and released a 'Statement of Common Purpose and Values' (1989). Called the Plus Programme, it was launched to improve their corporate image. This was, however, interfered with by the 1990 riot in Trafalgar Square.

In 1992 a 5-year corporate strategy was published – "This is what we want to accomplish". In 1994 the Government established key objectives for the Metropolitan Police Service for the first time. To take control of this, the Metropolitan Police Committee was established on 1 April 1995 (April Fools' and the MASTERS OF NOTHING).

Along with this group, Political Correctness was introduced into the police force and PC's key performance indicators were incorporated. These reduced crime by changing the questions on the police forms and giving criminals the upper hand. Assailants were treated as "victims of circumstance" and given "life counselling", while the victims of assault were charged by the police with the assault.

> This is anti-patriotic social engineering designed to fail a society and has the added benefit of recidivism, creating criminal informants, and the emigration of 'good people'. 'Good people' are recognised by double agent governments as unprofitable and are therefore unwanted and encouraged to emigrate.

The Metropolitan Police Committee (MPC) then launched the Crime Report Information System (CRIS). This had been in the pipeline for quite some time. It revolutionised the means of recording crime and became the vehicle for giving PC's MPC immediate kudos.

> CRIS, however, allowed for criminal records to be created and charges to be laid with digitised false evidence. It also allowed for those accused, tried and found innocent to have their records transferred to other departments, where they were phrased and read more or less as charges, with guilt assumed in the eyes of that department.

This has been prolific amongst social services (controlled by the Politically Correct), who will do anything to recreate the post-war fatherless family. PC's CRIS has been profound and prolific in interfering in civilian life, especially when fathers are trying to see their children. CRIS has assisted the paedophile movement enormously.

> Fatherless children are crime's principle seed and without them the police have a great deal of difficulty finding a 'crop' to justify their 'combine harvester'. The police needed enough crime to dominate the 'farm' to achieve their other goals. This is ORDER OUT OF CHAOS with the Freemasons in control of everything – the monarchy, government, law and order (crime), war, social services, traffic, the courts, the family structure, education, and the process of elevation into titles and positions of power and mutual cover. This has pretty much happened the world over.

Crime is farmed and those who work in the justice system are bottom feeders. The police and justice system simply refuse to believe that they have been taken over and are an occult organisation controlled by various secret societies with agendas totally different from those advertised during recruitment and training.

> The judiciary is a blue magic organisation. Black magic is straight-out occult. Blue magic is the public interface for black magic and requires close scrutiny of their secret societies and statistical outcomes to unmask their workings. This is the Con of the Judiciary.

Social services and the police work hand-in-hand, more or less when the big hand meets the little hand. Social services and the police are the country's principal paedophile enablers – hence the link again to Baden-Powell, the Boy Scouts, the Mercers and the police, with Baden-Powell virtually owning the police after his double-sodomy-murder.

Baden-Powell ran the companies that owned the police, got away with double murder, created the Boy Scouts, the nation's biggest non-religious paedophile movement, and owned all the professions through the Guilds. This stopped anyone speaking out.

The Metropolitan Police Service launched their website in 1996 and it is loaded with contradictory information (PR) that does not compare well with other historians (2005).

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

The National Automated Fingerprint Identification System (1997) was introduced 96 years after the Henry Fingerprint System was started. For good analysis, fingerprints still have to be done manually. It was another two years (1999) before the police started to acknowledge that fingerprinting isn't all it's cracked up to be. Many convicted on this evidence should be pardoned, some of them posthumously.

By 1998 it became evident that the police were still killing ethnics. In 2000 there was more Political Correctness and the 'Policing Pledge for Londoners' was issued: "We vow we will . . ." and reality was once again swept under the carpet as being contrary to their new vows and therefore too embarrassing to screen on TV.

This became pay TV in reverse, with the police paying television companies not to screen certain items. This worked for a while, but conscience slowly caught up with the media. The police then employed a PR department contracted to the news media for all items regarding the police. This soon turned into reality TV, with the police never shown in the wrong.

Political Correctness was now making a profit for others and there was more silence, this time from the Police PR department that interfaced between the media and the public. (Hate to have them on my jury.)

London's Metropolitan Police started by being owned by the Mercers and the Freemasons; 175 years later they were owned by the Freemasons and their creation, the Political Correct socialists (Metropolitan Police Committee).

Crime is still not on the top of the police agenda – police posturing is.

Crime is created for better police equipment and more police rights resulting in reduced civil rights. This is all in accordance with the Freemasonry motto "ORDER OUT OF CHAOS". The order is extreme and the chaos that was not organised, watched over, encouraged by the police, or created by social policy with the police as ambulance at the bottom of the cliff – was very small indeed – too rare to maintain the employment bulk they required and too small to maintain the social dominance they desired.

Through their applied ignorance, the City of London Police and the Metropolitan Police assisted in creating the Bolshevik Revolution with the training of Trotsky, Lenin and Stalin; and then Hitler, WWI and WWII – and of course the occult practices that started it all – the Jack the Ripper murders. But hindsight has 20/20 vision and the police only had half-a-crown for each day's work.

Spymaster: "The corporal in the Royal Green Jacket Regiment who saved Hitler's life at Cambrai ended up in the Liverpool police. He spent the first six months of the Blitz wandering around Liverpool saying, 'To think I could have stopped this', until Special Branch paid him a visit and told him to 'Shut the fuck up'."

In 1858 the Met got their first paddy wagon, a horse-drawn van nicknamed 'Black Maria'. From 1860, hand-drawn ambulances were used for injured, sick and drunk people, until 1928. The CoLP was trained in first aid from 1900, and in 1907 the first electric-powered ambulances arrived. Roadside phone booths were introduced as part of this. In 1915 the London Ambulance Service began as a response to the aerial bombing from the German Zeppelins (max. speed 60 mph). To aid the new Ambulance Service, the Met took 11,000 people to hospital that year (starting 31 May 1915), most on hand-drawn ambulances.

The Metropolitan Police set up the ‘Flying Squad’ for their first motor car, a 1927 Lea Francis, registration number A209. In Golden Dawn coven language this translates as ‘A MASTER OF NOTHING’. This registration plate is still in use today. If the police weren’t an occult organisation the number plate could have been A1. It is unlikely that the 1927 Lea Francis was accidentally the 209th car registered on British roads.

In 1930 the traffic police began with 324 constables. London erected the world’s first traffic light, a gas-powered light and arm-raising signal mechanism. It looked like a Grand Pooh-Bar in full regalia and was automated in 1932. In 1933 the Fordson van was introduced and in 1948 the British police started to drive Wolseleys.

In 1937 the ‘999’ emergency call system began and was absolutely thrashed two years later (1939–45), although by 2002 the police response rate was starting to dwindle. Rape victims have been told to walk down to the police station, and pre-murder victims in panic calls are responded to with taxis sent in the wrong direction, as a third of the police study the porn sent to their computers (to cover for Jonathan Hunt’s paedophilia). This was embedded with child and paedophile porn and was later found to be sent from a government department. Some say it was sent from Child Youth and Family Services, others say this cannot be confirmed.

Many thought the images came off Jonathan Hunt’s computer for the sole purpose of neutralising the Police from placing charges against US Customs-named government paedophiles, which included the Speaker of the House Jonathan Hunt ruling over the direction of New Zealand’s Parliament. Jonathan Hunt was then promoted to High Commissioner to Britain. Paedophiles are promoted for mutual cover.

Jonathan Hunt had mentored Chris Carter into the ways of homosexual paedophilia while being an MP, and Chris Carter even has a photo with Hunt that he proudly uses as a backdrop for television interviews. The Labour Government then paid for Hunt to attend Carter’s homosexual wedding on 10 February 2007.

Two Speakers of the House of Parliament have been homosexual – Sir Roy Jack and Jonathan Hunt. Jonathan Hunt, along with Sir Ron Brierly were both named on the September 2004 US Customs list of 75 practising New Zealand paedophiles. Brierly used to play mulligans (marked cards) at Victoria University in Wellington, where he took money off the naïve Blair Peach, who was training to be a Special Needs teacher. (Brierly’s mulligan partner was Bob Jones who hires dark-skinned children for sex overseas.)

Blair Peach was later killed by the Special Patrol Group of the Met Police while in custody in 1979. The Met officer was let off “scot-free” and then a Southall primary school was named after Blair Peach.

A week after the husband of the Prime Minister of New Zealand was arrested in San Francisco for propositioning what appeared to be an underaged boy on 7 June 2006, the High Commissioner to Britain Jonathan Hunt sent five large expense accounts to the New Zealand Government for payment approval by Helen Clark.

Each account was for homosexual activities with 11- and 12-year-old boys, all of Indian descent. Jonathan Hunt used to have shares in a cricket orphanage in Goa in India, as did Sir Ron Brierly.

Jonathan Hunt mentored Chris Carter, seen here as Minister of Conservation with gerbil replacement, a short-tailed bat. He seems genuinely excited.

Jonathan Hunt became the High Commissioner to Britain on the basis that he could bribe Helen Clark via his intimate knowledge of her husband's homosexuality and child sex abuse. Other countries, organisations and individuals can equally bribe her. This has made Helen Clark a political, sexual and intelligence slut. As such, she was being touted as the next Secretary-General of the United Nations, until my previous book came out (Hitler Was A British Agent, second edition, 1 Oct. 2006), and another candidate was selected on 8 October 2006.

The police in former colonial countries are still practising the Freemasonry code of conduct. Police are now swarming in their police cars at night (February 2005). They drive around swiftly, looking like they're busy, but avoid all emergency calls and any known criminal hideouts. They are merely burning up petrol and putting in miles for next year's claims (due at the end of March).

To further this, the police employ non-police officers to drive police cars to increase their apparent miles. These drivers have a tendency to have accidents and these accidents are then written off as "in the line of duty". Police are now employing non-police officers to drive their vehicles with their emergency radios turned off, while the officers sit at home with the wife and kids or hang out in sex clubs on Tuesday nights on Hobson Street in central Auckland. Monday night is for the judges.

Tim Barnett used to travel around Britain's schools with 'Gandalf the Pink' touting the homosexual lifestyle to schoolchildren. This most gleeful photo ever of Helen Clark shows her cutting the ribbon to the 2001 Hero Parade.

When these police are charged, they are put on leave with full pay and either continue the police tradition of building illegal structures, or deal in hard drugs on the lam (meth) while waiting out their rape charges (corner Ireland & Scotland Sts., Freemans Bay, Auckland, basement level).

Having substantially failed at solving crime or creating "peace and order", the traffic police began handing out tickets. This was the beginning of the police as a revenue-gathering exercise and meant that the Mercers could gradually withdraw their funding.

In 1960 the Stolen Motor Vehicle Squad was introduced, and by the 1980s police around the world had organised major international car-theft rings involving colonial royalty including Tungī, the recently deceased King of Tonga, GCMG, GCVO, KBE.[15]

"Queensland police in Australia would steal cars, especially police cars and then ship them to Tonga. Auckland police in New Zealand would do the same. The police from Australia and New Zealand stole their own cars and drove them onto ships bound for Tonga. The New Zealand police also gave conjugal visits to car thieves in jail, in exchange for the jailed thieves stealing cars and abandoning them near the docks, where they would be driven the short distance onto the transport ships.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org

"This was all done under cover of the Wharf Police, who were busy rooting boaties' moles, ship girls and hookers whenever the cars were being transported. During one nightshift, a police officer brought a ship girl into the Wharf Police tearoom when other police were having a cup of tea. He looked at her, commented that her face was ugly and asked her to turn around. She turned around and bent over the table. He took her from behind as the other Wharf Police drank their tea. Not all of them left.

"The Wharf Police were duped into complicity by the simple method of having ship girls lurk around whenever anything was going down. The same tactic was used at the other end. Prostitutes were found for all the police in Tonga when the cars were being transferred from ship to ship, Queensland-bound and Auckland-bound.

[15] Siaosi Tāufa'āhau Tupoulahi (4 July 1918–10 Sept. 2006), was King from 1965 to 2006 and known as Tungī. Due to the merging of three royal bloodlines his daughter Pilolevu is the highest-ranking person in Tonga ever. Regardless, she had to flee the tiny island nation after riots on 16 November 2006.

"This was all done before video surveillance. Australian and New Zealand cars would then pass through Tonga to be altered in chop shops. The serial numbers were changed and the holes in the roof were bogged up where the flashing light had been. The King of Tonga would then personally fly to New Zealand and Australia to collect his cut.

Tungī, King of Tonga.

"On one occasion, late one night in the 1980s, Tungī was collecting from a caravan in West Auckland. He knocked, announced who he was, and walked inside. The King of Tonga is a huge man who required two seats on a plane. The occupant wasn't small either but the caravan almost tipped over. He got his money as the suitcase slid to his feet."[16]

Esayo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

An officer in training: "Apart from the cars, all the contraband got smuggled off the wharf in ambulances. The king of the waterfront in Wellington was Charlie Howsman, aka 'Champagne Charlie'. Cameras, jewellery, anything like that, he got it for you. The ambulance chief Major Stanley would say to Charlie, 'We need more money' and Charlie would go down to the wharf and pass the hat around. They thought he was collecting for the Wellington Free Ambulance. He'd go to the Waterloo Hotel and say, 'Give us your fucking money or you'll never get anything off the wharf again'.

"The Greeks approached him one night wanting his avenues of importation. He stood them down so they poisoned him. He got tired one night (poison), went home and was found dead the next morning (mid-70s). The ambulance would take any contraband off the wharf. I went to sleep one night in the back of the ambulance only to be woken up with a side of mutton being hiffed on me."

[16] The Australian 'pursuit' cars came into New Zealand under the royalty ticket with no duty paid, selling for NZ$70,000 with a $5,500 commission . . . as purchased by an apprentice butcher in Mission Bay with $800 per week repayments. These are combined statements of a car salesman and a Wharf Policeman . . . No vengeance please. You're all old players now and some of you are very rich.

The police show the public that they will make good use of any investment – quickly. From 1886, horses were trained in crowd control and were put to the test in the Hyde Park riots the same year. On 10 April 1935 the Met Forensic Science Laboratory opened at the Police College in Hendon. In 1938 the CoLP Criminal Records Office started. This held a Crime Index with records going back only one year. In 1939 there were 59 IRA explosions. These were solved by the Forensic Laboratory and blamed on 55 IRA.

In 1980 the Metropolitan Air Support Unit got its own helicopter, a Bell 222. In 1981, the Brixton racial riots made for the largest civil disturbance this century. Black youths rioted against the police, with the report stating police should share the blame for the breakdown in communications. The helicopter was in full use. In 1983 there is a bomb attack on Harrods and the helicopter was once again in full use, with more now on order. There were more riots in Brixton in 1985, further substantiating the use of the new helicopters.

> The search for cause and effect within the police resulted in some strange goings-on. They were constantly on the lookout for causes, which would bring the desired effect. This involved equipment, social policy, changes to the law, and increased police rights over civil rights. The search for the cause and desired effect outlines all police history . . . once bribes have been taken into account.

Brixton racial riots in 1981.

In 1867 the Metropolitan Police were severely criticised after the long-serving Commissioner Richard Mayne ignored a warning about the Clerkenwell Bombing attributed to the Fenians (the forerunner to the IRA). Commissioner Mayne (1829–68) had been one of two JPs in charge of the Met from its inception in 1829 and offered his resignation. This was refused but he died the following year (1868).

Clerkenwell Bombing.

In search of arms, the police were not immune to killing their own if the correct response to self-sabotage was not forthcoming. Assassination attempts on their Commissioners were not always genuine, although refusal to act as though they were resulted in retirement or a quiet and timely 'natural' death.

In 1898 there were a series of assaults and PC Baldwin was murdered. This resulted in the first calls to arm the Met Police with revolvers, but this did not occur for another 13 years. In 1909 PC William Tyler and a 10-year-old boy were shot dead by anarchists. Two anarchists commandeered a tram and exchanged shots with the police. This became known as the Tottenham Outrage and was a precursor for things to come. The Houndsditch police murders occurred in December 1910 and were soon followed up by the Sidney Street Siege in January 1911. These were also carried out by failed Russian revolutionaries who were training on British soil for their next revolution in October 1917.

In 1912 there was an assassination attempt on Commissioner Sir Edward R. Henry, author of The Classification and Use of Fingerprints (1900). Commissioner Henry then called for legislation to restrict the trade of pistols (1913), essentially requesting that the public be disarmed.

In 1892, dismissals, rank and pay reductions were common. This reduced morale and took the focus off careful police work. In 1895, in order to "pull the wool" over younger unsuspecting constables, the maximum age to join the force was reduced from 40 to 27, with the minimum age at 21. The minium height requirement was lifted to 5' 9" (3" above average) and applicants had to be able to read well, write legibly, be generally intelligent and free from bodily complaint. They were rejected for flat feet, stiff joints, narrow chests and facial deformities.

As a result, experienced police were being replaced with younger police at a lower wage who needed to be trained into a new detection system – the Alphonse Bertillon system of 1894 – in a new location, a New Scotland Yard from 1890, and coping with crime within the Police Force.

With the new age gap and many younger cops, the police were found to be stealing off each other, removing the identity from stolen goods, and lying to their superior officers. Crime amongst the police got so serious that in 1893 PC George Cooke was convicted and hanged for murder.

All through this time the police-issue boots were loathed. They had the effect of withdrawing attention from the environment and focusing it on sore feet encumbered by clumsy running. This made for slow, dim-witted police officers exhausted by their own uniforms. It helped to reduce the apprehended/convicted ratio and served to elevate the rate of nearby apprehended innocents. This further elevated public distrust and the 'public poor' viewed themselves as too easily accused to give assistance.

Only the Freemasons' Commissioner Sir Edward Bradford believed the police-issue boots were suitable and his belief served crime well. By 1899, in a population of 7 million, some 16,000 police had 32,000 aching feet. The police had another agenda altogether and ORDER OUT OF CHAOS was on the breakfast menu every day.

Commissioner Sir Edward Bradford's harsh discipline, insensitive handling of the men, and police-issue boots resulted in a disproportionately high rate of suicide amongst the police. In 1903 the hugely unpopular Commissioner Sir Edward Bradford retired. The police took off their boots and the focus moved off feet and returned to crime.

> In 1906 the Met Police were still working 13 days a fortnight with only 10 days' annual leave. This ensured that only the unintelligent joined, that the intelligent stayed away in droves, that crime was rarely solved, and there were plenty of police to be seen . . . seen but to little effect.

All officers who protected King Edward VII in his 1902 coronation were offered a medal, extra pay and extra leave. As a result, 512 retired officers rushed back to work for the offer and all got medals. The monarchy virtually buys sycophancy with metal and silk and names attached to a royal list.

In 1910, CoLP had 1181 men, with an additional 150 in Private Service who represented the best. From 1912, for the purposes of WWI, a third of the police volunteered for the war and the CoLP were reduced from six divisions to four. The police required the First Police Reserve (police pensioners), a Second Police Reserve (of untrained undisciplined civilian volunteers) and a Special Constabulary. First Police Reserve (retired cops) became the permanent police. The Second Police Reserve of 2000 ultimately became the Reserve and guarded searchlights, bridges and power stations, with 300 turning up after every air raid. They became a permanent organisation in 1912, two years before the outbreak of WWI. The Special Constabulary was used when there was a crime to be solved.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

In 1914, WWI broke out and the ten-day annual leave was suspended; 24,000 Special Constables were sworn in and by the end of the year there were 31,000 untrained Special Constables roaming the streets of Metropolitan London.

In November 1916 the Commissioner Sir Edward Henry threatened any police who joined a union would be dismissed. By 1917, 2300 members of the Metropolitan Police were serving in the armed services. On 30 August 1918, Britain's entire police force went on strike for better pay, conditions and union recognition . . . and Commissioner Henry resigned.

In 1919 the police pay was standardised when the British Government agreed to pay 33% of the police expenditure, but this still left the combined Mercers, Livery Company and City Corporation in control. It also meant the Guilds would never be charged for any crimes and gave them right of refusal to allow any dissenter a professional living.

This was a form of belated feudalism dating back to 1394 and gave the Mercers TOTAL SOCIAL CONTROL. The Mercers were hidden in a fabric of companies that controlled society and they were beyond contention. Their record of charity helped this. Currently there are 24,000 Liverymen in London operating 102 Livery Companies and donating over £38 million annually.

Women constables were accepted into the police for the first time in 1919 and began patrolling the streets in post-war peacetime. They specialised in assisting prostitutes, but by 1926 even they were needed for breeding, and repopulation reduced them to twenty.

Women Police Volunteer Service in 1914.

In 1922 Commissioner Brigadier-General Sir William Horwood admitted that many of the men taken into the force after the failed 1919 strike, and those from the armed forces, had neglected their beats and were prone to drunkenness with methylated spirits, resulting in 80 convictions that year. There was an attempt to assassinate Commissioner Horwood in 1926 and he retired two years later (1928).

The right to drink in the Police Force has been vehemently protected to this day.

In 1928 the first police box was installed. These were fully installed by 1937 and still in use in the mid-1960s. These were large blue kiosks with a telephone and a light on top. This would flash (rather than ring) when the Petty Constable's superior wanted to speak with them. They were a major influence on the hit time-travel series Dr Who, and along with Noddy, captured the conformity, rigidity and supercilious nature of British culture. These comical foibles helped in naming the police 'wooden tops'.

Culture let off steam with such serious puppet shows as The Magic Roundabout. With such strange surroundings taken in all seriousness, and with allegiance to the bisexual near-retarded King (1936–52) and the new Queen (1952–) the culture was rife for drugs. These exploded on the scene in the 1960s, creating a plethora of crime that could only be planned from an outside source with internal complicity.

Out of this strange predilection of conformity, monarchy, anti-crime solving and social engineering, came the biggest social engineers of all – drugs, social welfare, Political Correctness and the focused removal of fathers out of families, thus repeating the family structure that war and post-war had created.

Noddy and Big-Ears.

The Magic Roundabout.

By 1943, looting after air raids was endemic, peaking in 1944. It was survival of the fed, and all things could be traded. In 1947 the Met Police were short 4730 men and crime was at an all-time high. In 1954 the Met were still short 4000 men. Police were in short supply as all the men over 5' 7" were busy breeding and raising families, hence the short supply of breeding women in the Met as well. In 1951, 16–18-year-olds were trained as police cadets. As a result, crime escalated from 126,000 indictable offences in 1948 to 250,000 in 1964.

Freemason Detective Sergeant Harry Challenor was a West End Central officer who worked very closely with his Freemason CID colleagues. During his service he framed 26 young men, planting knives, hatchets, iron bars and explosive detonators on his innocent victims. In 1963 he framed a cluster of young men demonstrating against a visit from Queen Frederika of Greece. The accused were all cleared and Challenor was put on trial with three of his Freemason colleagues for "conspiring to pervert the course of justice".

The officers were all convicted and jailed for three years, but Challenor was detained in a mental hospital instead. During his service, none of his colleagues noted his lunacy but his excessive violence was noted. Other police held down his victims while he beat them with unimpeded brutality. In the 1960s, policemen exploited the Craft (Brotherhood of Freemasons) with excessive violence and were rewarded for the misery they imposed on others.[17]

Scottish Constable: "In the 1960s these old bastards turned up at Southampton claiming to be deserters from WWI. The trouble was they were. We tried to keep it a secret but the authorities found out. So we had to take them to France and Belgium, and give them a Cook's tour of where they'd been. We tried to get them to identify those who had hidden them while they deserted.

"They said 'No, I don't recognise anyone who helped me desert. They were all young with dark hair and everybody here is as old as I am.' After that we had to let them go. The Queen pardoned one of them because he had rejoined some colonial army at the beginning of WWII. There was no stopping them. They were as funny as a fight."

The police attempted to reduce crime by showing crime on TV and then sensationalising the effort they put into crime-solving with such programmes as Z Cars (Czars, SARS and 'stars upon thars'), Softly Softly and The Professionals, which was more about MI-5. Some of their stories were written by ex-MI-5 and were very close to actual scenarios.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

A common theme for The Professionals involved a foreign revolutionary leader, looking like a cross between Stalin, Hitler and Saddam Hussein, complete with dark moustache, arriving in London. He would be saved from attempts on his life by exiled refugees from his homeland. Bodie and Doyle would then go to great lengths to rescue the leader from his outraged fellow countrymen, save his mistress and son and swish them back to MI-6 at Heathrow Airport for their return home. Such was life in the great metropolis of London.

The Professionals.

> Social engineering was rife and its style was the sign of the times. The police were exacerbating crime by planting evidence and employing paranoid schizophrenics during the time fatherless WWII orphans were coming of age and non-integrating races were immigrating.
> It really was a shameful decade for the police, but no different from any other decade.

Commissioner John Waldron (1968–72) ousted 16 corrupt officers per year and in his final annual report (1971) he stated: "With deep and lasting traditions the Metropolitan Police is an impressive institution by every standard and in any company in the world."

He was replaced the following year by Commissioner Robert Mark (1972–77) who set up the A10 Squad and worked to restore the integrity of the Metropolitan Police. Within five years, 500 officers were dismissed as a result of 'restoring integrity'. Many of the dismissed officers were non-uniformed Freemasons (detectives, inspectors and above).

The problem of Freemasons forming a 'firm within a firm' was so bad that uniformed and non-uniformed officers had to be interchanged and officers were shuffled from area to area to stop them becoming intimate with the criminals and extorting them.

The criminals retaliated by stating that they were unavailable for interrogation as it was their Masonic Lodge night. The police were so dominated by Freemasons that the criminals bribed the police, joined their Masonic Lodges and then claimed brotherhood for cover. They were 'taught to be cautious', 'regular attenders', 'on the level', 'on the square' and 'part of the Craft'.

> This worked extremely well for the criminals for a century or more as the Masonic police used the same Craft phrases to talk to each other. The police and the criminals had formed a brotherhood based around Freemasonry.

Whenever Anglicans and Freemasons, or Catholics and Freemasons get together, they form an occult organisation. The Police Force is one of their best and most public examples, operating under a brotherhood of 'Blue Magic'.

Former Detective in Scotland Yard: "Freemasonry was the security blanket, the ultimate in comforters, for a network of crooked cops throughout the metropolis. Their fraternal bonds reassured them that they could rely on each other's absolute discretion. On that basis the 'firm in a firm' [Freemasons within the Police Force] provided whatever service was required. It could get criminal charges dropped against the guilty or ensure their acquittal. It could secure the conviction of men who did not pay bribes, or who got in the way of bigger fish who were paying. It could protect bribe-paying gangs by preventing their detection. It could even supply the direct participation of some policemen in serious crimes such as robbery. This standing conspiracy had several protective layers or shells.

1. Everyone in it was a policeman.
2. They were all detectives.
3. They were all corrupt.
4. Most were Freemasons."[18]

Metropolitan Chief Inspector Reginald Morrish (1911–37) worked in the CID for 16 years, winning 44 commendations and 18 awards. He also served in Scotland Yard's fraud and homicide squads, was a senior instructor at Hendon Police College (1943–70) and wrote several textbooks.

In 1933/34, as Detective Inspector, Reginald Morrish was the temp running the Croydon Division while the divisional inspector was off sick. "Looking through various registers and record books he became very suspicious of the way crimes were being recorded, so he carried out his own investigation. He concluded that the division's relatively high success rate for crime clearance was thoroughly bogus, because many crimes were being entered up as something else. A woman would have her handbag snatched, but this would be entered in the register as a case of 'Lost Property'. Many other entries were far more ingenious."[19]

This resembles the experience of Detective Constable Ron Walker of the Kent Constabulary who alleged that some colleagues had been rigging the force's crime 'clear-up' rate by persuading convicted prisoners to confess to crimes which they had not committed (1986).

Many police never solved a crime in their entire careers and one has to ask what many of them were doing. Certainly some were just walking the beat taking bribes, as in the case of Scotland Yard's Detective Inspector Leslie Alton (Freemason) who would walk into bookshops that sold porn and in a big voice say, "How much have you taken today?"

He'd then open the cash register, check the proceeds and take a percentage. When he came out, he said to his junior officer, "Discipline. That's what these people need, discipline."[20]

The police developed sayings like "A good rort is hard to beat . . . Nothing succeeds like an old rort replayed . . . A good rort is a thing of beauty". From their takings, the police would share the 'pinch' or the 'shout'. The 'pinch' was the goods and money found on a person and the 'shout' was goods and money from a search.

> The police were a rort on society and developed crime rather than solved it. The police were corrupt then and maintained their environments as revolutionary training grounds. Little has changed since 1900 and without their influence, crime would drop by 80%.

Spymaster: "A New Zealander that went to London to serve in their police used to return every year to take his annual leave. It amused me that on every return he was more seriously depressed, until finally he returned having been bitten by a police dog. He was depressed, almost to the point of being suicidal.

"I expressed concern about his mental state and he replied, 'It doesn't matter. I'm going into the anti-terrorism squad where I'll be rested'.

"He returned to London at the height of the terrrorist bombing [London Tube Bombings 07.07.2005] and I haven't seen him since. The notion of resting unsuitable or stressed police in anti-terrorism classifications is not new, but it comes with a huge risk.

"Soon after the bombing the Commissioner of the London Police was severely criticised by the Police Union for being so out of touch with his own uniformed squads. In the wake of the London Tube Bombings the Commissisoner made several grievous mistakes. Nearly all of these were made on the basis of believing the filed paperwork of his own anti-terrrorist squads.

"The only casualty by police was the shooting of the Brazilian electrician, Jean Charles de Menezes, who was shot seven times in the head at point-blank range on 22 July 2005."

In Golden Dawn coven language, the language that uses dates and numbers to give insight into history, 'point blank' equals "zero". De Menezes was shot 7 times at point-blank range until dead (007).

He was also shot on the ‘22nd’, meaning master, and he was Brazilian, meaning “the British remain the intelligence masters of Brazil”.

Spymaster: “I predicted the family would be readily paid off and they were.

“A Brazilian was chosen because England has a large version of Salon Kitty on the outskirts of São Paulo, Brazil, and another in Portugal. Both governments are very cooperative with Britain and have been for about 700 years. Brazil was freed from the Portuguese in 1822 by friendly British naval officers and Britain refers to these governments as ‘our oldest and dearest allies’, routinely murdering their citizens at the drop of a hat.

“The Police Commissioner began things badly by claiming that it was ‘a justifiable shooting’. A few short weeks later, he changed his tune to ‘it was an unjustified shooting’ and all police involved began blaming other police engaged in the operation.

“The Home Office hinted darkly that multiple charges of murder and conspiracy-murder could follow. In other words, nothing happened and nothing has changed.

“The London police are still the same disorganised rabble they’ve always been. The only difference is the lengths to which perjury is now provable, but this is NAP (not a problem) for the ghouls of MI-5, who are well capable of fitting up a patron saint on Easter Sunday.

“It’s intriguing that the blame game is still being played so amateurishly after centuries of its inception. Unfortunately there is no modern version of the Luftwaffe to springclean clues and incinerate evidence, so diversionary tactics are used. This may involve a resurgence of the IRA, complete with its bomb-making prowess, courtesy of the RAF Engineering and Ordnance branch.”

Few others do.

Pearl Harbor

Gifting America to Churchill for WWII

1921–7 December 1941

Pearl Harbor took 16 years to plan and it was either a masterstroke or a complete cock-up. Either way, all sides knew about it at the time. One method of drawing an ally into war is to give the mutual enemy (Japan) enough information to attack the ally (America) without retribution, thus giving the country attacked (America) a clear mandate to join the war. Pearl Harbor was just such a mission and it occurred with full British and American Chief of Staff knowledge.[1]

Britain started planning its next war in 1919 in order to utilise its existing military and to prevent them from getting restless and turning in on themselves and the nation. Britain planned a war with America and it was due to start in 1927. The conflict was based around 'naval tonnage', but was eventually settled with diplomacy and the Washington Treaty.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

However, a plan to attack Pearl Harbor was commissioned by the British Admiralty and awarded to the consultant Hector C. Bywater, who came up with the Bywater Plan which involved dropping torpedoes from planes into Pearl Harbor. It was believed at the time that the harbour was too shallow at 12 metres, but Bywater correctly forecast that adapted torpedoes could be dropped safely and efficiently into the shallow harbour.

Hector C. Bywater (21 October 1884–17 August 1940) was an English and American journalist, author, and spy who could hold a packed pub-room in rapt attention when he told anecdotes. He wrote Sea Power in the Pacific and The Great Pacific War and knew more about the navies of the world than a roomful of admirals. He published numerous articles on Pacific strategy as the European naval correspondent for the New York Herald, the Baltimore Sun and The New York Times.

William H. Honan: "In 1925, sixteen years before Japanese forces struck at Pearl Harbor, he published the plan for the attack on Pearl Harbor – The Great Pacific War . . . What Bywater wrote powerfully influenced Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto, the architect of the Pearl Harbor attack . . . who served as a naval attaché in Washington in the late 1920s. At least once Bywater and Yamamoto met face to face and whiled away an evening discussing the prospects for peace and war over a bottle of Scotch.”[2]

Yamamoto adapted the Bywater Plan, increased the attack on the Philippines and British possessions and grafted them onto the original attack plan against Hawaii. The adapted British Bywater Plan became the plan for Japan’s December 1941 attack on Pearl Harbor that brought America into the war.

Japan had problems with the date line and attacked the British in Malaya a day earlier than planned. They were firing guns and dropping bombs, yet the British kept it hush-hush. The British did not warn America that they, the British, were under attack. But even this was no surprise.

On 27 March 1941, the Japanese spy Takeo Yoshikawa arrived in Honolulu and began studying the American fleet at Pearl Harbor.

From 22 April 1941, “Six US Navy monitor stations from Dutch Harbor, Alaska, Samoa, Hawaii, Corregidor [deep underground Army/Navy base west of Manila] and two from San Francisco followed every move of [Vice-Admiral] Nagumo and the Akagi.”[3]

In Corregidor, 63 operators worked around the clock in 8-hour shifts to intercept, decode and translate the Japanese kata kana coded messages. They had the Purple machine for decoding and were close to Japan and its naval operations areas, so their radio signals were excellent.[4]

The translated Japanese messages were not sent to Pearl Harbor because that was not the name of the game. Lt.Cdr. Joseph Rochefort: “It was a pretty cheap price to pay for unifying the country.”[5]

On 17 November 1941, Joseph Grew, the US Ambassador to Japan, cabled the State Department stating that Japan had plans to attack Pearl Harbor, but his cable was ignored. This gave the US twenty days’ warning.

On 26 November 1941, a fleet of six aircraft carriers commanded by the Japanese Vice-Admiral Chuichi Nagumo left Hitokapu Bay for Pearl Harbor under strict radio silence, with the Japanese Navy launching their surprise attack on Pearl Harbor 11 days later on 7 December 1941 – 6 December Japanese time. The only surprise was to those patriots who had not been warned.

Although both British and American Chiefs of Staff knew about the planned attack on Pearl Harbor, the US twenty days beforehand, and the Brits eleven days beforehand, both wanted America to join the war and were waiting for an excuse. All they needed was a swing in public opinion. Before Pearl Harbor, 81% of Americans did not want to get into the war. After Pearl Harbor, 99% of Americans wanted to get into the war.

What is even more shameful is that those close to President Franklin D. Roosevelt could decipher the Japanese diplomatic code faster than the Japanese Embassy in Washington. Pearl Harbor was deliberate self-sabotage to draw America into WWII. This was to be repeated with the 9-11 Twin Towers and Pentagon bombing in 2001.

To achieve this end, M was used. The British contribution to the cover-up of events leading to the Pearl Harbor attack was called Operation SUBEND. Ian Fleming (33) was the naval control officer and Chris Creighton (17), with the nom de guerre ‘Leading Seaman John Davis’, was the sole boarding operative.

Ian Fleming later became the first commander of Operation JAMES BOND and Chris Creighton became the second. OP JB was the removal of Martin Bormann out of Berlin. When Ian Fleming left this operation halfway through, he moved onto Operation WINNIE THE POOH – the removal of Adolf Hitler out of Berlin on 2 May 1945 to Spain.

Since Germany’s invasion of Holland, Dutch submarines in the Pacific were a proxy for the British Royal Navy. They were doing tasks for the British and were under British control. The Dutch submarines were essentially a picket line watching for the Japanese battle fleet.

One of these Dutch submarines saw the Japanese battle fleet head towards Pearl Harbor and wired a storm warning to the British. The 17-year-old Chris Creighton was immediately flown to the Far East, plonked into a naval uniform and made a Brevet junior officer.[6] He boarded the Dutch submarine, delivered explosives disguised as gifts, and delaying devices for torpedo warheads. These blew up the Dutch submarine with all its crew. This prevented the Dutch from warning the Americans that the Japanese fleet was about to attack Pearl Harbor. Transcripts from Chris Creighton’s 1996 book read:

Ian Fleming in Room 10 of the Royal Navy Headquarters in London.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Ian Fleming: “Five minutes after midday on 28 November 1941, Dutch submarine K-XVII, commanded by Lieutenant-Commander Besançon, approaches a position in the Pacific, latitude 43° 30’ north, longitude 155° 20’ east, approximately 280 miles off north-east of Japan’s Tankan Bay. There she sights a fleet of Japanese warships. They’ve been making a three-leg zig-zag course. Commander Besançon correctly calculates this to be a course-made-good – a direct track – of 88° (true). This will bring them to Hawaii and Pearl Harbor eight hundred miles ahead.”[7]

Chris Creighton: “In November 1941 I alone had wiped out the entire ship’s company with two tiny cylinders of cyanide inserted into their oxygen supply, and a box of high explosives, disguised as whiskey, both timed to release their venomous contents when I was safely away. Those Dutch submariners’ only sin was that they had seen, and reported, the Japanese fleet sailing toward Pearl Harbor: news of it had to be suppressed, to ensure the attack went home and America came into the war, and it was deemed essential that the Dutchmen and their secret must die.”[8]

“I related how I had witnessed the destruction of K-XVII and all her crew, whom I had come to know well over the previous few days. I related how fused canisters of cyanide gas and high explosive had been taken aboard at my direction, disguised as Christmas gifts of food and drink from Queen Wilhelmina and our Admiral, Submarines, Sir Max Horton. From the safety of a Berwick flying boat I had watched as the aircraft suddenly shuddered, and an enormous explosion vomited out great spouts of water, together with broken-up crates of stores, bits of men, oil and oddments of equipment. It was as if a colossal underwater creature had swallowed a submarine, chewed up its human and mechanical contents, and then been violently sick.

[6] ‘Brevet’ signifies that it is an elevated title in use only for the duration of the Special Op. Chris Creighton’s first job was to destroy French and Belgian supply dumps (specifically fuel) in the path of the German army, but he failed to act as he was overwhelmed by the speed of the German attack. The Germans were dependent on stolen fuel for their advance.

"Above all, I wondered what they would say or do if they knew that their valiant submariners had been sacrificed simply because the highest authorities in Britain and America did not trust them to keep their mouths shut."[9]

James Bond then flew back to Britain in a clean-up operation to supervise and assist in the murders of the Royal Navy signals staff who had sighted the Dutch submarine K-XVII's signals. One of the women was attacked by a sex-criminal specifically paroled from His Majesty's prison for this purpose. Under police control and supervision the criminal was allowed to have his way with the woman before she was murdered.

Spymaster: "Hilda Murrell met with a similar fate in the 1980s during the hunt for the missing pages of the log of the HMS Conqueror which sunk the Argentine heavy cruiser the Belgrano as it attempted to surrender during the Falklands War."

Espavo Gozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

This is called an 'intelligence-involved coup' – not dissimilar to 9-11 on 11 September 2001. Complicit enemy-attacks are the 'usual' method of bringing a third party ally into war. Operation SUBEND was a British 'war-escalating exercise', as was the sabotage of Hitler's peace initiatives of May, June, and July 1941. Conflict was to be prolonged and upscaled and America was to be drawn into the war. This was a British secret intelligence operation run by M.

In order to further cover up these 'Cover-Up Operations', the true identity of James Bond is being misconstrued and applied to lesser entities who could not have been involved in the Cover-Up Ops. As such, Buckingham Palace is dishing out press releases that apply the James Bond identity to others with such squeaky-clean records that they appear to be under-achievers, such as "Commander X" and the "Bond Inspiration Dies".

> A British war hero said to have been the inspiration behind secret agent James Bond has died age 90. Former Royal Navy Lieutenant Commander Patrick Dalzel-Job [1913–2003] carried out a series of daring exploits behind enemy lines during WWII including some while serving under Bond author Ian Fleming. Fleming had told him he was the model for the spy. In 1940, Dalzel-Job disobeyed orders in order to rescue all the women, children and elderly residents from a Norwegian town just before it was destroyed in a German bombing raid."[10]
> Commander X , a real-life Bond . . . Ernest Bond was . . . a tough founder member of the Special Air Service, he was known to the press in the 1970s as 'Commander X' (for security reasons Scotland Yard did not release his name) . . . and on the outbreak of WWII . . . he joined 'L Detachment' of the embroyonic SAS.[11]

There are a series of events which secure Pearl Harbor as a stitch-up with agreement from all sides – Britain, America, Japan and Germany. Hardly had WWII started when President Roosevelt (Freemason) wrote to Britain's First Lord of the Admiralty Winston Churchill (Freemason) suggesting they work together via a secret system of communication.

President Roosevelt, 11 September 1939: "What I want you and the Prime Minister to know is that I shall at all times welcome it, if you will keep me in touch personally with anything you want me to know about. You can always send sealed letters through your pouch or my pouch."

Churchill responded enthusiastically: "I am half American and the natural person to work with you. It is evident that we see eye to eye. Were I to become Prime Minister of Britain we could control the world." This happened eight months later on 10 May 1940 and the previous Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain died from 'cancer' six months after that on 9 November 1940.

A method of secret communication was agreed upon in which Roosevelt would sign himself "Potus" (President of the United States), and Churchill would sign himself "Former Naval Person". All the really important negotiations and agreements between Britain and the United States from September 1939 to 7 December 1941 (Pearl Harbor) were handled via diplomatic pouch or telegram, with over 2000 messages exchanged over 15 months.

Two recovered telegrams from this secret correspondence illustrate Roosevelt's desire to go to war. He states that the US could not be induced to enter the war on behalf of Poland.[12]

Churchill responded: “Every chain has its weakest spot and the weak link in the Axis chain is Japan. Goad Japan into attacking the US and you will have the US in the war.” Roosevelt followed this strategy.[13]

Tyler Kent was everybody’s agent and his ideology followed the dick in his pants. His father had been the US Consul in Manchuria and Tyler had worked under the first American ambassador to the USSR as a cipher clerk. After shagging his NKVD interpreter he was transferred to London, spent time with the German agent Ludwig Matthias and the former Russian naval attaché Nikolai Wolkoff, took on Anna Wolkoff’s friend as a mistress, then worked directly under Churchill from 5 October 1939 encoding and decoding sensitive telegrams.

T. KENT.
2208 27.5.40

If Churchill wanted a triple agent to spread his message of war around the world, Tyler Kent was his man.

Tyler Kent was considered the weakest link in the chain and was used to inform the Russians and Germans of Britain and America’s intention to have Pearl Harbor attacked. His job done, Tyler Kent was arrested on 20 May 1940, as was his friend Nazi spy Anna Wolkoff, dressmaker to Wallis Simpson.

treasurer@platinumparty.org

At Tyler’s London flat, MI-5 found 1929 official documents, Churchill’s cables to Roosevelt and MI-5 and Special Branch books listing the names of people under surveillance. Tyler’s trial at the Old Bailey was in camera (secret with no spectators) and this prevented any information surfacing about Churchill and Roosevelt’s plan to have Pearl Harbor attacked.

During the spring and summer of 1941, in Europe and the Atlantic, Roosevelt did everything he could to provoke Germany and Italy into producing some “act of war” against an American ship. He even convoyed supplies and munitions to Britain and Russia illegally and with full advertisement, but neither Germany nor Italy would take the bait.

[13] Harry Elmer Barnes, Pearl Harbor After a Quarter of a Century, p. 15.

Prior to Pearl Harbor, American ships were immune to attack, despite their cargo, or who they were delivering it to. Germany and Japan knew of the Lusitania and weren’t about to repeat that mistake.

In January 1941 the Japanese sent an amazingly generous offer to the Americans with full Japanese authorisation offering to retire from the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis (Italian, German, Japanese alliance) in return for peace with the United States. President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull rejected it.[14]

British and American joint-staff conferences were then held in Washington DC (January–March 1941) to arrange a plan for military collaboration called the ABC-1.

On 27 March 1941, America, Holland and Britain met in Singapore for a combined operating plan in the event of war. This resulted in the ADB (later known as the ABCD agreement) – If the Japanese moved southward beyond the arbitrary line of 100° East or 10° North, attacked, or threatened to attack British or Dutch possessions in the southwest Pacific, then the US would join them in war against Japan even though the Japanese had not attacked anything American . . . The US Atlantic Fleet was to assist Royal Navy convoy ships crossing the Atlantic. The ABC inextricably linked the US and British navies against Germany.

This ABCD agreement and resulting war plans (Rainbow 5 or WPL 46, and WPPac46) extended the range of possible provocations for US involvement in the war to anything Dutch or British, or across a demarcated line. By July 1941 this led some American military leaders to consider war in the southwest Pacific as a likelihood.[15]

The ABCD became an embarassment to Roosevelt who had won the election promising peace and had further stated that he would not go to war unless directly attacked by the Japanese. When Hitler did not attack Roosevelt’s illegal American war cargo ships, FDR was facing embarrassment. To bring about war, FDR did everything possible to prevent his Hawaiian commanders from taking any defensive action which would deter the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. President Roosevelt did everything he could to ensure Pearl Harbor was attacked and surprised as many people as possible, including the media, who had been pre-informed.

[14] Cordell Hull (1871–1955) received a one-year law degree in 1891 and was made a judge in 1903 (aged 31). After this, he was nicknamed ‘Judge’ by all and sundry. He served as Secretary of State from 1933–44 at which time he was 73 and retired due to ill health.

[15] Harry Elmer Barnes, Pearl Harbor After a Quarter of a Century, p. 17.

From March to November 1941, President Roosevelt encouraged Secretary of State Cordell Hull to stall any Japanese initiatives at peaceful settlement and to provoke Japan into war by strangulating their supplies. Japan lacked oil, iron and cotton and was dependent on overseas routes for supply, and US and European markets to supply them.

On 25–26 July 1941, Roosevelt froze all Japanese assets in the US and then placed an embargo on trade with Japan. He then encouraged the British and Dutch to follow suit. Japan faced economic strangulation unless it could get supplies from the southwest Pacific area, which it could only do now by force.[16]

On 9–12 August 1941, Churchill went to Argentia off the coast of Newfoundland and arranged the details for America to enter WWII via the back door (war with Japan), but with America's primary focus on Germany.

Churchill wanted immediate war but Roosevelt insisted on three months' grace to "baby" the Japanese along. He also wanted time for the Russians to take more heat off Britain, since Barbarossa had just begun (22 June 1941) and to extend the possibility that Germany and/or Italy might still provoke America into war in the Atlantic. This meeting and these issues were disguised as "The Atlantic Charter", the result of which was little more than a press release.

The next day, 13 August 1941, Roosevelt called in the Japanese ambassador to the US (Admiral Kichisaburo Nomura) and gave him an unprovoked and gratuitous tongue-lashing that sent the clear message that the US would not tolerate peace.

The Japanese peace party under Prime Minister Fumimaro Konoye was in power but was quickly replaced (two months later) with a war party government under General Hideki Tojo on 16 October 1941.[17] The new Tojo government also offered excellent peace settlement terms the following month (November 1941), which protected all legitimate American interests in the Far East. Roosevelt also rejected these Japanese-instigated peace settlement terms.

From this point on, the US was counting down to the Great Pacific War as designed 25 years earlier by Hector C. Bywater, and nothing except a wide dissemination of truth could stop it. On 26 November 1941, President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull sent an ultimatum to Japan. In effect this was a frank and firm declaration of war ending all peace negotiations.

> "Roosevelt was one of the most determined war-mongers of all history . . . It is nearer to the truth to state that in his foreign policy Roosevelt was one of the more notable opportunists in the historical record."[18]
> "Steps were taken to ensure that the strategic Hawaiian commanders, General Walter C. Short and Admiral Husband E. Kimmel, would not be forewarned of any impending Japanese attack at Pearl Harbor."[19]

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

"The overall protection of the Hawaiian District, including Pearl Harbor, was entrusted to General Short as commander-in-chief of the Hawaiian District . . . Admiral Kimmel was commander-in-chief of the Pacific fleet and the supreme naval authority at Pearl Harbor. His duties were primarily strategic and related to preparing naval hardware and personnel for controlling the mid-Pacific and, if necessary, moving the fleet both to protect Pearl Harbor and to wage war in accordance with orders from Washington based on WPL 46."[20] Admiral Kimmel had his own Fleet Intelligence service.

Admiral Claude C. Bloch, commander of the Fourteenth Naval District, was to protect the Pearl Harbor naval base and received all communications from Washington DC. He commanded the local Naval District at Pearl Harbor, as distinct from the fleet at the time of the Pearl Harbor attack, which was commanded by the ill-informed Commander-in-Chief, Pacific Fleet, Admiral Husband E. Kimmel.

Admiral Bloch acted in self-sabotage.
Admiral Kimmel acted in ignorance.

Commander Joseph J. Rochefort headed the Naval Communications Intelligence staff and was under Admiral Bloch's control.

Warnings of any attack were to be sent by General Marshall directly to General Short and warnings from Admiral Stark were to be sent directly to Admiral Kimmel. All parties were supposed to illuminate General Short and Admiral Kimmel. Instead, both were kept in the dark.[21]

> From 13 August to 11 December 1941, Roosevelt followed a combined policy of announcing peaceful intentions to the public while planning for war through diplomatic circles (anti-diplomacy). He informed the American public that he was determined to keep the peace and that everything he did was "short of war" and designed to keep America out of the war. At the same time, his diplomacy with Japan was provocative of war and he told Churchill he would bring the United States into the war as soon as possible.

"No top military or civilian authority in Washington on December 7, 1941, should have been surprised at either the place or time of the Japanese attack on the Pacific fleet at Pearl Harbor. The only element of surprise, if any, should have been over the damage that the Japanese planes delivered to the fleet."[22]

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March

According to Colonel Carlton Ketchum, warnings began in early fall of 1941 and the sources included the Dutch Embassy, Dutch Secret Service and British Secret Service. President Roosevelt even received a warning from a government agency in Japan. Roosevelt passed these warnings on to FBI Chief J. Edgar Hoover, Secretary Knox and Secretary of War Stimson. Further briefing from President Roosevelt prevented all three from passing these warnings on to the commanders in the Pacific or to the FBI men stationed in the Pacific.[23] Many naval officers then confirmed that Roosevelt knew of the attack beforehand.

Lt.Col. Clifford M. Andrew: "We knew well in advance that the Japanese were going to attack. At least nine months before the Japanese attack upon Pearl Harbor, I was assigned to prepare for it . . . [I] was under direct orders of President Roosevelt. [I] was ordered to withhold from commanders in Hawaii vital intelligence relating to the location of the Japanese fleet . . . Pearl Harbor is an example of how a small group of men in control of government has the power to destroy the life, property and freedom of its citizens."[24]

The Yanks dug horizontal trenches across the fields at the back of Maui 18 months before the attack. Permission for the trenches was obtained by a US Government official who frankly explained that they were being built for the war against Japan. When the Japanese planes tried to land, they crashed as this officer predicted they would.

The FBI then watched the Japanese burning cable traffic in their embassy on 17 November 1941, 20 days before Pearl Harbor.

> One of the [British] XX-Committee's first and most important double agents was a thirty-year-old Yugoslav businessman named Dusko Popov. A member of a well-to-do royalist family, Popov had been approached by the Abwehr at the outbreak of the war [he regularly had lunch with the chief of Paris Gestapo] with the suggestion that his family's political ambitions might be enhanced if he worked for Germany as a spy against the British. Popov agreed – and promptly informed the MI-6 representative in Belgrade of his Abwehr connections. He arrived in England on December 20, 1940, and made a 'most favourable impression' when closely questioned by the British secret intelligence services. He was then passed on to the XX-Committee and rechristened 'Tricycle' [his German codename was 'Disco'] and he opened up secret communications with the Abwehr in Lisbon.
> He established himself as a highly placed agent in England; and in the next several months he supplied the Abwehr with a great deal of information fabricated by the XX-Committee that beclouded all German estimates about British strength for the remainder of the war.
> Then in June 1941, the Abwehr, pleased with Disco's [Tricycle's] performance in Britain, instructed him to go to America on an espionage mission to investigate in detail, among other targets, the air, military and naval installations at Pearl Harbor, which the Japanese had asked the Abwehr to

> Popov informed the XX-Committee of his assignment and, through the American Embassy, the XX-Committee informed the FBI. The Abwehr questionnaire, which was designed to guide Popov in his reconnaissance, was also passed on to the FBI. But shortly after Popov arrived in the United States by Pan American Clipper from Lisbon on August 24, 1941, he encountered the full wrath of the director of the FBI, J. Edgar Hoover.[25]

Spymaster: "J. Edgar Hoover, a 33 degree Mason, was just as blackmailed by the Nazis as he was by the Mafia, who in his eyes, didn't exist, even though they managed to sodomise him and film it every week."

"Hoover did not want agents of any foreign power working in America. At their only meeting, he treated Popov with disgust, and declared that – according to Popov – 'I can catch spies without your or anybody else's help'. He accused Popov of being 'Like all double agents. You're begging for information to sell to your German friends so that you can make a lot of money and be a playboy.'

"Popov, who had taken a woman friend to Florida for a holiday, would find himself threatened with prosecution under the Mann Act [the illegal transportation of women across a state line for the purposes of sexual intercourse], and agents of the Internal Revenue Service were also set on him.

J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI: another homosexual bureaucrat bribed into treason by the extramural activities of his arse.

"… The British extricated him … with the IRS hot on his heels … and the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor. Although the American government had some foreknowledge from other intelligence sources of the impending attack, notably from its naval cryptanalytical bureau in Room 1649 of the Navy Department on Constitution Avenue in Washington . . . The United States declared war upon the Axis powers, and for Churchill, America's entry into the conflict was the answer to a constant prayer."[26]

The 1940 Build-Up to Pearl Harbor

30 March: US seized Axis ships (Germany, Japan, Italy) in US ports.

8 April: British invaded Norwegian territorial waters and pushed ships carrying iron ore into international waters.

9 April: Germany attacked Scandinavia.

24 April: US Neutrality Patrol was extended east to 26° W (Iceland) and 20° S (almost to Rio).

5 July: The US placed a ban on strategic materials to Japan.

27 August: The draft (compulsory military service) was established in the US.

25 Sept: Oil exports to Japan were reduced.

27 Sept: Japan joined German and Italian Axis in Tripartite Pact.

In the Pacific, the US was considered to have a very strong Navy and Naval Air Force defense and was capable of long-range offensive operations. Even the small portion of the US Naval Force was capable of threatening Japan's southern supply routes. A. H. McCollum's 7 October 1940 'Memorandum to the Directors' read:

"A. Make an arrangement with Britain for the use of British bases in the Pacific, particularly Singapore.

B. Make an arrangement with Holland for the use of base facilities and acquisitions of supplies in the Dutch East Indies.

C. Give all possible aid to the Chinese Government of Chiang-Kai-Shek.

D. Send a division of long range heavy cruisers to the Orient, Philippines, or Singapore.

E. Send two divisions of submarines to the Orient.

F. Keep the main strength of the US Fleet now in the Pacific in the vicinity of the Hawaiian Islands.

G. Insist that the Dutch refuse to grant Japanese demands for undue economic concessions, particularly oil.

H. Completely embargo all US trade with Japan, in collaboration with a similar embargo imposed by the British Empire.

I. If by these means Japan could be led to commit an overt act of war, so much the better. At all events we must be fully prepared to accept the threat of war."

The 1941 Build-Up to Pearl Harbor

January: US go to China to assist in a Chinese invasion of Japan.

29 May: US Neutrality Patrol was extended to the north, central and southern Atlantic.

12 June: US Naval Reserve was called to active duty.

14 June: US froze German and Italian assets.

16 June: US closed German & Italian consulates in US & Hawaii, but left the Japanese Consulate open, allowing Japanese to continue gathering military intelligence & monitor US fleet movements.

2 July: Japan called up one million army conscripts.

24 July: Japan occupied French Indochina (including Vietnam). This was approved by the Vichy French (the French who backed Hitler).

26 July: US froze Japanese assets & stopped oil exports to Japan.

4 Oct: US suspended all oil shipments to Japan.

5 Oct: US & British commanders had another Naval Conference in Singapore.

8 Oct: US advised its citizens to leave the Far East.

14 Oct: US sent 3 passenger ships to Japan & China to collect its citizens.

4 Nov: Cash & Carry amendment to the Neutrality Act allowed US to supply munitions to Allies.

10 Nov: US begin escorting British troops. The first is 20,000 British troops sailing from Halifax, Canada to the Far East.

10–20 Nov: US DDs (destroyers) made certain sound contact and attacked.

11 Nov: US Navy ordered to attack any vessel threatening US shipping.

13 Nov: Neutrality Act amended & armed US ships enter war zones.

17 Nov: 38 escort carriers transferred to Britain as part of Lend-Lease. The first is the Archer (BAVG 1).

20 Nov: Japan had been occupying Northern China from 1931 and issued an ultimatium to the US demanding supply of oil and withdrawal of support for the invasion of Japan from China. Japan later confirmed oil and US steel blockade were primary reason for bombing Pearl Harbor.

25 Nov: US troops left for Dutch Guiana with the excuse they're protecting Guiana's bauxite mines.

5 Dec: Churchill declared war on Finland in order to gratify Stalin who invaded on 30 November 1939.

China and America threaten to invade Japan and force Pearl Harbor

In January 1941 the US went to China to help with their defence against the Japanese invasion. The Chinese had begun to extend their runways in North China that faced towards Japan and Japan didn't pick this up straight away. On 15 April 1941, President Roosevelt authorised the American Volunteer Group (later known as the 'Flying Tigers') and supplied these pilots to the Chinese government. Most of these came from the Navy and Marine Corps and towards the end of 1941 the US were making noises about extending the AVG.

Spymaster: "When the US started advertising for pilots with multi-engine experience to fly Lockheed Hudsons, the Japanese became alarmed and started to cast around America to see what was on order in the American defence works. They uncovered a large contract to manufacture incendiary bombs. These were paid for by the British.

"The Japanese then checked the runways in North China and concluded that the Chinese were going to launch an attack against Japan from these new runways, with British and American backing. The Japanese concluded that the date of the attack was to be January 1942. From this they knew they had to attack Pearl Harbor beforehand, so they attacked in early December 1941."

America had advertised for pilots and built the runways knowing that it would force the Japanese to attack Pearl Harbor before January 1942.

Japan Attacks

On 26 November 1941, America replied, citing self-determination but the Japanese fleet had already sailed for the Pearl Harbor attack that morning. They carried the world's best dive bombers, fighter planes and torpedo bombers, whose torpedoes had been adapted with wooden fins.

It was thought that Pearl Harbor was too shallow to launch torpedoes. The anchorage was only 12 metres deep and torpedoes dropped from planes sunk to 20 metres before beginning their run. But the Japanese tested torpedoes with wooden fins at Kagoshima Bay. This gave them extra bouyancy and the strike rate reached 70%. The British knew of these successful torpedo tests but suppressed the news from their own navy. The news that the Japanese had a new deadly long-range torpedo that ran close to the surface arrived with the first torpedo.

"Not the best way to find out, old chaps."

The wisdom from all sides was that making a surprise attack against Pearl Harbor some 4000 miles away (6500 km) was virtually impossible. The only way this could be done was with complicity from all sides – so Japan was given complicity from all sides.

Espavo 3020 - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March

The Japanese instigated increasingly hostile diplomatic messages with America. This alerted American and British spies to focus on Japanese activities. At the same time, Japan brought its six largest aircraft carriers carrying 423 warplanes to the Kurile Islands in northeast Japan. This could not pass unnoticed. It did not pass unnoticed, and those who noticed were silenced or killed by either the British or Americans.

US cruisers had been patrolling the movements of war-active men on the eastern seaboard for foreign men-of-war since 4 September 1939. They did not miss six aircraft carriers and 30 submarines leaving Hitokapu Bay in Japan on 26 November 1941, but they were under American orders not to report it.

Japanese soldiers were dressed in naval uniform and told to wander around large Japanese cities. They were well supplied with spending money and told not to get drunk or sing army songs.

Fake Japanese radio traffic was set up so that these ships appeared to be in port. Meanwhile, the Japanese strike force stayed north of the shipping lanes as it sailed eastwards, going at 13 knots so that its refuelling ships could keep up. After ten days' sailing they arrived in position northeast of Hawaii on 6 December 1941. They were spotted by the Dutch submarine K-XVII during this time. When the British were alerted, they sank the Dutch submarine and did not alert the Americans at Pearl Harbor.

At 3.42 am on 7 December 1941 the minesweeper USS Condor spotted a two-man midget submarine. The USS Ward was summoned and the contact reported. Kimmel was not immediately notified and the base was not alerted. Here was smoking gun evidence of a grande coup. By this time it was known that the Japanese fleet had sailed, but not by their target – the US Navy.

Roosevelt Knew

Many historians now say President Roosevelt knew when and where the attack was coming from and was ensuring it would happen so that America had sufficient excuse to join WWII.

> "The Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor was instigated by the US, Britain and Holland when they cut off all shipping into and out of Japan, threatening its people with starvation."[27]

Dutch naval attaché Captain Ranneft was frequently allowed into the Naval Intelligence Office in San Francisco. Here, Robert Ogg had been plotting the location of the Japanese fleet on a chart of the north Pacific from 30 November 1941. On 3 December 1941, Captain Ranneft was told by Robert Ogg that they had tracked two Japanese carriers from their radio emissions. Captain Ranneft returned on 6 December 1941 and Robert Ogg showed him the new location of the carriers, "two hundred miles from Pearl Harbor".[28]

As of 2001, another 43,000 Japanese messages remain classified.

Based in Pearl Harbor, Army Intelligence Officer Mason Van Dyke had foreknowledge of the Pearl Harbor attack and sent his warning to Washington DC at 2.00 pm on 4 December 1941. Due to the time difference, his message was received in Washington around 7.00 pm by Rear Admiral Paulus Prince Powell, who then notified Secretary of Navy Frank Knox, who then contacted Secretary of War Henry Stimson, who contacted President Roosevelt, who then reported it to Naval Intelligence in Washington.

Secretary of Navy Frank Knox wanted to move the Navy out and set up a defense perimeter around the islands. Undersecretary of Navy James Vincent Forrestal also wanted to act defensively.

President Roosevelt then placed Secretary of Navy Knox, Undersecretary of Navy Forrestal, and Rear Admiral Powell under armed Marine guard until after the Pearl Harbor attack.

President Roosevelt then sent a message to Intelligence officer Lt.Col. Clifford M. Andrew at Army Intelligence in Hawaii: "The Japanese will attack, do not prepare defenses, we need the full support of the American Nation in a wartime effort by an unprovoked attack upon the Nation."

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

Lt.Col. Clifford M. Andrew: "We knew well in advance that the Japanese were going to attack. It was a lie that we didn't have direct radio communication with Washington DC. Not only did my office have direct radio communications, but so did the territorial government and the FBI . . . The responsibility for Pearl Harbor rests upon five men: Franklin D. Roosevelt; Gen. George C. Marshall; Harold R. Stark (Chief of Naval Operations); Col. Kindall J. Fielder, G-2, under General Short; and Clifford M. Andrew."[29]

At 5.00 pm on Friday 5 December 1941 Army Intelligence Officer Mason Van Dyke warned his nephew (Hartford van Dyke's father) that the Japanese would attack, most probably on Sunday 7 December 1941. He also told his nephew the Intelligence Department in Washington had been warned . . . but America would stand down.

Al Bielik: "We went to San Francisco on December 5th. We were to return to Pearl Harbor. We were about to board a plane at a Naval Air Station at Alameda and we were stopped. Naval Captain said, 'Your orders are cancelled'. We were taken to a room and we were interviewed by then Director of the Office of Naval Engineering, Al Bowen Snr., who told us that, 'We expect the Japanese to attack Pearl Harbor within 48 to 72 hours. We consider you people too valuable to send back there, so stay in San Francisco'; which we did and we returned to the Institute in 1942 and of course Pearl Harbor and December 7th is history . . . Pearl Harbor was a complete set-up order by Roosevelt to have an attack on the United States in order to get us into the war. That's the bottom line. There's plenty of evidence after the war was over, when they started investigating the records, and it was published ultimately in the papers."[30]

Rear Admiral Powell speaking to Army Intelligence Officer Mason Van Dyke in 1960: "It was one of the most dastardly things any president or king has ever done in the history of the world. And there's no way to keep it from happening again."[31]

To support America joining the war, but not being taken out of contention on the first day, America took passive precautions and five of its six aircraft carriers were removed from Ford Island Pearl Harbor between 26 and 28 November 1941.

[31] Hartford van Dyke, The Skeleton in Uncle Sam's Closet.

For years before the attack on Pearl Harbor, naval manoeuvres had been held off the island of Oahu (Hawaii) to test the feasibility of a Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. The practicality of a surprise attack from Japan was continually confirmed. From 1932, dummy surprise air attacks were able to be executed while operating only 60 miles off Pearl Harbor, and in 1938 a successful dummy surprise air attack was launched 100 miles off Pearl Harbor from the aircraft carrier Saratoga.

In April 1941, Pearl Harbor's Commanders of the Army, General Frederick L. Martin, and Commander of the Navy air forces, Admiral Patrick N. L. Bellinger, described in detail any future Japanese air attack. This was forwarded to the Army and Navy HQs in Washington who did nothing responsive with it.

Fleet Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto.

Yamamoto's Japanese attack eight months later from 200 miles (320 km) off Pearl Harbor turned out to be "identical" to General Martin and Admiral Bellinger's plan. This suggests a purposeful leak from the American High Command direct to Japan.

Rear Admiral James O. Richardson in 1938.

Long before Admiral Kimmel assumed command at Pearl Harbor (January 1941), it was basic Pacific naval strategy to accept that any Japanese-initiated war would strike first at the Pearl Harbor fleet. This was emphasised and affirmed to Washington by General Hugh Drum (1935), General George V. Strong (1940) and by Commander Arthur N. McCollum, head of the Far Eastern Section of Naval Intelligence (1941).[32]

The American Pacific fleet was actually based in the relative safety of San Diego prior to the spring (March) of 1940 and was moved to Pearl Harbor as Roosevelt's best incitement into war.

Admiral Kimmel.

Admiral James O. Richardson, an able commander of the Pacific Fleet (until January 1941) bitterly protested the fleet's permanent retention at Pearl Harbor, after the manoeuvres in the spring of 1940 exposed Pearl Harbor as "a damned mouse trap" for the American Navy. Within ten months Admiral Richardson (quoted) was strategically removed for his remarks and replaced by Admiral Kimmel.

In January 1941, Joseph C. Grew, the American Ambassador in Tokyo, made a precise statement that he had received a friendly warning from the Peruvian Minister in Tokyo saying he had obtained information from several sources that if Japan could not reach peaceful negotiations with the US, they would start war with a surprise attack on Pearl Harbor. In Washington, only the Secretary of the Navy, Frank Knox, took this warning seriously. After the Pearl Harbor attack, Washington authorities tried to cover up by presenting their Tokyo ambassadors' statements as "worthless hearsay".[33]

"From September 1941 to 7 December, Washington authorities intercepted considerable Japanese intelligence traffic between Tokyo and Honolulu that obviously and specifically indicated that in the event of war between Japan and the US, the first Japanese move would be a surprise attack on the Pacific fleet at Pearl Harbor. These messages were so prolific they became known as the "Bomb Plot" messages and consisted of requests from the Japanese Government in Tokyo to the Japanese Consul-General in Honolulu, Nagoa Kita, for detailed and specific information as to the nature, number and types of vessels in the Pacific fleet at Pearl Harbor, their location and movements, and other relevant information connected with the American military establishment located there, together with Kita's replies to these requests. This intelligence traffic between Tokyo to Kita in Honolulu became more frequent and detailed as 7 December approached."[34]

---

[33] Pearl Harbor After a Quarter of a Century, p. 23.

[34] Ibid, p. 24, slightly paraphrased for readability.

The first of these messages was sent in the easy-to-read J-19 Japanese code on 24 September 1941 and was read on 9 October at Washington DC. From this point on, Washington was in no doubt that Japan was planning to bomb Pearl Harbor if negotiations failed. Roosevelt responded by purposefully sabotaging negotiations. When the peaceful Konoye government was replaced with the warring Tojo government (16 October 1941), the Japanese espionage reports from Honolulu were sent at more frequent intervals.

On 15 November 1941 these reports were sent twice a week. On 18 November and again on 20 November, Tokyo requested the positions (grids and coordinates) of all warships anchored in and around Pearl Harbor. On 29 November, Tokyo ordered an update, although no ships had moved.

Japanese spies were frequently detected making routine and trivial inquiries at other leading American naval bases, but the Japanese did not demand detailed information anywhere except at Pearl Harbor.

Washington officials in the army and navy, President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull were privy to all of this intelligence traffic and all of them knew of the Japanese Bomb Plot and that the focus was on Pearl Harbor.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

On 3 December 1941, Japan sent a message to Nagoa Kita, the Japanese Consul-General in Honolulu:

> "The Japanese task force was nearing Pearl Harbor and was expected to arrive off Hawaii by the night of 6 December."

The same day, Nagoa Kita replied to Tokyo saying that he had set up an elaborate system of window code signals at Lanikai Beach, easily visible to boats off the coast. He signalled passing Japanese fishing craft and submarines, who passed the information back to the Japanese task force. He also sent the final and decisive Bomb Plot message to Tokyo. By 6 December it was decoded, translated and available for distribution. At 2.30 pm it was in the communications section of the Navy Department in Washington.

> On the heels of processing the Kita message came instructions that the Japanese embassy in Washington was to reply to Hull's ultimatum. The 14-point message was decoded by 6 December (Purple code) and showed that the negotiations with Hull were over. There was no doubt that Japan would attack the United States in a matter of hours.
> A copy was delivered to Roosevelt and Harry Hopkins at the White House about nine o'clock that night. After reading it, Roosevelt acknowledged that it meant war, but he took no steps to warn Pearl Harbor. Admiral Kimmel and General Short should have been warned at once, but they were not.

The 14-point message was intercepted as it arrived by the army monitoring station at Fort Hunt, Virginia on 3 December. They were then decoded by Mrs Dorothy Edgers of Naval Communications in Washington (8.00 am–2.00 pm, 6 December). She then handed the decode to her immediate superior Yeoman Bryant, adding that she believed the points were very important. Yeoman Bryant read the ready-to-read messages and handed them to his chief of section, Commander Alwyn D. Kramer (2.30 pm, 6 December 1941) who was in charge of the translation work for the Far East section of Naval Communications.

> The decoded, translated and ready-to-read messages confirmed Pearl Harbor as the place of the attack and that there would be no more signals after midnight 6 December 1941. It also clearly stated that Admiral Chiuchi Nagumo (who commanded the Japanese task force) was moving toward Pearl Harbor, intended to organise off Oahu that night, and was ready to attack the next morning.

Commander Kramer showed the message to some leading officers in the navy and army. Its importance was recognised and he was ordered to suppress it for the time being, thus rendering it useless. Commander Kramer then thought the message was messy and tried to rework it with the intention of sending it on Monday 8 December 1941. Commander Kramer dithered and did not distribute the message commensurate with its importance (America going to war within 24 hours). At best, he distributed the message to a few top-level civil and military officials. Commander Kramer's actions were treason-with-complicit-pedantic-excuses.

By early evening on 6 December 1941 the top officials in Washington and in the army and navy knew that Japan was going to bomb Pearl Harbor the next morning, yet they did not inform Admiral Husband E. Kimmel and General Walter C. Short of the time or place of the attack (Pearl Harbor before 7.30 am). This was self-sabotage and confirms that American High Command had no intention to commit to peace. Peace was merely sold as the most expedient way of winning an election. After all, Roosevelt had been the president for some time – since 1933, until his death in the spring (12 April) of 1945 at Warm Springs.

When Commander Kramer was questioned in the post-Pearl Harbor investigations, he was the most severely intimidated of all witnesses, to the extent that he had a nervous breakdown. He has also declined to answer any questions during his retirement, all of which was planned. Yeoman Bryant was present at the Pearl Harbor enquiry, but was not called to testify. His testimony would have clarified the truth of the matter.

When Commander Alwyn D. Kramer read the first decoded message on 9 October 1941 he noted it was very significant and required further study. The able, forthright and experienced Director of the Office of Naval Information, Captain Alan G. Kirk, then insisted the message be sent to Admiral Kimmel at Pearl Harbor. This action was blocked by Admiral Richmond Kelly Turner who was supported by Admiral Stark.

Admiral Turner was unpardonably ignorant about Pearl Harbor's intercepting facilities, believing they had a Purple machine that read Japanese diplomatic messages on the spot. His ignorance of the details of the cryptanalytic set-up and operations at Pearl Harbor was only exceeded by his arrogant self-confidence. Admiral Turner was very able, but way too sure of himself. As a conceited Admiral he was part of the Illuminati's venture capital in the creation of war.

Admiral Turner.

Admiral Turner often dominated Admiral Stark in naval decisions. As a consequence, Stark backed Turner up in not sending the message. This was contrary to his promise to Admiral Kimmel in Honolulu "to provide complete and speedy information".

treasurer@platinumparty.org

Admiral Stark receives a medal from President Roosevelt in April 1942; and sitting comfortably next to Secretary of Navy Frank Knox in 1943. In American war politics, treason gets the medal and protest gets treason.

Frustrated and disgusted, Captain Kirk left his post and sought the sea duty he needed to become an admiral, later rendering distinguished service in Europe.

The situation in the Office of Naval Intelligence was purposefully confused in 1941. By the end of October 1941 there had been four successive chiefs of the organisation (Captains Anderson, James, Kirk and Wilkinson). Amongst the Office of Naval Intelligence this came to be known as "the October Revolution".[35]

There was an attempt to record that Captain Kirk had left his post as Director of Office of Naval Intelligence before 9 October 1941 by falsifying the 1941 Naval Intelligence records. This was similar to the cover-up of the Jack the Ripper murders, but eight times faster. Such events can only be directed from the highest levels of self-espionage.

On top of this there was a rapid turnover of Commander-in-Chief, United States Fleet with eight commanders in 10 years, six of them lasting an average of 10 months.

It has never been adequately explained why these Bomb Plot messages were not sent to Hawaii by the Washington authorities to be used by Kimmel and Short to prepare for the Japanese attack – except in the light of American political and naval self-sabotage.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

In 1962, Captain Kirk (retired) was living in New York. Author and historian Harry Elmer Barnes (American) made an appointment to interview Kirk, but Kirk delayed (he said "for full preparation" – yeah right!) and was quickly appointed as the American ambassador to Formosa (Taiwan). Captain Kirk swiftly retired (due to ill health) and then died.

Those who hold secrets are promoted and those who waver on their secrets are killed. Captain Kirk's death was certainly timely.

The same self-sabotage occurred in other levels of military intelligence. The army also obtained these messages and were impressed and alarmed. Chief of the Far Eastern section of Military Intelligence, Colonel Rufus S. Bratton delivered the original (9 October 1941) Bomb Plot message to Secretary of War Stimson, General Marshall and Chief of the War Plans division of the Army, General Leonard T. Gerow.

[35] Harry Elmer Barnes, Pearl Harbor After a Quarter of a Century, p. 29.

These messages were discussed by officers in Military Intelligence and the Signal Corps. They recognised the need to send them to General Short at Fort Shafter in Hawaii but they had the same problem as the Office of Naval Intelligence (ONI). They could not get the message past General Marshall to General Short.

General George Catlett Marshall was also responsible for the slow transmission of the Bomb Plot messages from MS5 at Fort Shafter to Washington, having them sent by China Clipper (every two weeks by sea) or by ordinary boat mail, when they should have been sent immediately by cablegram or RCA radiogram.

AIRRAID ON REARLHARBOR X THIS IS NO DRILL

The American High Command refused to give General Short and Admiral Kimmel the vitally important Bomb Plot messages. General Short and Admiral Kimmel were both victims of a 'self-sabotage delayed information programme' that ensured the American Fleet would be attacked at Pearl Harbor.

The Americans had decrypted the J-19 and PA-K2 diplomatic codes very early on in the piece. They had also broken the secret Japanese diplomatic code by May 1940 and the Japanese Purple diplomatic code by mid-August 1940.

The day after Pearl Harbor, President Roosevelt delivered his "Day of Infamy" oration (8 December 1941). The legends and rhetoric of that day still ring in American minds, but half of those minds remain ignorant of their President's self-sabotage to include America in WWII, and even fewer realise it was the model used for the 9-11 attack on the Twin Towers.

US President F. D. Roosevelt.

US President G. W. Bush.

Thomas E. Dewey, the Republican candidate for the American presidency in the 1944 election, obtained information from research and security leaks that President Roosevelt (1933–45) had been reading the intercepted Japanese diplomatic messages in all codes, including the most secret Purple code, and was aware of the threat of a Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor from 26 November 1941 (11 days' notice). President Roosevelt failed to warn the Pearl Harbor commanders General Walter C. Short and Admiral Husband E. Kimmel, and any warnings he did give were cryptic, through known saboteur channels, and with insufficient notice to act.

Dewey considered presenting these vital facts in a major campaign speech (1944). Roosevelt learned of this through his Democratic spies in Republican HQ. He had General George C. Marshall (Freemason) send Colonel Carter W. Clarke to warn (and quietly threaten) Dewey (Freemason) on two occasions.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 Mar

On behalf of Roosevelt (Freemason), Clarke demanded that Dewey (Freemason) not refer to Pearl Harbor during his election campaign. He was to abandon any public revelation of Pearl Harbor as it would endanger the war effort by revealing that America could have deciphered the Japanese codes quicker than the Japanese Embassy in Washington.

The Japanese already knew the Americans could decipher all of their codes eight months before (April 1941, courtesy of the Germans) but chose to stick with them anyway. This is called complicity in war. Dewey did not know this at the time, and with patriotic silence, withdrew the speech that would have won him the election and made Thomas E. Dewey the American President during the latter part of WWII.[36] Dewey later found out that the Japanese had changed their codes long before the timing of his 1944 speech. Thomas E. Dewey was not called to testify in the Congressional Pearl Harbor investigation.

Churchill could break the enigma codes from 1939 courtesy of the Czechs, who got the codes off the Germans and gave them to the Poles prior to WWII. (The Czechs often blame the Poles, even for their successes.)

The British had broken the German "Enigma" codes and could read the Japanese "Purple" code. Churchill read the Japanese messages but considered Roosevelt's team a possible security risk. By 'security risk' Churchill considered that if too many 'others' knew of Roosevelt's knowledge of the impending Japanese attack, then the US would be forced to intervene in Britain's 16-year plan to attack America and America would be forced to protect itself, if only to save face.

To ensure Hawaii's ignorance, their assigned code-breaking machines were given to Britain as spares. America deciphered its own messages separately. Hawaii had no ability to get its own intelligence and relied on strategically filtered knowledge from the mainland – essentially no intelligence from The Atlantic Charter (9 August 1941) to the Pearl Harbor attack (7 December 1941) from either Britain or the American mainland. Hawaii was in an intelligence blackout for four months preceding the attack.

Without the attack on Hawaii, Britain would have lost the war, or at best reached a stalemate. The Western world would be speaking German and the Pacific would be speaking Japanese. At the turn of the century, places like New York were already speaking 50:50 German/English.

> To the bankers, WWII was a competition of industry and resources. For the front-line military it was a battle for cultural dominance, language rights and communism over fascism. The commoners won and got communism. The oligarchy won and got fascism. Thus we have a fascist oligarchy ruling over communist masses.

Churchill pacified Roosevelt by misleading him with outright lies. He said that Japan would attack Singapore first. Churchill knew the Japanese had the Bywater plan which showed Pearl Harbor was to be attacked first. The Bywater plan was produced when Churchill was Chancellor of the Exchequer and planning war against America. With Pearl Harbor, Churchill had all his Christmases at once. Roosevelt further sugar-coated Churchill's Christmas gift by doing everything possible to assist Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor. What do you expect. They were both Freemasons enacting their motto "ORDER OUT OF CHAOS".

When Bywater wrote Sea Power in the Pacific: A Study of the American-Japanese Naval Problem (1921) it was an immediate sellout among Japanese and American Navy General Staff who studied it line by line. The US Naval Institute's Proceedings magazine called it "the most important recent estimate of the situation . . . in the Pacific". It was so 'considered' that it set a special 5:5:3 tonnage ratio between America, Britain and Japan on 15 December 1921 at the Washington Disarmament Treaty.

Japan agreed to the Washington Disarmament Treaty on the condition that America did not fortify west of Hawaii and Guam could not be a refuelling point. This proved crucial to Pearl Harbor's demise. Bywater pointed out that this was a calamitous error giving Japan overwhelming advantage. America ignored Bywater's advice and the American Navy resorted to island-hopping in order to refuel.

After Bywater wrote The Great Pacific War (1925), he was recognised as the Pacific War prophet. Although it was written as a novel, American and Japanese senior naval planners studied this book line by line as well. It caused a total rewrite of the Pacific naval War Plan Orange in 1926 to fit Bywater's island-hopping-to-refuel requirement and it inspired Japanese naval planners to believe that they could easily take over the Pacific with near impunity.

> What Japan didn't count on was that its coastal cities were vulnerable to air attack. America knew this, didn't attack Japanese cities at all (Hiroshima) but waited until the war was 'over' and Japan had offered surrender before America tested their nuclear bombs on live populations in real scenario cities.

But what really struck a chord was that the Assistant Secretary of the US Navy picked a fight with Bywater in print (late 1921) after the book was published and after the Washington Disarmament Treaty. He denied that there would ever be a war between the US and Japan, and he was the only one to do so. Bywater considered him a pacifist, a pacifist who later became President Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

President Roosevelt was a warring president who fronted as a peace activist, as so many warring leaders do (another fake in a wheelchair). President Roosevelt was the major reason why Pearl Harbor happened and the main reason why 2638 lives were lost. Mind you, he had a lot of help from the equally warring Winston Spencer Windsor Churchill.

> Pearl Harbor was Britain's 1929 war against America. It arrived 12 years late and was blamed on the Japanese, who had every British assistance, including Operation SUBEND.

If that wasn't dirty enough, Hector C. Bywater was killed 16 months before Pearl Harbor at the age of 55. He was supposedly found in bed alone at his home in London, sometime between 16 and 17 August 1940 and was declared the victim of acute alcoholism. The physicians didn't check for any other cause and he was immediately cremated. Modern investigation techniques and circumstantial evidence suggest he was murdered by poison. The order came from the Japanese High Command[37] and was administered with British complicity.

Churchill had already been involved in many assassinations and Hector C. Bywater had a very good chance of sabotaging Churchill's efforts to bring America into the war, all the more so if he were alive. Some of Churchill's assassinations were Lord Rothermere (1940), Hector C. Bywater (1940), Neville Chamberlain (1941); the 22nd Earl of Erroll (1943) and Sir Harry Oakes (1943); and he jailed hundreds of others.

> The one man who knew all of Japan's plans for Pearl Harbor and America's dedication to ignoring it was killed in the build-up to Pearl Harbor. The Lusitania, Pearl Harbor and 9-11 all get protection under the umbrella of American self-sabotage – 'deny, obscure, cover up' – 1915, 1941 and 2001 are all very questionable years for American patriotism.

Timeline: The Immediate Build-up (Nov./Dec. 1941)

On 5 November 1941, Tokyo informed the Japanese embassy at Washington that negotiations must be satisfactorily concluded by 25 November. This was a fair indication that the Japanese task force was to leave the Kurile Islands for Pearl Harbor the next day if negotiations were broken off, which they were, by President Roosevelt. The Japanese had orders to return if negotiations were resumed.

On 15 November 1941 at 10.15 am, General George Catlett Marshall addressed a "secret press briefing" in his office in the Munitions Building in Washington. His invited press included Robert Sherrod (Time), Ernest Lindley (Newsweek), Charles Hurd (New York Times), Bert Andrews (New York Herald Tribune), Lyle Wilson (United Press), [37] William H. Honan, chief cultural correspondent for the New York Times, sourced from Raymond L. Puffer, Air Force History Program, Los Angeles, Reed Business Information Inc.

Edward Bomar (Associated Press), and Harold Slater (International News Service).[38] General George C. Marshall then offered them all an opportunity to leave for anyone who could not keep their lips buttoned. No one left.

The meeting did not include radio news reporters, nor did it include General Short or Admiral Kimmel, who were in charge of naval operations in Hawaii, nor were they briefed before or after.

General Marshall told the press: "The US can read Japan's coded radio messages." The seven press agents then kept this information secret from any who could benefit, including the 3816 who were killed or injured. This made the press, both print media and wireless, colluders in the Pearl Harbor attack and helped to maintain their silence through time.

What General Marshall didn't tell them was that Naval Intelligence had cracked the Japanese codes in the fall of 1940 and Nagumo's first radio broadcast was intercepted on 22 April 1941, eight months before the Pearl Harbor attack. This backs up Lt.Col. Clifford M. Andrew's claim that he had been assigned to "prepare for the attack" at least nine months prior.

On 14 November: Tokyo informed the Japanese Consul in Hong Kong that Japan would declare war on the US and Great Britain if the US negotiations failed.

On 11, 15 and 16 November 1941: Tokyo repeated to the Japanese ambassador in Washington that the deadline for completing negotiations with the United States was 25 November.

On 22 November 1941: This deadline was extended to 29 November, the point of no return for the Japanese fleet. After 29 November "things are automatically going to happen".[39]

On 25 November 1941: President Roosevelt announced to his War Cabinet that "an attack was expected perhaps as soon as next Monday [1 December 1941]". Even this was kept from Admiral Kimmel, who had this crucial data removed from any TESTM dispatches sent to him.

The same day (10 days after the secret press briefing): Admiral Kimmel received a briefing that a massive Japanese force of fleet subs and long-range patrol aircraft would reach Hawaii in the beginning of December.

On 27 November 1941: Six Japanese aircraft carriers and 30 Japanese submarines set sail for Pearl Harbor (26 November Japanese time).

On 27/28 November: Tokyo informed the Japanese embassy in Washington that Secretary of State Hull's ultimatum of 26 November was entirely unsatisfactory and Japan wouldn't negotiate any further.

On 27 November: Hull said that he knew his ultimatum meant war and that henceforth affairs between the United States and Japan were in the hands of the Secretary of War (Stimson) and the Secretary of the Navy (Knox), both of whom were under the control of the publicly peaceful/privately warring President Roosevelt.

On 28 November 1941: Admiral Stark gave Admiral Kimmel explicit orders to "Undertake no offensive action until Japan has committed an overt act". Kimmel followed these orders.

On 30 November 1941: Tokyo informed Germany that negotiations with the US had ended.

On 27, 28, 30 November, 1 December 1941: Tokyo wired the Japanese embassy in Washington warning them not to reveal that negotiations were over, but to stretch them out. The Japanese then sent extensive convoys and task forces southward as a distraction from Pearl Harbor.

5 December 1941: Because of the British/Dutch/US ABCD agreement and Rainbow 5, this south-moving Japanese traffic meant war between Japan and America two days before Pearl Harbor, but America did not react. They were waiting to retaliate.

White man tends to go to war when his integrity is impugned, not when there is a transgression over his boundary. To the white man, a transgression over a boundary is cause for negotiation, and negotiations would not have swung the American polls into a four-year-long dedicated war effort.

On 6 December 1941 the Japanese got the dateline wrong and attacked Malaya a day before Pearl Harbor. The British kept quiet about this as well and did not tell the Americans until the following day.

General Short was kept in the dark from July 1941. Admirals Kimmel and Short did not know about the details of the Japanese–American diplomatic negotiations from August 1941. They were not informed that the Secretary of State had sent an ultimatum to Japan on 26 November, nor that Japan had warned negotiations were to cease by 29 November if no peace settlement was agreed. Admirals Kimmel and Short knew nothing of the south-moving fleet. They were kept totally in the dark.

Japan usually made its surprise attacks on weekends, when the opposition was relaxing and off guard. When Japan did not attack on 30 November there was special apprehension in Washington that it might come on 7 December, but no contingency plans were made, nor were Admiral Kimmel and General Short warned of the probability.

19 November 1941: On the J-19 diplomatic code (which America had been reading all year) the Japanese announced they were setting up their Winds System – "East Wind Rain" (war on the US), "West Wind Clear" (war on Great Britain), "North Wind Cloudy" (war on Russia). This was executed on 4 December 1941.

1, 2 December 1941: Tokyo ordered its main embassies (except Washington) to destroy their main code machines, including the Purple code machine, and to burn all their documents. Document destruction of this scale only happens before war.

Japan's Purple code machine in Washington was retained until 7 December so Tokyo could keep in touch with the Japanese embassy in order to transmit the last 'peaceful' communication in full to Hull.

On 4 December 1941, Japan transmitted the "Winds Execute" message in plain Japanese Morse code with no codes involved. This was picked up by the naval monitoring station in Cheltenham, Maryland at 8.00 am. It said "East Wind Rain, West Wind Clear", meaning war on America and Great Britain, but not Russia.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

In America's effort to cover up their complicity in the Pearl Harbor attack, this "Winds Execute" message was denied and all copies were destroyed. The last copy was seen by Commander Laurence F. Safford when Commander Kramer was assembling documents for the Roberts Commission a week after the Pearl Harbor attack.

Chief of the Security Division of Naval Communications, Safford identified 14 people who had seen the message including Admiral Thomas C. Hart, Commander of the Asiatic fleet and Acting Chief of the Army Signal Corps, and Colonel Otis K. Sadtler. Both the army and the navy were aware of this message at the time.

July to October 1944: The Naval Court of Inquiry established beyond any doubt that the "Winds Execute" message was received on 4 December. The Army Pearl Harbor Board investigation and the Clarke Inquiries also confirmed that army authorities knew the navy had intercepted the Winds Execute message on 4 December. They were all in on it, all in denial, and all covering up. This was a disgusting piece of peace sabotage.

4 December: The Chicago Tribune published the implications of Rainbow 5 and revealed Roosevelt's deception that he promised not to go to war unless attacked. The Japanese travelling along a certain line was enough. At virtually the same time, the Japanese Navy crossed that line and President Roosevelt did not retaliate. The Chicago Tribune was a challenging but embedded newspaper and bought Roosevelt the required three days' grace before Pearl Harbor occurred. This was a Magic Op.

The thirteen-part message was delivered on the evening of 6 December to army officers, army military intelligence, navy officers (except for Stark who was at a theatre), the Far East section of Naval Communications (which covers Pearl Harbor) and to Colonel Walter Bedell Smith (Marshall's secretary), but he could not find General Marshall, who was the man who would officially present the message to President Roosevelt. Crucial links in the chain were conveniently missing. Even the Japanese played a part by delaying the 14th part of the message.

The final 14th part of the message (also in English) arrived during the night of 6 December and was decoded and ready for distribution 5.00–7.30 am 7 December 1941. It confirmed that negotiations between Japan and the United States were over. It ordered that the Japanese ambassador Admiral Nomura and his associate Kurusu deliver the full 14-part reply to Secretary Hull in person at 1.00 pm Washington time, about 7.30 am Pearl Harbor time. The attack occured just after at 7.50 am. Twenty minutes was never going to be enough time to prepare. This was just enough time for orders to be made and pilots to man their planes.

When General Marshall learnt that Washington was receiving the Japanese 13-part reply ending all peace negotiations, he should have warned General Short and spent the night discussing battle strategies with him.

Instead General Marshall abruptly left his office in the old Munitions

General Marshall.

Building (Saturday afternoon in Washington) and went into hiding. Legend has it he rose at a leisurely hour on the morning of 7 December and went horse-riding when he knew the Japanese were about to attack. He had achieved his goal. General Marshall's job was over. He had successfully brought America into WWII in exchange for ignoring all his military protocols. Horse-riding for the warring General Marshall was the equivalent to smoking a cigar.

Legend would also have it that when General Marshall returned from his horse ride he was summoned by Colonel Bratton to his office, arriving around 11.25 am to read the 14-part Japanese reply and the Time of Delivery message to Hull – allegedly for the first time. According to associates in his office he immediately exclaimed "This means immediate war!"

General Marshall sent a warning, not marked urgent, to General Short at 11.50 am but chose a slow path via Western Union to San Francisco, and from there by RCA to Hawaii. It was not put on the RCA wires until 12.17 am. General Short received General Marshall's non-urgent message of impending war after the attacking Japanese planes had returned to their aircraft carriers.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

What really happened was even worse. General Marshall's lack of precise knowledge as to where he was from mid-afternoon 6 December to the morning of 7 December is more accurately explained as follows:

1. According to Commander McCollum (under oath), General Marshall (with a military aide) went to Admiral Stark's office about 9 am 7 December 1941. Here General Marshall, Admirals Stark, Noyes, McCollum, Wilkinson, and Stark's aides discussed the 14-part Time of Delivery messages. They formulated the message General Marshall would send to General Short and decided that it should also be handed to General Kimmel.
2. After General Marshall left Admiral Stark's office, he was seen in his office around 10 am by Colonel John R. Deane. Colonel Deane was the aide to Colonel Walter Bedell Smith who was General Marshall's secretary at the time. General Marshall delayed sending this message for nearly two hours (11.50 am).
3. General Marshall should have used the scrambler telephone connection with General Short or the more powerful navy and FBI transmitters, both of which were offered to him. Instead, he delayed sending the message, sent the wrong message, and sent it too slow to be of any use. As a result, this was dubbed the "too-little-and-too-late" message.
4. General Marshall's message: "Japanese are presenting at one p.m. Eastern Standard Time what amounts to an ultimatum also they are under orders to destroy their Code machine immediately. Just what significance the hour set may have we do not know but be on the alert accordingly. Inform naval authorities of this communication."

This is the most understated and confused message in the history of war. It is an alarm for self-sabotage. Commander Hiles has since stated the reality clearly: "A genuine, forthright, and honestly inspired war warning can be expressed most lucidly, concisely, intelligently and forcibly in one sentence – the shorter the better. The warnings to Short and Kimmel were lacking in all these virtues. They were probably the most profuse collection of misleading verbiage ever to grace two military messages that purported to warn two important field commanders of a war already known in Washington to be a fait accompli."[40] It should have been formulated more like the message below.

General Marshall's message should have been sent on 27 November or at least by 3.30 am Pearl Harbor time. It shoud have read: "Japan attacking Pearl Harbor today, prior to 7.30 am Pearl Harbor time. We have received their ultimatum for war. They have destroyed all their codebreakers and diplomatic papers. High alert immediately. Scatter all ships and planes. Prepare for immediate battle. This is not a drill. Best of luck."

On 17 June 1940, General Marshall had ordered Commander Herron of the Hawaiian District to create a practice alert to impress the Japanese: "Immediately alert complete defensive organization to deal with possible trans-Pacific raid."

General Marshall needed to be well informed about the Time of Delivery message, whether he was to do his duty or practise clever deception. The only reason General Marshall had an early Sunday morning meeting with General Short was to discuss the Time of Delivery messages.

> Harry Elmer Barnes: "The only reasonable motive for Marshall's disappearance would have been to make himself inaccessible to those who might plead with him to send a warning to Short and Kimmel."[41]

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

To back this up, any who wanted to speak out were placed under military house arrest from Saturday morning "until after the blitz". "Three Army generals determined a standdown from 8 pm Saturday 6 December to 11 am Sunday 7 December 1941."[42] This was confirmed by their testimonies when none of them could remember where they were during this time.

General Marshall summoned all privy officers into a locked room. He shook everyone's hand and told them that the facts relating to the events of 6–7 December and associated developments [surprise attack on Pearl Harbor] must remain secret.

General Marshall: "Gentlemen, this goes to the grave with us."

Two weeks after Pearl Harbor, the Navy classified all documents TOP SECRET. All radio operators and cryptographers were gagged on threat of imprisonment and loss of all benefits. Navy Director of Communications Rear Admiral Leigh Noyes then sent a memo ordering all commanders, "Destroy all notes or anything in writing".[43] Army Intelligence in Honolulu then burnt 40 file cabinets full of documents.

Throughout the nine official Pearl Harbor investigations over 60 years, no radio broadcasts were presented, not even at the Congressional hearings. However, one of those present spoke to the eminent historian Harry Elmer Barnes. As a consequence, "Most of the documentation supporting the traditional story has been destroyed or kept a close secret."[44]

General Marshall's actions demonstrated careless and callous indifference to his official duties and were sufficient to justify his immediate dismissal from the office as Army Chief-of-Staff. This did not happen. Instead Marshall was promoted, and others like Admiral Kimmel and General Walter Short in Honolulu were purposely kept in the dark, blamed for "failing to anticipate" the attack, and were not exonerated of the charge of "dereliction of duty" until 1999, when the Senate developed a conscience.

On 17 December, Chief of Military Intelligence General Sherman Miles prepared an honest account of what went on in General Marshall's office on the morning of 7 December and presented it to General Marshall. General Marshall reacted furiously and banished the Chief of Military Intelligence to the post of Military Observer in Brazil. He allowed him to stay in military service on condition that he made no further revelations.

The Kita message, essentially ready for distribution by 2.30 pm 6 December 1941 left nothing to guesswork. Kita's complex system of signals to the approaching Japanese task force was to end on the night of 6 December. This clearly implied that the task force was expected to organise off Oahu that night in order to ready itself for their attack the next morning.

Overwhelming evidence from the National Archives shows that Yamamoto and commanders of his task force warships broke radio silence and their warships were located by American communication intelligence units. The Japanese did not maintain radio silence. It was the American and Allies' use of embedded historians who wrote this into history to 'give the Pearl Harbor surprise further weight'.[45]

By Monday 1 December 1941 it was probable that war with Japan was about to start somewhere. The American fleet continued with its programme of manoeuvres 500 nautical miles southeast of Honolulu (out of gunshot-hearing range), with the Japanese planning to attack Hawaii from the north. It was known to the Japanese that the American fleet left Pearl Harbor on exercises from Tuesday to Friday (4 days) and Friday to Saturday week (8 days). The American fleet was fartherest away on Sundays and was not able to retaliate from such a distance.[46]

US Fleet on programmed maneouvres 500 miles southeast of Pearl Harbor.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

On Monday 1 December 1941, Japanese ministers signed the documents declaring war, and Emperor Hirohito signed them a few hours later. With this knowledge from their spies in the Japanese government, the British put Malaya on full alert and the Admiralty in London suggested that Admiral Phillips take his fleet out of Singapore and on a short cruise in the east waters – to avoid attack from unexpected air raids.

On Tuesday 2 December 1941, Japanese Foreign Minister Togo sent a message to all Japanese consulates and embassies in the United States demanding that they destroy all codes and secret documents.

The same day, British battleships arrived in Singapore and American planes spotted 12 Japanese submarines off the French Indochina coast heading south towards Singapore. Intelligence reports note there was not a single Japanese merchant vessel on the whole Pacific, Atlantic or Indian Oceans, but there were 21 large transport ships at anchorage north of Saigon, with 180 planes on the airfields in the south of French Indochina. Nearly half were heavy bombers.

---

[46] The source for these dates 1–7 December is taken from Chronology of the Dutch East Indies, December 1941 website.

Regardless of this knowledge, the American fleet in Hawaii set sail (Tuesday 2 December) heading southeast for practice manoeuvres, with the Japanese fleet approaching Hawaii from the northwest.

On Wednesday 3 December 1941 only the battleships USS Oklahoma, USS Nevada and USS Enterprise were in port at Honolulu. The USS Enterprise soon left for Wake Island. The Japanese fleet was now 1300 nautical miles northwest of Hawaii.

By Thurday 4 December 1941 three divisions of Japanese troops were in the South China Sea sailing to invade Malaya and Siam. The Americans picked up the "East Wind Rain" message at 8.00 am –"Higashi no kaze ame". It was now certain Japan would attack the United States.

On Friday 5 December 1941 the British started moving their ships out of Singapore. The HMS Repulse, the HMAS Vampire and the HMS Tenedos set sail from Singapore and headed for Darwin, Australia.

By the morning of Friday 5 December the American aircraft carrier USS Lexington (CV-2) and escort ships left Pearl Harbor for Midway Island carrying 18 light bombers. The USS Enterprise (CV-6) and escort ships approached Wake Island carrying a Marine Fighter Squadron of Wildcats. The heavy cruiser USS Indianapolis and five destroyers left for Johnston Island "to test the performance of the Higgins landing boat on coral reefs". The USS Saratago lay on repairs in San Diego.

On Friday 5 December, Tokyo sent its last vital radio message. This was intercepted by both the US and British. In Purple code it directed the commander of the Japanese task force, Admiral Chiuchi Nagumo, to "Climb Mount Niitaka"– meaning 'proceed to Pearl Harbor without delay or interruption, unless negotiations resumed'.[47]

On Saturday 6 December 1941 an Australian reconnaissance pilot ex-Malaya sighted a Japanese convoy of 28 transport ships, plus a battleship, 5 cruisers and 7 destroyers leaving their anchorage at Saigon in French Indochina intended for Malaya and/or Thailand (still neutral at the time). This was reported to Admirals Hart and Phillips in Manila.

British planes received orders to go on patrol missions and recon flights but the weather changed for the worse and no British reconnaissance flights were made. The HMS Repulse was ordered to return back to Singapore and four American destroyers in Balikpapan were ordered to sail out.

[47] Mount Niitika Yama Nabore was the highest mountain in Japan at the time. It is now in the area of Taiwan, then called Formosa, which meant 'beautiful'.

There was a fair bit of juggling going on. The ships in port were to be hit (British), and the ships at sea (American) should have been intercepting the Japanese convoy, but failed to do so. Instead, the American destroyers maintained a radio silence ensuring the attack on Pearl Harbor went ahead unobstructed.

The American Army Air Force had no intention of helping British ships during the Japanese attack and were planning to use them as cannon fodder. An RAF officer told the Admiral in charge of the British Task Force Z, "You've never been air-minded, Tom. Don't wake up in the Pacific and start screaming for help."

Spymaster: "This was a form of final warning given to a condemned man. Unfortunately the condemned man was a high-ranking naval officer with his head firmly stuck up his own arse, so he dismissed it. When he saw the Japanese naval aircraft and the first bombs started dropping and he could see with his own eyes that the bombs were chained together, he must have shit himself. If one bomb hits the target, it drags the other one in. This was not a five-minute extemporised measure from the Japanese. It was the result of much naval planning."

The attacking Japanese fleet increased its speed to 25 knots. At 9.00 pm on Saturday 6 December 1941 they reach their destination, the 158th meridian, 490 nautical miles north of Hawaii. During their entire 10-day journey the Japanese encountered no ships and no resistance. The only vessel that spotted them, the Dutch submarine K-XVII, was blown up by the British using the 17-year-old Brevet officer Chris Creighton, who, before the end of the war, would become James Bond II. His naval control officer was James Bond I – Ian Fleming.[48]

The last report transmitted by Nagoa Kita (the Japanese Consul-General in Honolulu) listed 9 battleships, 3 light cruisers, 3 submarine tenders and 17 destroyers at anchor, with 4 light cruisers and 2 destroyers lying in the docks. The American heavy cruisers and airplane carriers had left Honolulu and no air reconnaissance was being conducted by the American fleet air arm.

On 7 December 1941, Khota Baru in Malaya was invaded two hours before Pearl Harbor and the British were told to keep quiet.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

According to what the Spymaster was told, the attack actually began the day before, with the dateline providing the required confusion. On the beach, the British sent out signals for help but these signals were jammed by other British units in the know.

By the morning of 7 December 1941 there was an impressive accumulation of evidence of certain war with Japan only a few hours away and every probability the attack would be at Pearl Harbor.

Despite the mandatory protocol for a clear and definite warning to General Short and Admiral Kimmel, this was not done. They should have been told of the negotiations with Japan in November 1941, and warned of Tojo's deadlines (26 & 29 November). Admiral Kimmel and General Short remained entirely without warning from their collective intelligence superiors. This is called an Intelligence Involved Coup (I2C, eyes too see).

General Short, like General Marshall, was one of the few important generals who was not a West Point graduate. Short had been promoted and placed in charge of the Army establishment in Hawaii by General Marshall, and they were personal friends. General Short had every reason to believe General Marshall would keep him informed.

Pearl Harbor was always "a damned mouse trap" for the American navy, and General Short had made demands for material and equipment to complete the defensive installations. These were refused by Washington. General Short also demanded planes for reconnaissance and defence against a Japanese bombing attack. He only received a fraction of these. General Short also received no information about Japanese Purple diplomatic code intercepts after the end of July 1941 when further economic measures were taken against Japan.

Admiral Kimmel had even more personal and career reasons to believe he would not be double-crossed or blacked out by Washington. He had been an aide to Roosevelt when Roosevelt was the Assistant Secretary of the Navy under President Woodrow Wilson, and Kimmel remained on good terms with Roosevelt.

Admiral Kimmel was also a very close friend of Admiral Stark, who was then Chief of Naval Operations, the supreme authority over naval affairs.

Soon after Kimmel succeeded Admiral Richardson as commander of the Pacific fleet, Kimmel wrote to Admiral Stark in February 1941 expecting to be sent all relevant information collected by Naval Communications and the Office of Naval Intelligence. In March 1941, Admiral Stark promised this and Captain Kirk (Director of ONI) understood this to be one of his most important duties.

In June 1941, Admiral Kimmel went to Washington and had a long talk with Admiral Stark, who confirmed that he would be furnished with full information about any and all developments for Pearl Harbor by the most rapid and secure methods available. But Admirals Turner and Stark blocked this information as soon as the first Bomb Plot intercept was decoded in early October 1941. As a result, Captain Kirk resigned as head of the Office of Naval Intelligence and Admirals Kimmel and Stark were kept in the dark.

Admiral Turner, chief of Naval War Plans, was an arrogant, conceited, overbearing and opinionated bully who regarded his own opinions as more reliable than fact. He dominated the genial and modest Admiral Stark. Admiral Turner overrode Admiral Stark to the extent that he was virtually in charge of the American Navy in the Pacific.

> Admiral Beatty, aide to Secretary Knox: “At many top naval conferences, when Stark was asked a question, Turner would often answer on his behalf” – shades of the Cheney/Bush relationship and then the Rice/Bush relationship.[49]

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

“There is no doubt that [Admiral Richmond Kelley] Turner did more than anybody else in the Navy to prevent the Bomb Plot messages from getting to Kimmel and to frustrate the efforts of Commander McCollum to warn Kimmel decisively in the days immediately before the Pearl Harbor attack. How far he was directly influenced by Roosevelt in this is not revealed in the documents.”[50]

Admiral Turner continually belaboured the point that Japan was going to attack Siberia first. This is like saying the Muslims are going to attack a field in the Midwest before New York.

Admiral Stark backed Kimmel up in this and stressed the same to him right down to the wire (December 1941). On occasions, Admiral Stark mentioned the negotiations with Japan but would never go into detail, offering the excuse that the source was Magic Operations and he always maintained he was not allowed to divulge any of it.

---

[49] Pearl Harbor After a Quarter of a Century, p. 44, slightly paraphrased.

[50] Ibid., p. 44.

In June 1961, Admiral Stark confessed to two college professors (Paul Burtness and Warren Ober) that he had to swear an “horrendous oath” superseding all other oaths “never to divulge the existence or contents of these Magic operations”.[51]

> Magic Ops were acts of self-sabotage to get America into WWII including other anti-patriotic activities which still continue to this day. Since America has such a huge military-industrial complex it often kidnaps, wounds and kills its own citizens and soldiers to either start a war or keep it going. The 2003–08 Iraq war is a case in point.
> Self-sabotage is the nature of Magic Ops and Magic Ops always involves self-sabotage.

In the summer of 1941, Pearl Harbor was denied a Purple machine to translate the Japanese intercepts. The Purple decoder designated for Pearl Harbor was instead sent to London as a spare.

London now had three Purple machines and Pearl Harbor had none.

Admiral Kimmel believed he was getting all the intercepts but he never received any details of Japanese–American negotiations nor any diplomatic messages in the Purple code after Churchill met Roosevelt at Argentia off the coast of Newfoundland on 9–12 August 1941.

By 4 December 1941, Admiral Stark was hogtied by President Roosevelt’s order that all warnings to Pearl Harbor must be cleared through General Marshall. It was likely that President Roosevelt reminded Admiral Stark of this by phone on the night of 6 December and the morning of 7 December.

Admiral Kimmel and General Short were not privy to such Japanese statements as the “ending of diplomatic negotiations”. As such, they were never alarmed.

Kimmel and Short were not even sent the Bomb Plot messages obtained between 24 September and 7 December 1941 even though they were received in the easily read J-l9 and PA-K2 codes.

If he were assigned this duty, these could easily have been deciphered by Commander Joseph J. Rochefort, a talented and experienced cryptanalyst and Communications Intelligence officer working under Admiral Bloch. Rochefort was a master of the Japanese language and one of the very best cryptanalysts in the Navy.

---

[51] Pearl Harbor After a Quarter of a Century, p. 44.

It was customary for cryptanalyst specialists to stick to their own assignments, but Commander Rochefort was kept very busy doing research work on Japanese naval codes, direction-finding and traffic analysis, which were all beneath his station. As a result, Rochefort did not even know MS5 existed.

Most of the Bomb Plot messages were picked up by the Army Signal Corps station, MS5, at Fort Shafter, near Honolulu. These were General Short's army headquarters but the station was actually controlled and operated by Colonel Carroll A. Powell, who had no personnel capable of decoding or translating these Bomb Plot messages. Colonel Powell operated under the Army Signal Corps in Washington.

General Short did not know what MS5 was doing and automatically assumed that if it received anything significant to Pearl Harbor it would be relayed to him via Washington. Admiral Kimmel was even more in the dark than General Short and also did not know MS5 existed.

If the experienced cryptanalyst and Communications Intelligence officer Commander Joseph J. Rochefort had received the J-19 and PA-K2 messages that carried the Bomb Plot material and the diplomatic Purple code messages (which added weight to the Bomb Plot messages), he would have turned them over to Admiral Kimmel and General Short, who would have taken defensive actions long before 25 November 1941. The Japanese would have turned back and America would have had to find other means to enter WWII – like bomb the Japanese ships at sea when they were over the demarcated ABCD line, southward of 100° East or 10° North, and then bomb the vulnerable Japanese coastal cities, much of which was still made of paper.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Some of the Purple material was intercepted at MS5 and transmitted to Washington but it was never relayed back to Pearl Harbor. Conveniently, Pearl Harbor was denied the Purple decoder in favour of the British, who had them coming out of their ears. This was 'designed stupidity' from Washington Army officials with the finger specifically pointed at General Marshall.

Harry Elmer Barnes: "As a result, all the responsible personnel at Pearl Harbor completely discounted the probability of war with Japan. They arrived at this conclusion because they did not believe that Japan would be unwise enough to start a war that it could not ultimately win. The resources of the United States were so great that we would ultimately wear down Japan, even if we did not win a quick and brilliant victory. They were proved to be right about this, but not about Japan's willingness to risk defeat if they started a war."[52]

Without the crucial element of surprise, Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto's plan to attack Pearl Harbor would have been defeated. This was originally Hector C. Bywater's Plan before he and Yamamoto settled down for a night on the Scotch in the late 1920s.[53]

in order to prevent knowledge becoming war.

Although known for his excellent memory, when General George Catlett Marshall was examined by the Joint Congressional Committee Investigation (1945–46) he could not remember where he spent the night of 6 December. Marshall could not remember the most significant, critical and exciting night of his professional life. Later, in private, Marshall admitted to Senator Alben W. Barkley, the chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee Investigation:

> "I could not tell you where I was Saturday night [6 December].
> It would have got the chief [Roosevelt] into trouble."[54]

In support of his efforts ensuring Pearl Harbor went ahead, General George Catlett Marshall was voted by TIME magazine as the 1944 'Man of the Year'. This was capped off by the Nobel Peace Prize in 1953 and the Charlemagne Award on 7 May 1959. When these mistakes were pointed out by Senator Joseph McCarthy (communist hunter), General Marshall was dead within six months (16 October 1959).

Admiral Stark, Chief of Naval Operations (who had conveniently been in the theatre) got to his office after 9.00 am on 7 December 1941. The Chiefs of Naval Communications, Naval Intelligence and the Far East section of Naval Intelligence pointed out to Stark that 1.00 pm Washington was 7.30 am Pearl Harbor time and Japan would likely attack on or before this time. They attacked just before 7.50 am.

> Stark had four hours to warn Admiral Kimmel in Pearl Harbor. He could reach him within 10 minutes by fast naval transmitter, but ignored the combined Chiefs appeal. He phoned President Roosevelt instead. Roosevelt then also failed to warn Admiral Kimmel.

Japanese map of Pearl Harbor.

By 6.20 am on 7 December, 181 Japanese bombers, dive bombers, torpedo planes and zero fighters were heading towards Oahu, Hawaii.

At 6.30 am the USS Antares spotted another Japanese submarine and the Ward closed in and sank it.

At 7.05 am two American radar operators in Oahu picked up a blip of more than 50 planes bearing down on them. They reported this but were told a flight of American B-17s was expected from America. In this way, their warning message was silenced. The B-17s were on their way to the Philippines to join the 30 that had arrived in the previous week.

treasurer@platinumparty.org

This further influenced the Japanese timing and had American complicity from on high.

Only three of the 300 American planes were airborne. The other 297 were parked in close formation to make them easier to guard against sabotage from the Japanese population on Hawaii. They were parked in a circle, nose inward, so that they could not take off and retaliate. This made them sitting-duck targets for the surprise Japanese attack. (This defeatist circle pattern was passed over by Hollywood.)

US Navy Pilot Lieutenant-Commander Howard Leyland "Brigham" Young, Commanding Officer of the Enterprise Air Group [CEAG/A16/Pb/(579) At Sea] relates his Pearl Harbor experience in an affidavit (15 December 1941) which ends in a commendation for another pilot.

At 6.15 am on 7 December 1941 Lt.Cdr. Young flew off from the Enterprise which was located 215 miles west of Oahu. His mission was to search sector 085°–095° true for a distance of 150 miles (east) which would have made him completely off course for a sighting of the Japanese fleet in the northwest, and if he got the direction wrong, just short of a visible sighting. Lt.Cdr. Young then proceed to Ford Island, where, if he had seen the Japanese fleet, he had every chance of being shot down in the midst of the Japanese attack. If he wasn't shot down by the Japanese fighter planes, he would have been shot down by friendly American fire to the last 50 yards.

Pearl Harbor October 1941

At 7.20 am Lt.Cdr. Young sighted the Richfield Oil Co tanker Pat Doheny of Los Angeles which was heading east. At 7.40 am he sighted the USS Thresher and the USS Litchfield. At 8.20 am he noticed a squadron of planes circling Ewa Field and believed them to be US Army pursuit planes so he gave them a wide berth and decreased altitude to 800 feet and continued toward Ford Island Field. They were actually Jap fighters. Halfway to Pearl Harbor he encountered considerable "AA" fire ahead and was attacked from behind by Jap Zero fighters.

These were low-winged monoplanes with retractable landing gear (which makes planes 30% faster). Lt.Cdr. Young dove towards the ground zig-zagging. Neither he nor his passenger, Lt.Cdr. Nichol, had time to use the loaded guns, nor did his Enterprise Air Group wing-man, Ensign P. L. Teaff flying the USN airplane 6-S-2.

Tactical Officer Lieutenant-Commander Bromfield Nichol of the US Navy was attached to the staff of Commander Aircraft, Battle Force and was due to report to the Commander-in-Chief, Pacific Fleet immediately after arrival at Ford Island. All three were supposed to be killed and this particularly inside story was never supposed to be told.

They circled low over the cane field north of Pearl City. Not having enough fuel to return to the Enterprise, they made a low approach to Ford Island Field to land, made recognition manoeuvres and Lt.Cdr. Young placed his wheels and flaps in the landing position.

Despite this, they were subject to heavy AA fire from ships and shore until Young's wheels hit the ground. Some of this friendly fire was from guns on the ground less than 50 yards away. Young's plane suffered only a few bullet holes through the wings, which suggests either dummy bullets, untrained staff, drunken trained staff, knowledge of self-sabotage, or deliberate incompetence. Either way, there was a lack of American recognition of their own plane markings and signals.

During the approach, Lt.Cdr. Young tried to communicate with the Ford Island Field control tower but their communication power was too weak (self-sabotage). He managed to land at 8.35 am and his wing-man followed him to the last, pulling up just before landing.

From pride to fall in 30 seconds.

Pearl Harbor under attack.

Lt.Cdr. Young and Lt.Cdr. Nichol then reported to Commander-in-Chief, Pacific Fleet and informed him of the position of the Enterprise and their mission. It is not clear whether they were supposed to be reporting to Commander-in-Chief, Pacific Fleet Admiral Husband E. Kimmel (1 Feb.–17 Dec. 1941) or to Admiral Claude C. Bloch, who commanded the local Naval District at Pearl, as distinct from the Pacific Fleet at the time of the Pearl Harbor attack.

At that time, and under those circumstances, there was confusion as to who the Commander-in-Chief was. Officially, the Commander-in-Chief, Pacific Fleet was Admiral Husband E. Kimmel (59) but Rear Admiral Claude C. Bloch (63) was Commandant, Commander of the Hawaiian Naval Coastal Sea Frontier, Commandant of the Pearl Harbor Navy Yard, Commander of local defense forces, Naval Base Defense Officer, as well as the Commander of Task Force 4, United States Pacific Fleet. Having graduated from the United States Naval Academy in 1899, Bloch commanded the Plattsburg during WWI and served as Commander-in-Chief, United States Fleet (1938–6 Jan. 1940). Bloch was Commander of the local Naval District at Pearl Harbor at the time of the attack. Commander Admiral Bloch was the insider.

Rear Admiral Claude C. Bloch (1938–6 Jan. 1940) was the precursor to Admiral James Richardson (Jan. 1940–1 Feb. 1941) and Admiral Husband E. Kimmel (1 Feb.–17 Dec. 1941) but for a name change in the title from "Commander-in-Chief, United States Fleet" to "Commander-in-Chief, Pacific Fleet" which the Japanese used to full advantage.[55]

That night the Commander-in-Chief briefed Lt.Cdr. Young on his next mission (to be that night and at dawn) and there were another two concerted attempts to kill him and his entire Enterprise Air Group.

[55] The first Commander-in-Chief, Pacific Fleet had been Admiral James O. Richardson (Jan. 1940–1 Feb. 1941); followed by Admiral Husband E. Kimmel (1 Feb.–17 Dec. 1941); Fleet Admiral Chester W. Nimitz (31 Dec. 1941–24 Nov. 1945); Admiral Raymond A. Spruance (24 Nov. 1945–1 Feb. 1946); Admiral John H. Towers (1 Feb. 1946–28 Feb. 1947); Admiral Louis E. Denfeld (28 Feb.–3 Dec. 1947); Admiral DeWitt C. Ramsay (12 Jan. 1948–30 April 1949); and Admiral Arthur W. Radford (30 April 1949–10 July 1953).
In the ten years 1940–50 there were eight Commanders-in-Chief, Pacific Fleet. Apart from Admiral Nimitz and Radford they lasted an average of 10 months. None were KIA.

Lt.Cdr. Young then witnessed the Japs attack the 1010 dock and dry-dock, coming in with the easterly sun behind them. They dived at 45° to 1000 feet before releasing their 500-pound bombs. Some dived to as low as 300 feet. There were about 18 Jap planes with a far longer interval between drops than American practice. They were subject to AA attack but utilised evasive manoeuvres and despite the longer intervals no Jap planes were shot down either during their dives or escaping. It was as if the Americans were using dummy ammunition. The 1010 attack planes were low-wing monoplanes with fixed landing gear similar to the Mitsubishi Karigane Mk.II. They were yellow-silver in colour which helped them blend in with the sun behind them.

Lt.Cdr. Young: "The attack was practically perfect."

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -

Lt.Cdr. Young was then ordered to report to Ford Island (Commander Patrol Two); 13 planes of VS-6 and VB-6 planes from the Enterprise Air Group had landed safely. Lt.Cdr. Young was ordered to send nine planes out to search a section "330°–030° distance 175 miles". This was north–northwest to north–northeast and placed a minimum of 55 miles between them and the Japanese fleet 200 miles northwest.

Having motored off at full speed as soon as the last of their planes had returned to the aircraft carrier Sōryū (Kyūjitai), by 2 pm the Japanese convoy was at least 220 miles away and beyond the horizon of the Enterprise Air Group search planes.

From 1938 the Japanese had the fastest aircraft carriers, capable of 35 knots. These were based on a cruiser hull with an aircraft carrier deck plonked on top. The Sōryū was one of these and attacked the Nevada, Tennessee and West Virginia with armour-piercing bombs; then attacked the Utah, California and Raleigh with torpedoes; and then attacked grounded aircraft at Barbers Point. In the second wave, the Japanese planes off the Sōryū attacked the California, Raleigh and Kaneohe, and Naval Yard installations.

Lt.Cdr. Young's remaining four planes were to investigate reports of hostile surface ships and [ruse] sampans south of Barbers Point, and attack them with bombs and gunfire.

The only person stationed in the Ford Island Field Control Tower was a Coast Guard officer, so Lt.Cdr. Young stationed himself there in order to direct communications with the Enterprise and his planes. The Control Tower suffered from low power to the point that no communication was successful. No one could hear anything Lt.Cdr. Young was saying. He tried the telephone and the radio, but they didn't work either.

Six VF-6 airplanes left the Enterprise that night for the Ford Island Field. The lack of any communication contributed to four of them being shot down by friendly AA fire and only two landing safely. The Americans were now using real ammunition on themselves after having used 90% dummy ammunition on the Japanese.

Lt.Cdr. Young then tried to communicate with the Enterprise via the tower voice set, recommending that no more planes be sent, but even this communication failed.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

This makes for eight sets of communication failure:

1. Friendly plane markings.
2. Friendly recognition signals.
3. Ford Island Field Control Tower direct communications.
4. Ford Island Field Control Tower Telephone.
5. Ford Island Field Control Tower Radio.
6. Ford Island Field Control Tower voice set.
7. Preorganised flight paths and destination.
8. Communication between staff receiving messages and staff who needed to know.

Japanese torpedo.

The remainder of the Enterprise planes did leave the Enterprise that night, but returned to the Enterprise, no one knowing why. Perhaps enough self-sabotage had been assessed.

Young blamed much of the damage to airplanes and personnel from the Enterprise Air Group on:

1. Lack of information that hostilities had started with Japan.
2. Failed communications.
3. Inability of ground & shipboard forces to recognise friendly planes.
4. Inability of ground & shipboard forces to acknowledge friendly recognition signals.
5. No planes were equipped with armor or self-sealing tanks. When their planes were hit, either the pilot was killed, the plane caught fire, or it was ditched due to lack of fuel.
6. All guns were fully armed, but due to the surprise of the attack, they weren't able to to use them in time.
7. The suddenness and magnitude of the attack shocked both ground and ship personnel. As a result, friend-or-foe recognition was ignored and all aircraft were fired upon.

Pearl Harbor under further attack.

After four of Lt.Cdr. Young's VF-6 planes were shot down by friendly fire that night, Young received further orders to rejoin the Enterprise at sunrise the following morning (8 December 1941). Having already suffered from a total lack of communication, Young arranged every means available to notify all hands of the scheduled departure, and route to be taken to the Enterprise.

At 5.30 am their JRS utility plane took off and was immediately fired upon by American ships and shore batteries. This was friendly AA fire. The firing continued for 50 minutes then stopped. The remaining planes then took off at 6.25 am, returning to the Enterprise without further incident.

These planes were armed with 1000-pound bombs and this was the factor in the remaining VF-6 planes not being shot down overhead as they had the potential to do more damage than the Japanese. This would have embarrassed the Americans out of WWII.

Lt.Cdr. Young then commended Lieutenant C. E. Dickensen, USN, Scouting Squadron Six, having bailed out of his plane after continuous friendly fire from the ground such that his plane caught fire. Dickensen then manned another plane in the 17-mile search flight. Dickensen survived because he did not mention he had been shot down by friendly fire. Lt.Cdr. Young requested that Dickensen be given an official commendation.

Lt.Cdr. Young went on to become Commanding Officer Howard Leyland Young and led Air Group raids on the Marshall Islands, Wake Island and Marcus Islands and became the Navy Commanding Officer on the USS Ommaney Bay. He was awarded the Navy Cross for extraordinary service on 25 October 1944 at the Battle for Leyte Gulf off Samar against a powerful force of Japanese battleships, cruisers and destroyers. He inspired his air personnel in the face of overwhelming odds and turned a potential defeat into decisive victory. His Navy Cross was signed by Secretary of Navy James Forrestal.

The Japanese had a third and fourth wave of planes refuelled, loaded with bombs, and ready and waiting on deck. Admiral Nagumo refused to send these. They could have finished off the American battleships, destroyed all lighter shipping, put the airfields out of action, destroyed all communications and repair machinery, and destroyed the US Navy fuel depot in the dockyard . . . but none of this happened.

If Japan had sent their third and fourth wave of planes they would have completely destroyed America's naval strategy in the Pacific. America would have been in the war but without a means to fight in the Pacific air and Japan would have won the Pacific War on day one.

According to a Navy Pilot who was there, the marine casualties were:

Battleships

USS Arizona (BB-39): Total loss when a bomb hit her magazine.
USS Oklahoma (BB-37): Total loss, capsized and sunk in the harbor.
USS California (BB-44): Sunk at berth, later raised and repaired.
USS West Virginia (BB-48): Sunk at berth, later raised and repaired.
USS Nevada (BB-36): Beached to prevent sinking, later repaired.
USS Pennsylvania (BB-38): Light damage.
USS Maryland (BB-46): Light damage.
USS Tennessee (BB-43): Light damage.
USS Utah (AG-16): Sunk, but it was already a target practice vessel.

Cruisers

USS Raleigh (CL-7): Heavily damaged but repaired.
USS Detroit (CL-8): Light damage.
USS Helena (CL-50): Light damage.
USS Honolulu (CL-48): Light damage.
USS New Orleans (CA-32): Light damage.
USS San Francisco (CA-38): Light damage.

Destroyers

USS Downes (DD-375): Destroyed. Parts salvaged.
USS Cassin (DD-372): Destroyed. Parts salvaged.
USS Shaw (DD-373): Very heavy damage.
USS Helm (DD-388): Light damage.

Minelayer

USS Ogala (CM-4): Sunk but later raised and repaired.

Seaplane Tender

USS Curtiss (AV-4): Severely damaged but later repaired.

Repair Ship

USS Vestal (AR-4): Severely damaged but later repaired.

Harbor Tug

USS Sotoyomo (YT-9): Sunk but later raised and repaired.

Aircraft

188 Aircraft were destroyed (92 USN & 92 US Army Air Corps).

According to the same US Navy Pilot who was there, the casualties were:

US Navy	2008 KIA	710 WIA
US Army	218 KIA	364 WIA
US Marine Corp	109 KIA	69 WIA
Civilians	68 KIA	35 WIA
TOTAL	2403 KIA	1178 WIA	K/WIA 3581

As it was, 2403 Americans were killed and 1178 were injured – a total of 3581 Americans. The tally was actually higher as 235 Japanese-Americans were injured, bringing the total of those killed or wounded to 3816.[56]

Like Britain's Dunkirk, the American press was ordered not to photograph the dead or wounded at Pearl Harbor.

The number of people who knew of the Pearl Harbor cover-up as it progressed was limited to about 30. The files were all marked TOP SECRET and filled up 40 file cabinets at Army Intelligence at Honolulu. All personnel involved were subject to military court martial if they revealed their contents and two weeks after the attack all of these files were burnt.[57]

Six weeks after the Pearl Harbor attack, President Roosevelt accused the Army and Navy of dereliction of duty.

In 1949, in order to maintain silence, Undersecretary of Navy James Vincent Forrestal was thrown out of a seventh-floor window of a Bethesda hospital . . . and on 15 May 1966, Lt.Col. Clifford M. Andrew, who had received FDR's stand-down order at Military Intelligence in Hawaii, was murdered in his home in Tigard, Oregon. The bullet in the back of his head was a military-style execution.

Just hours after the Pearl Harbor attack, Hitler declared war on the United States. Hitler knew in advance that Pearl Harbor was going to happen, as did the Americans, Germans, British, and some dead Dutch. Under the Tripartite Pact, Hitler was under no obligation to declare war on America, but in doing so, he gave America the right to declare war on Germany and fully support Britain in Europe. If Hitler had not done this, America would only have been at war against Japan. Hitler was acting under direct orders from the war-makers. After all, Hitler was a Japan was also 'allowed' to attack 14 other destinations, all of them by surprise! These included: Malaya, Hong Kong, Guam, the Philippine Islands, Wake Island and Midway Island. If this is to be believed, it was the biggest 'surprise' in history, making Britain and America the most naïve countries in the world, which they weren't – they were the most devious.

The following day, 8 December 1941, America and Britain declared war on Japan. Japan replied by landing on the Gilbert Islands and occupying Bangkok the same day.

> The US Pacific fleet was ordered to stay put indefinitely in Pearl Harbor on 7 May 1940. This was against all intelligence. The Japanese had been hostile to America four years prior. They had attacked and sunk the US Gunboat Panay (PR-5) on the Yangtze River (China) on 12 December 1937, having already occupied northern China from 1931.

> Japan had joined the German and Italian Axis in the Tripartite Pact (27 September 1940) and had refocused its spy network to gather information in preparation for war against America from 20 January 1941. Things were hotting up for America four years before Pearl Harbor, yet the US Pacific fleet was ordered to remain holed up in a mouse trap (Pearl Harbor), which they regularly and repeatedly left unguarded for four and eight days at a time, maintaining a separation of 500–1000 nautical miles.

Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

Both England and America could afford to lose a battle to win a war. England and America had the most sophisticated intelligence operations and were playing the game of war as dominant players. Pearl Harbor was an all sides complicit attack dictated by the war-makers. England and America were dedicated to losing the Pearl Harbor battle in order to bring America into the war against Germany.

The American aircraft carrier fleet remained intact, as did its planes. Apart from two ships, all the naval ships in Pearl Harbor were repaired and returned to service. Pearl Harbor could have been annihilated but it was merely a smokescreen for what could have been. Pearl Harbor was a strategic attack set up for the cameras and media to begin WWII. It was not a strategic attack to begin and end WWII, which it could have been.

[58] See How To Take Over The World, A Right Royal Con, 2007, rear cover.

Pearl Harbor was agreed to by all sides. It was designed to increase the breadth of the war, to include America and the Pacific. It was designed to make the war last longer, ensuring that at the beginning of the war, everyone was on a more or less equal footing, with America having enough air carriers survive to match Japan in the Pacific.

Churchill had secured an agreement with Roosevelt that, apart from defensive action in the Pacific, America would assist Britain in the war in Europe first. Hence Churchill's requirement of his cousin's son was that Hitler declare war on America as soon as Japan had attacked.

The Commander of America's Pacific Fleet, Admiral Husband E. Kimmel and General Walter C. Short were to be the scapegoats. They lost their postings, were found innocent on the charge of "dereliction of duty" but found guilty of "errors of judgement".

> What should have been a court martial for those above them, ended up being a white-gloved swish of blame. Instead of President Roosevelt being impeached, he was killed, although counter-intelligence suggests he committed suicide.

Instead of Roosevelt's immediate command being court-martialled and executed for mass-murder-and-treason, the blame was shifted to a lower level, to those whose ignorance had been carefully nurtured (Kimmel and Short). Filtered down, the misappropriated blame was light for Admiral Kimmel and General Short. They demanded a court martial so they could explain their predicament and clear their names, but even this was refused. Pearl Harbor was an exercise in obfuscation before and after the attack.

Spymaster: "During the height of the Japanese attack with the Japanese bombing and strafing, with HQ personnel around him, Admiral Kimmel took a moment of time from his duty commanding the defence. Kimmel went to his quarters and stood in front of his mirror. He then spent several minutes removing the fourth star from his collar and sadly studied his reflection. Outside, the uninitiated were burning, drowning and dying. Large numbers of the civilian casualties were Japanese-Americans (unrecorded) as were many of the surviving blood donors."

The eight surviving aircraft carriers were to become the backbone of the American fleet in the Pacific. Their transfer to sea amounted to being deliberately kept out of harm's way, and these aircraft carriers ensured that America won the Pacific War.

What happened to British Prime Minister Chamberlain at the beginning of the war happened to American President Roosevelt at the end of the war. Both were killed with the complicity of their own sides. Chamberlain was killed ("cancer") after he was successfully used to start WWII and Roosevelt was killed three weeks before the end of WWII to ensure he did not write his memoirs about his part in bringing America into the war . . . or face questioning about how American Intelligence failed so badly at Pearl Harbor.

Commander William Guy Carr: "The government of Britain was forced to aid the international bankers' plan for the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia in 1917 in order to obtain their promise that they would bring America into the war on the side of the Allies. It can be assumed that SS Lusitania was sunk to provide the necessary incident to justify the change of American policy, just as Pearl Harbor was used as an excuse for America to enter World War II."[59]

Similarly, 9-11 was used to start WWIII. This too, was according to the writings of Adam Weishaupt, the agenda of the Illuminati and the military industrialists who make their money selling 'FEAR & SECURITY'. The entire Pearl Harbor scenario was repeated again in 9-11. With the advent of the internet (soon to be controlled by Stalin's United Nations – false accusations have begun by eBay) America became educated that 9-11 was another Pearl Harbor within five years of the self-sabotage.

Spymaster: "The Mossad were running the whole 9-11 attack. It was a virtual canned meat operation run by the Mossad, the Druze, the Bnai-Brith and the Adan (Israeli Military Intelligence), with the canned meat walking in live. This canned meat included the workers, FBI financial investigators, firemen and any other rescue staff.

"Within hours of the attack, all Israeli personnel involved were sent back to Israel. Even those Israelis under arrest had their paperwork lost . . . not unlike the evidence of 9-11, which was immediately shipped all over the world and melted down.

"The American media would have us believe that every crime scene in America is sampled and tested by some version of CSI. On 9-11 everything got swished before analysis. This is one of the hallmarks of a grande coup. The speed with which investigations were closed down (including gossip) and the removal of debris and detritus out of America was breathtaking.

"9-11 was a grande coup. The brutality of it, the wanton slaughter of emergency personnel, the financial heists and the gold heists marked it as an Israeli operation.

"The Israelis stole so much gold and wired so many large funds to other places that some of the first fatalities of 9-11 were the financial investigators brought in to confirm claims of enormous financial frauds perpetrated the night before. Apart from wired transactions, billions of dollars of gold were extracted from under the Twin Towers. The last of these vehicles were trapped in the explosion. None of this has ever been officially acknowledged.

"The police and rescue personnel know what they saw, but were moved into an enforced silence and censorship by America's own counter-intelligence, which included personal and public propaganda. This was all under the guise of the official investigation, which included unspoken threats to lesser officials.

"America's agents include Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden.

"America's 'official version' was challenged by dedicated researchers who backed up much of what the silenced witnesses originally said. The 'official version' flies completely in the face of reality for anyone who ever had a Western education."

One of these with a Western education was America's own agent, Osama bin Laden, known in the British public schools as 'Harry bin Laden' and by his CIA codename 'Tim Osman'. Osama bin Laden/Tim Osman, long presumed dead, is supposed to have turned on his own America to the huge financial advantage of his family and other oil/defense/security interests. In reality, bin Laden/Osman has survived his many media deaths and lives protected in an MI-5 safehouse in London.

The so-called Free Western Media has exhibited as much independence and brain power in the whole anti-al Qaeda crusade as the press did in Hitler's Germany. Still, they don't have much to go on. Al Qaeda is a Western Media Construct (WMC) and doesn't even exist (Weapons of Mass Construction). It is just a broadband blaming ground using an Islamic word that Westerners can actually pronounce, not unlike Anita McNaught's Holy Jihad Brigade – another Israeli construct.

Some believe Roosevelt committed suicide at Warm Springs, others that he was murdered. The official story is he died of "natural causes". Roosevelt suffered from hypertension and smoked at least 30 cigarettes a day. He was bound to a wheelchair, never photographed in it for the public during WWII, but always propped up standing or in the driver's seat of a car – all of which alluded to Roosevelt being mobile. Roosevelt was propped up by his hefty aides, the media and the unseen hand. He was a warmonger and another double agent president of America.

Naval Intelligence files were declassified in 1994 and the pattern has simply repeated. When all the (available) facts are studied, the conclusion is palpable – Pearl Harbor was a planned event that opened up the path that lead to the deaths of millions. The United States goaded Japan into a World War and this led to the second nuclear bombing of a sovereign country and its people – the first was in San Francisco.

> Every year like a ghost, Pearl Harbor intrudes upon us again and haunts us . . . The story is repeated because everybody knows the whole story was never told. The truth about Pearl Harbor is a public possession. Yet, over sixty years later the public still does not have adequate possession of the truth. Thus, the association of 9-11 with the annual phantom of Pearl Harbor puts the 'wink' in hoodwink. Not only are we being controlled, but we're being taunted with that control.
> The Roosevelt administration used the back door of Japan to enter a world war. The attack, and Roosevelt's Day of Infamy address, jolted the American people into the frame of mind for war. This scenario should be familiar to us today as George Bush and his government-controlled media referrals to 'the terror attacks of September 11', when we all know it was another Magic Ops Pearl Harbor.
> Every phase of deception and manoeuvring used by the US government in order to engineer and guarantee the Japanese 'surprise' attack on Pearl Harbor is still being used in full force by the government today.
> Pearl Harbor was an experiment in government/military censorship and has been repeated in the events of 9-11 with military precision. The Bush administration had clear foreknowledge of the 9-11 attacks and worked closely with all Israeli intelligence forces to ensure it was carried out unimpeded. This was Bush's back door to US occupation of the Middle East and the concurrent oil price hikes. It was left open as to whether 9-11 would lead us into WWIII.[60]

Gifting the United Nations to Stalin

The Russian–Japanese Pearl Harbor

9–15 August 1945

Stalin in April 1937 with Prince Charles-like hand & Nikolai Yezhov removed.

Stalin was every bit a Jew, and anything Stalin wanted, Stalin got. Anything that was required for Stalin was provided for Stalin. In exchange, Stalin would do anything and everything the International Bankers wanted. This included mass murder and the proliferation of an ideology that was straight out of the Jewish control of the British Monarchy.

Churchill.
Stalin.

The 1939 seventh Congress of the Comintern promoting Stalin as the inheritor of the leadership and drive of Communism. The enormous banners do not state that Stalin was a British agent working for the Jewish-controlled British Monarchy. Stalin was a Rothschild by blood, by training, by financial backing and by socialistic direction. He was an insider, and despite his mass murder of some 68 million people, all Western governments just kept on promoting him. All they demanded was plausible deniability . . . and this was provided by embedded historians and the press.

Manchukuo was a Japanese puppet state in China (1931–45). When Japan first occupied Manchukuo in northern China (1931), they used first-class troops – the Kwantung Army. During WWII they transferred the better troops to more demanding theatres of war and by 1945, the once feared one million strong Kwantung Army was a totally inferior force, inferior to virtually every other army in the world.

Initially the Kwantung Army was a most feared force, but during their reign of terror in American-backed China, their best were continuously removed and replaced with non-combat bureaucrats until the Kwantung Army became a paper tiger – a colossal bluff.[1]

By 1945, most of the once feared Kwantung Army had no weapons, no uniforms and no discipline . . . and just before they were attacked by Russia, their entire leadership went on leave.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

This made the Russian strike look incredibly heroic, but the Japanese Kwantung Army was taken over in Manchuria with as much resistance as a six-year-old's tea party. Russia's destruction of the Japanese in China was easier than Germany's walk-in-the-park over France in 1940.

The Japanese called their army Kantogun, an antonym. They were known internationally as the Kwantung Army and their role was a colossal military bluff. To the Soviet Union they were benevolent and neutral (in their neutral zone), but to the Americans who backed China, they chose to think of the Kwantung Army as a foe demanding constant fear. This was carried out to the extent that the US spread intelligence-induced propaganda bedtime stories throughout America:

"If you're not good, the Kwantung Army will get you."

The Kwantung Army never expected to fight America and America never wanted to fight the Kwantung Army. It was if an agreement had been reached, something approximating 'the fear of peace'. As such, the Kwantung Army was treated as a "force-in-being" that was there to "exert a decisive influence upon the military thinking and the foreign policy of the US toward the USSR"[2] . . . and this is exactly what occurred.

Chinese tactics for robbing Japanese patrols started off using classic hungutz bandit techniques. Communist Chinese troops and bandits would lie in wait along a track. At a given signal they would emerge with broom-handle Mauser pistols and attack the Japanese at point-blank range.

The later Kwantung Army were desperate to save any kind of equipment and were so under-resourced they wore straw sandals and rope belts and confronted the Chinese attacks by throwing sharpened bamboo spears, followed by stones. Occasionally officers would have a sword made from a straightened truck spring. This went on for some time until the Japanese stopped patrolling the areas they occupied in China and began a continual process of withdrawal and contraction.

From the day of Pearl Harbor (7 December 1941) the US pleaded with the Russians to pin down the Kwantung Army and help save the Pacific from the Japanese. The Russians had a number of intelligence assets in the Chinese theatre and these spies religiously supplied them with information. The Russian spies in the Chinese theatre was a result of the heavy fighting between the Japanese and Soviet Armies at Kalaiken Gul in 1939, which the Russians had won.

Spymaster: "Victory at Kalaiken Gul was the single event that propelled Marshal Giorgiy Zhukov (1896–1974) into prominence in Soviet affairs. As a reward, he became the Army chief-of-staff in 1941. Zuhkov had once been a saddle-maker's apprentice and a private soldier in WWI. He made do with what he had, didn't complain, and was gifted at using intelligence officers, which some Generals ignored to their peril. When Zuhkov was recalled to the West he carried the title Victor of Kalaiken Gul, and in typical Russian fashion, with origins in poverty, he remembered his skilled and less fortunate subordinates."

Marshal Giorgiy Zuhkov.

In 1943, Marshal Zuhkov lifted the siege of Moscow, then captured Warsaw (1944–45), conquered Berlin (1945) and accepted the German surrender on 7 May 1945. Zuhkov was Russia's version of Lord Slim.[3]

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 Ma

After WWII, Zhukov became the Commander of the Russian Zone of Germany and Minister of Defence (1955) until he was dismissed by Khruchev in 1957.

During successive summit conferences between the Big Three (Churchill, Stalin, Roosevelt/Truman), the American military planners constantly warned of the self-contained autonomous Kwantung Army as a big threat, the cream of the entire Japanese armed forces.

[3] Lord Slim (1891–1970) led the famous 14th 'Forgotten Army' to victory over the Japanese at Burma in WWII. He was knighted in 1944, became the Chief of the Imperial General Staff (1948–52), Governor-General of Australia (1953–60) and then Viscount Slim in 1960. He was outed as a paedophile by his Australian victims in April 2007. At the same time, the Americans introduced their version, Slim Pickens. There was also slim pickens in New Zealand, where Slim Pickens would be considered a good-looking woman.

This was driven home repeatedly at Tehran (28 Nov.–1 Dec. 1943), Malta (30 Jan.–3 Feb. 1945), Yalta (4–11 Feb. 1945) and Potsdam (17 July–2 Aug. 1945). It was scaremongering by the American military planners and revealed, as much as anything, the true purpose of WWII – the social engineering of the entire world.

After the Tehran conference in December 1943, the American military planners suggested to Stalin that they attack the Kwantung Army and offered to supply a logistics base east of Lake Baikal in Siberia. But the Russian Red Army turned white at the proposal of attacking anything Japanese and refused to budge.

As late as October 1944, Stalin was still claiming that the feared Kwantung Army might attack if any news got out of a Russo-American coalition for war in the Far East. "'The Japanese were usually inclined to take the initiative', the Soviet dictator warned."[4]

The US opened up a second front in the Pacific and this drained the armour, artillery and best infantry out of the Kwantung Army. Those from the Kwantung Army either fought to the death, or were bypassed on far-flung islands in the Pacific.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

As a result, by early 1945, the Japanese Kwantung Army in Manchuria was nothing more than a hollow shell and would be hopelessly outclassed by Soviet invaders, who were backed by the American Lend-Lease equipment, which in turn was backed by the International Bankers, who in turn directed WWII in any direction their socio-economic outcome desired.

> By July 1944, America had landed at Marianas and completed B-29 raids on Kyushu. The Deputy Chief of the Kwantung Army went to Tokyo where he was instructed: "The Kwantung Army was not to resort to arms even if the Soviets were to occupy high ground to the rear of the Japanese border posts! If force proved absolutely unavoidable, the Hsinking authorities must obtain prior authorisation from Tokyo."[5]

There was to be no fighting with the Russians until the Russians had negotiated their reward for the surrender of the Kwantung Army. The Russians negotiated with the America military planners, who deferred to the bankers/social engineers, who were organising a New World Order based on tax for peace, social control, and profit.

---

[4] 'Kwantung Army Strategy', p. 3145.

[5] Ibid., p. 3147.

As such, the Kwantung Army was not to be destroyed until it consisted entirely of those they wanted destroyed. This was to be a depopulation exercise of Japanese dissidents, thinkers, peasants, and old people. Before the mass killing could take place, the Kwantung Army was to transform into an army of the sick, ugly, weak and unwanted.

In 1944, the Japanese launched a major offensive called Ichi Go which reclaimed large parts of the previously 'liberated land' including large dumps of US Lend-Lease equipment. Spymaster: "It was like the tide came in and took everything out. It was that big."

The Chinese Nationalists ran like hell, only putting on mock attacks in places they knew the Japanese weren't (much like modern-day police). With all their spies in the Japanese rear, the Communist Chinese knew exactly where the attacks were going and got out quick-smart. This was effectively the last death rattle of the Kwantung Army, but only the Communists and Russians read it right.

Japanese Kwantung Army marching thru streets of northern China in 1939.

One of the very few Westerners who came to realise the weakness of the Kwantung Army was Lt. Ladislas Farago (1906–80) an Intell. Officer in Okinawa. While going through pay books taken from killed Japanese soldiers he realised many of them had been relocated from the Kwantung Army. From this he theorised the Kwantung Army had become a paper tiger.

Lt. Ladislas Farago.

I.O. Lt. Ladislas Farago went to Washington with this information and was told to "Shut up". The best of the patriotic spies are treated in this way. This was a report Washington knew, had organised, and never wanted known. It was to be America's retaliation for Pearl Harbor and was to be perpetrated by the Russians on Chinese soil. For 3000 American deaths, there were to be 300,000 Japanese deaths.

In September 1944, America took over Morotai in the Moluccas and Palau in the Carolines. On 18 September 1944 the Japanese High Command relaxed their border defences even further, so that the remaining Japanese soldiers, many armed with bamboo strapped together to look like guns, were slaughtered without retaliation, and well into Japanese protected territory.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

> The Japanese High Command stipulated (in a clause) that areas were not to be defended where a dispute was likely to occur and the Kwantung Army commanding general (Otozo Yamada from July 1944) was empowered to refrain* from using force at the very outbreak of any border dispute.

This meant that by 18 September 1944, if the Russian Army fired a shot, the once feared Japanese Kwantung Army was to run further back into Japanese territory, eventually reaching Chinese-occupied China. The Japanese soldiers weren't told this, but their commanding generals knew. They knew that their soldiers were cannon fodder and would become either captured soldiers or dead soldiers.

As is the slippery nature of deniability in war prior to complicit mass slaughter, the commanding general of the Kwantung Army, Yoshijiro Umezu, was promoted to Chief-of-Staff of the Japanese Army in July 1944. At the same time, he was replaced by Otozo Yamada. The slaughter was to happen 13 months later in August 1945 and Chief-of-Staff Yoshijiro Umezu went on to sign the Japanese surrender to the Americans on 2 September 1945.

> When the new commanding general Otozo Yamada got the news he summoned all his generals to Hsinking and briefed all the officers. The Kwantung Army immediately changed from being a military operation to a bureaucratic operation whose main job was to prevent difficulties, report on border disputes, report on any construction work, defend buffer zones for friendly aircraft (taking any good equipment and any good men out), and the procedures for the expeditious transmission of local reports dealing with boundary incidents.

This was all laid out in the Kwantung Army Guide for the Defence of the Manchurian-Soviet-Mongolian Borders. It was essentially a guide to surrender and how to keep one's self busy without presenting arms. It remained in effect from September 1944 to their slaughter and capture in August 1945.

The Kwantung Army Guide came from the top and held such sway that when the Russians attacked at Amur, near Khabarovsk, in October 1944, the Kwantung Army obeyed their guidebook disciplines and did not retaliate. Two months later the Russians attacked at the Eastern Manchuria border (December 1944). Again the Kwantung Army did not retaliate.

> The Russians killed members of the Kwantung Army without retaliation. The Japanese were not returning fire and the Russians were restraining themselves from slaughtering the Japanese until their reward had been negotiated, hence the rapid conferences at Malta (30 January–3 February 1945), Yalta (4–11 February 1945) and Potsdam (17 July–2 August 1945).
> As soon as Stalin had the contract signed for his desired reward (a third of the world to Jewish-controlled British Monarchy communism, plus the United Nations) he gave the order to fire. Stalin's minder Winston Churchill was drunk right through the Potsdam Conference – nice cover.

The Japanese had received their instructions (September 1944) and the Russians were waiting to receive theirs. They would have to wait a year (August 1945), and it was a strange wait for both sides, with the Russians becoming more hostile as soon as the clock struck 1945.

There were 30 Russian divisions in the Far East and from October 1944 the Russians began earmarking another 30 divisions in Siberia to move eastwards from Europe. With them came two of Stalin's highest-ranking Marshals, Vsailevsky and Malinovsky.

Trainloads of troops and supplies came across the Trans-Siberian Railroad towards Manchuria carrying tanks, aircraft, artillery and pontoons for river-crossings. There was no concerted effort to disguise the cargo, with 30 carloads travelling every day. By May and June 1945 there were 15 such trains every day carrying 10,000 soldiers, amounting to 10 manned and armoured divisions each month. This was a military migration.

"At the end of May 1945, Japanese Intelligence estimated that the Russians had already transferred a total of 160,000 troops, 1,300 planes, 1,200 tanks, and 870 guns and mortars. By late July it was judged that the Soviets would have built up their Far Eastern offensive strength to a total of 1,600,000 men, 6,500 planes, and 4,500 armoured vehicles. Japanese observers reported the ominous fact that the Soviet reinforcements were not equipped for winter operations and would therefore have to go into action before the bitter Manchurian winter set in."[6]

At the same time, the Kwantung Army in Manchuria was being bled white. From February 1944, divisions had been pulled out of the Kwantung Army to assist in the US counter-offensive in the Pacific.

treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

Kwantung Army Mitsubishi A5 fighter over Manchuria. Inferior to America's P40 Warhawk, it was replaced by the Zero.

The core of the Kwantung Army Air Force (two air divisions) also left for the Philippines in June 1944. By February 1945, 11 Japanese divisions had left for the Philippines, including the crack II Armoured division. A 12th division went to central China and the 13th to Formosa (Taiwan). In addition, numerous supporting units and great quantities of war material left with them.

In January 1945 the Japanese IGHQ decided to transfer an additional two divisions to South Korea to protect against a looming American invasion. Three more infantry divisions and the last two armoured divisions were ordered from Manchuria back to Japan.

Chief of the Japanese Army General Staff's Russian Intelligence Section: "If the Russian's only knew the weaknesses of our preparations in Manchuria, they were bound to attack us . . . We want to provide a large number of divisions – a show of force."[7]

> This drain continued on through 1945. All that was left of the once impressive Kwantung Army was a 700,000 strong bluff, who were marched around in order to look impressive to any intelligence that might spy on them. These were students, civil servants, youths, over-age conscripts, colonists and sub-standard physical specimens. They were ill-trained and poorly equipped, most without uniforms, helmets, or shoes.

The uniforms were a motley mixture of military and civilian garb. Most of their shoes had been replaced with straw sandals. Most of the men were unarmed, and those units that were armed carried obsolete weapons from previous wars from previous decades. Knives replaced rifles while others fashioned swords and bayonets from the springs of scrapped motor vehicles. Small arms and machine-guns were requisitioned from high school and college training equipment.

Ironically, the best of this equipment was later stolen by the Chinese, who used it to turn on each other in the Civil War that raged in China until the Young Marshal kidnapped Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi) in order to encourage dialogue between the Communists and the Kuomintung.

[7] Ibid.

The border forts had been stripped bare of heavy artillery from 11 months of military exodus and the defensive works were in various stages of non-completion, hampered by a shortage of materials, equipment and skill. Locally manufactured mortars became the Kwantung Army's only form of heavy artillery.

> The Kwantung Army was now comprised of people the Japanese Government wanted dead so that the new modern Japan could emerge like a phoenix from the ashes. The Kwantung Army had become an undernourished, leaderless, bureaucratic, peasant army carrying rakes, bamboo spears, fake bamboo guns and truck-spring swords. They were essentially an army throwing rocks at aircraft and their demise was to be a mass slaughter.

"New, inexperienced officers were frequently thrust into the awesome responsibilities of key command, with staffs and personnel which many had never seen before. Indoctrination stressed that one man was to destroy ten enemies or one tank, using tactics built around suicide (euphemistically labelled 'special attack') . . . In attacking vehicles, soldiers were to use poles, satchel charges, and 'Molotov cocktails' (improvised from beer or soft-drink bottles). Alternatively, each man was to convert himself into a human bomb, strapping to his body six grenades for detonation on top of a tank. Some air force pilots even loaded their rickety trainers with anti-tank mines and prepared to dive their aircraft into tanks.

"But, by and large, fiery exhortations and individual devotion could not conceal a fundamental tendency: the new men, who now made up most of the Kwantung Army, were largely cynical and sceptical, if not defeatist. They lacked faith in their weapons, their officers, and themselves. They bore no resemblance to the hell-for-leather Kwantung Army which overran Manchuria in a matter of weeks in 1931, or which slugged it out with the Russians at Nomonhan in 1939. Out of earshot of their superiors, the listless new men called themselves 'human bullets' (nikudan), 'Manchurian orphans', 'victim units' (gisei-butai) or 'the pulverised ones'."[8]

In July 1945 several hundred Russian soldiers brazenly penetrated a sector of East Manchuria and erected positions. They were not in fear of retaliation and knew fully the Japanese had to avoid firing and retreat. This was repeated again in the first week of August 1945, with the Russians trespassing borders with small specialist advanced parties attacking Japanese patrols, who responded by running away from the bullets that chased them. Their bitter watchwords were "patience, prudence, restraint".

By August 1945 the Japanese had only 55 serviceable first-line fighter, bomber or reconnaissance aircraft. The Russians had 5000 aircraft, 45 divisions, 10 tank brigades and 3 armoured divisions. It's no wonder 300,000 Japanese died in the post-war Pearl Harbor (v. 3000 Americans in pre-war Pearl Harbor).

> There was a Neutrality Pact between Russia and Japan that was supposed to run until April 1946, but sneaky Stalin avoided this by not formally joining Russia in the Potsdam Declaration of 16 July 1945. He simply didn't sign. This was part of his British training and he was following the advice the British had given him. By British, I mean Stalin's trainer, minder and second cousin Winston Churchill.
> The myth of British–Soviet enmity was created then and has existed unchallenged until now. It is a carefully constructed myth polished by many distinguished historians, and the more historians that polish this myth, the more they become distinguished. This achieved its purpose for many years – to create and explain military enmity between Britain, Russia and China.

Spymaster: "Now the time has come to lay things bare. Britain created the monsters that ran Russia, China and Germany and lied to all-comers."

> The only thing that counts is the agenda. Ideology is a distraction so different people can feel they belong to the conflict while watching from their armchairs. It's a little like betting on a game and watching it with more interest once you've backed a side. Most people choose their favourite colour.
>
> Ideology is used to take over countries as it creates as much conflict as religion without the need to create a wise person.
> The 'Agenda' considers wise people dangerous, so ideology replaced religion in order to create a worldwide perpetual > war with everyone at least a spectator . . . and now religions are being infused with ideology, so it's war on Sundays as well, with Christian churches run by high-ranking CIA officers and Islamic mosques run by KGB/Mossad dummies.

Ideology is for wankers.
The only thing that counts is the agenda.

At Potsdam, no longer the British Prime Minister, Churchill would stumble through the checkpoint completely drunk while the conference was already under way. This continued his line of plausible deniability, but he was still sober enough to advise his protégé Stalin.

Stalin always listened to Churchill, admiring him for his ruthlessness and how much it differed from his public persona.

The Kwantung Army expected the Russian attack in the autumn [September–November] of 1945 and should have been at maximum preparedness in August. Instead, Kwantung Army Commander-in-Chief General Yamada flew to Darien on 8 August 1945 to dedicate a shrine at Port Arthur.

"Elsewhere, V Army Headquarters was conducting war games attended by all of its division commanders and chiefs-of-staff – manoeuvres which were to last some five days from 7 August 1945.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

"The Commander-in-Chief . . . Army and his staff meanwhile had left for III Area Army Headquarters to attend ceremonies. These were but a few examples of how all major headquarters within the Kwantung Army, from its Commander-in-Chief down, were caught off guard when the Soviet armies finally struck in the early hours of 9 August 1945."[9]

This battle had long been engineered. The Kwantung Army elite were not caught off guard. They were purposefully removed before midnight 8 August 1945 to ensure only the unwanted were killed or captured. The same practice had occurred from 8.00 pm on 6 December 1941 at Pearl Harbor and in Washington. Those who wanted to sound the alarm were imprisoned for 36 hours.

When the first reports of the Russian attack came in, the Kwantung Army elite chose to ignore them. From the top down, they tried to convince themselves and each other that this was just more border skirmishes. By nightfall on 9 August it was evident the Russians were using American Lend-Lease aircraft and attacking all-out on every front.

It took until the evening of 9 August 1945 for Kwantung Army Headquarters to rescind their bureaucratic guidebook and allow their bureaucratically-experienced barely-armed peasant army to fight. Rescinding the guidebook was another "too-little-and-too-late" message. It imitated General Marshall's delayed message to Pearl Harbor at 11.50 am on 7 December 1941.

In a similar pattern to America entering the war, but in an unwinding version, Prime Minister Suzuki called in his Chief of the Cabinet Planning Bureau and said: "Is the Kwantung Army capable of repulsing the Soviet Army?"

Chief of Cabinet Planning Bureau, S. Ikeda replied: "The Kwantung Army is hopeless. Within two weeks Hsinking will be occupied."

The Kwantung Army was inferior in every way. The Americans knew this as they had purposefully drained the Kwantung Army by opening up a second front in the Pacific a year prior. As a result, Japan's last field army was nothing more than a formidable myth.

The Soviets invaded and then claimed themselves "the strongest contemporary army" in the world. Stalin was then described as "the most powerful single man in post-war Europe",[10] but such is Russian propaganda.

The Russians defeated an inferior force with American hardware and far superior numbers.

The Russians, Americans, Chinese and Japanese all knew "the Kwantung Army is hopeless". So why was Russia given all the glory when America virtually funded the entire attack? The answer lies in the future, my son.

> Russia was to get all the credit as a bargaining chip for control of the United Nations, and America was to officially bow out as being exhausted. The Jews had taken over Russia in the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, which was actually a Jewish coup deposing the Tsar and taking over Russia. The next step for the communist Jews was control of the United Nations; so they had their favourite Jewish sons, Churchill and Roosevelt, gift the United Nations to their other favourite son, Stalin, while hiding their other favourite Jewish son, Hitler, in the newly declared war criminal safe-haven – Spain.
> As soon as the United Nations formed they produced cover for the Jewish Hitler by calling their recovery of Nazi stolen items Operation SAFEHAVEN. The United Nations also directed the media away from Spain in any Hitler searches and all intelligence authorities used the search for Hitler to occupy any country of their choosing – except Spain.

Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

From the last days of WWI to the end of WWII, the League of Nations hampered the world's peace process and sabotaged 'trade and development' (launching Hitler in Germany and Mussolini in Italy). League of Nations representatives from leading nations have now been exposed for taking bribes, rendering both their actions and reputations useless. They were not advocates of PEACE, FREEDOM & CULTURE, but the RAPE & DESTRUCTION OF COUNTRIES' SOCIAL STRUCTURES & RESOURCES

. . . WAR . . .

The League of Nations' daughter, the United Nations, inherited the same poverty of virtue and result. Like a toothless dragon mauling on its enemy, there is no evidence of result, but its starvation-in-action makes for gripping news. Dragons are goliaths by nature and short in flight, only provoking fear in fairytales and the faithful. They blow fire a short distance, then run out of breath. The United Nations dragon has no remedial effect on FREEDOM OR CULTURE, TRADE OR DEVELOPMENT.

The United Nations promises again and again that it won't happen again and again, but it is the AFFECTIVE BODY OF WAR, and NOT THE EFFECTIVE BODY OF WAR,
or THE EFFECTIVE BODY OF PEACE.
As such, the United Nations is ignored.

The United Nations is an antipatriotic war dragon that frustrates war intelligence with false notions of peace while destroying the social structures that it post-war occupies and never leaves. The United Nations dragon has all the hallmarks of Colonising Communism – the destruction of social structures, the destruction of cultures and the destruction of freedom, including the physical rape and murder of people within its borders (the warmongers' reward to the sexually-deviant UN workers) and the extraction of all resources during and after the war (the warmongers' reward to the Capitalists).

For its part in the bargain, the UN's own frustration of war intelligence is utilised to frustrate the truth of its actions and inactions, leaving the UN as a pillow-biters version of totalitarian communism.

As such, the United Nations is nothing more than communism's representative in the West. Sure enough, 105 KGB agents were removed from the UN in one day in October 1970 and replaced almost as quick. The UN has proven time and time again that its main purpose is to destroy social structures where peace, freedom and culture previously existed. Like an out-of-focus hammer and sickle, the UN is an anachronism for UNcultured, UNpeaceful, UNfamily, UNutopian and UNfree.

The bigger the front, the bigger the back and the United Nations is all arse – and a multi-trillion-dollar arse at that.

All of this while the United States promotes itself as the only 'US' worth joining. There is no UN. It's just a big arse. The United States destroyed the UN by refusing to fund it, bankrupting it (except for bankers' loans that kept it afloat) and then funding it to 50% as long as no US personnel were ever charged with international war crimes. This has made the United Nations' fresh-mint dragon part of a totalitarian dictatorship that destroys peace, freedom and culture as quickly as the Vice-President of America Dick Cheney can meet Saddam Hussein outside Iraq (20 April 2003) then shoot his hunting buddy – without charge of course, otherwise the US would reduce its funding to the UN.

Talk about blind-eye politics from corrupt funding. It's about time we fired the UN, preferably before WWIII – Little Boy, Fat Boy, Fat Chance.

So what was it all for? Why a reverse Pearl Harbor at the end of WWII?

The Russian–Japanese Pearl Harbor (9–15 August 1945) was designed to get America out of the war while still allowing them to trade with the phoenix of Japan. Similar reasoning occurred with America's delay allowing the Russians to take Berlin. America had huge financial interests in both Japan and Germany.

America has always fronted as a peace activist while maintaining the largest military industrial complex. America is a bitch full of excuses hiding behind fresh-mint dragons destroying tea-party cultures in a field of freedom . . . which is where the Russians took over. The Russo-Japanese Pearl Harbor encouraged Communism's corruption of peacetime so that massive social engineering could occur without the mortality and expense of war.

Peace is an uneasy subject. It's profitable for the citizen but less so for the banks, who make their big money out of war. Hence the uneasy link between peace and taxes – too high and there is civil war, too low and there is international war. We pay high taxes in order to buy peace from the International Bankers.

treasurer@platinumparty.org

Roosevelt was surreptitiously killed on 12 April 1945, three weeks before the end of Europe's WWII, to be replaced by Vice-President Truman.

President Truman was an ingénue and refused to believe the very experienced Intelligence Officer Lt. Ladislas Farago that the million strong Japanese Kwantung Army was a paper tiger.

So President Truman gave Stalin the job of destroying the Japanese Kwantung Army in China after WWII had all but ended.[11] America further helped by dropping two atomic bombs on Japan on the 6th and 9th of August 1945 and a third that did not explode. This third nuclear bomb became a gift from America to Japan, who regifted it to the Russians to stop them advancing beyond the Kurile Islands.

In this way Russia became nuclear, was touted as the strongest military force in the world, and the United Nations was gifted to its leader, Joseph Stalin, the Prince of Steel – yet another illegitimate Rothschild.

[11] A lot of shit goes down south of the Mongolian border in Guangdong, China. It is an area of human experimentation.

Completely demoralising the Japanese in China, Stalin destroyed the once formidable Kwantung Army in seven of the easiest days of battle in WWII. In exchange, Stalin was given Eastern Europe, and his NKVD/KGB became the perpetual 2IC of the United Nations, with social control of the world during peacetime, which is everywhere America isn't.

All of this came to pass and marks it as a hit. Stalin was given victory in the final battle of WWII and rewarded with the United Nations and a third of the world. That Stalin was a communist, and a supported British agent, marks communism as originating in the bowels of the British Monarchy.

One should always keep in mind that Churchill, Stalin's minder, was King Edward VII's biological son.

If we weren't so easily bought by the doctored photograph maybe none of this would have come to pass.

The Freemasons' Winston Churchill
Tavistock's Bulldog

Sir Winston Leonard Spencer Churchill KG, OM, CH was born at Blenheim Palace near Woodstock in Oxfordshire, England on 30 November 1874. He was a descendant of the 1st Duke of Marlborough and the son of Sir Randolph Churchill, the third son of the 7th Duke of Marlborough . . . or was he?

Winston Churchill's absent father, Lord Randolph Churchill (1849–95), was initiated into Freemasonry under the name Rudolph H. Spencer in Dublin in 1878. He became the supreme Freemason in England, the Magister Magistrorum (the Master Mason).

Rudolph H. Spencer aka Lord Randolph Churchill.

Freemasonry is passed down from father to son in that the son of a Freemason gains all his father's protections and passes through the ranks at great speed. Winston Churchill was a high-ranking Freemason with full access to its programmes and protocols. It was second nature to him.[1] His father died from syphilis when Winston was 20. Due to his position as Magister Magistrorum he maintained a posthumous influence.

Winston Churchill's mother was Lady Randolph Churchill (née Jeanette "Jennie" Jerome) of Brooklyn, New York. Her father was the New York millionaire financier Leonard Walter Jerome (1817–91) who controlled the New York Times newspaper and had interests in a number of railway companies. He sponsored the arts, sailed with his friend William Kissam Vanderbilt, established the American Jockey Club, built the Jerome Park Racetrack in the Bronx (with America's Rothschild representative August Belmont, Snr.) and built the Sheepshead Bay Racetrack. He is still known in New York today by Jerome Avenue in Brooklyn, Jerome Park in the Bronx, and the Lexington Avenue–Jerome Avenue Express.

In 1849, Leonard Walter Jerome married Clara Hall (1825–95). They had three daughters including Jennie Jerome. His wife and three daughters spent much time in Europe socialising with the aristocratic elite of the day and Jennie married Lord Randolph Churchill. Leonard Walter Jerome's non-biological grandson was Winston Churchill.

On 12 September 1908, Winston Churchill married Clementine Ogilvy Hozier (1885–1977), a dazzling but penniless beauty whom he had known for six months. (Actress Ethel Barrymore had turned him down.) They had five children. Marigold died early in childhood and Sarah Churchill co-starred with Fred Astaire in Royal Wedding.

Clementine Ogilvy Hozier's mother was Lady Blanche Henrietta Ogilvy, daughter of the 7th Earl of Airlie. Lady Blanche Henrietta Ogilvy was well known for her sexual indiscretions (Christian sex-worker) which eventually caused her divorce as the second wife of Sir Henry Montague Hozier. It takes two to tango.

Lady Blanche Henrietta Ogilvy was so loose she maintained that Clementine's father was not Sir Henry Montague Hozier, but Captain William George "Bay" Middleton, a noted horseman who bayed at the women. But no, she was even looser than that.

According to Joan Hardwick, biographer to Clementine Churchill, Sir Henry Montague Hozier had one too many self-sabotaging sperm and all of Lady Blanche Henrietta Ogilvy's children were sired by her sister's husband, Algernon Bertram Freeman-Mitford, the grandfather of the infamous Mitford sisters of the 'dating Hitler' and 'married to a fascist' fame.

Clementine Ogilvy Hozier.

This meant that Winston Churchill's wife's mother was rooting her brother-in-law. This cuckolding within the family meant that Churchill's wife was illegitimate and from a semi-incestuous union. Clementine Ogilvy Hozier's uncle was also her father. Similar incest of the mind occurred with Churchill's mother and with Churchill and Hitler's father sharing the same grandfather.

Continuing the fascist connection, through marriage, Winston Churchill was related to the Mitford sisters. Churchill's wife's uncle-father was the Mitford sister's grandfather, making Clementine Ogilvy Hozier (Churchill's wife) aunt to all the Mitford sisters. This poses the problem of nepotism in war. The Mitford sisters were supporters of fascism, and secretly, so was Churchill. Churchill's primary motive was war and he never lifted a finger for peace.

> Winston Churchill was illegitimate. He was the first cousin of Adolf Hitler's father. His mother was a slapper.
> Churchill's wife was illegitimate. She was an aunt to the Mitford sisters. Her mother was a slapper.
> Churchill, his wife, the Mitford sisters and Hitler were all supporters of Oligarchy Fascism.

Baronet Sir Oswald Mosley.

Rudolph H. Spencer Churchill. Winston Churchill's father joined the Freemasons in 1878, aged 28.

At one time Winston Churchill was the uncle of Adolf Hitler's girlfriend, Unity Walkrie Mitford. He was also the uncle of Diana 'Cimmie' Mitford who married Oswald Mosley in 1936. Oswald Mosley founded and led the British Union of Fascists from 1931 and the racist Union Movement from 1948. He had serial affairs with both men and women and had more women than a toilet seat.

Churchill's legal surname was 'Spencer Churchill', but starting with his father, Lord Randolph Spencer Churchill, his branch of the family always used the name 'Churchill' in public life and 'Spencer' in Masonic life. As a Mason and agent, Churchill was always referred to as 'Spencer', just as the Freemason homosexual occultist, the Duke of Hamilton, was referred to as 'Brandon'. Everyone had a nickname in high circles, even Hitler and Goering. Captain Mark Phillips was 'Dusty Fog'.

Because of the existence of another author called Winston Churchill, his books were published under the name "Winston Spencer Churchill" or "Winston S. Churchill", though some later printings sign him as Winston Churchill after the other author died in 1947. Like Winston, he was an historical novelist.

Running with family military tradition just as his father had done, Churchill spent much of his childhood in boarding schools, including Harrow, where he did so badly he was punished for poor work and lack of effort. Due somewhat to emotional turmoil, he failed to achieve much academically but succeeded in developing an independent and rebellious nature. He also developed manipulative writing skills as he tried to emotionally bribe his way back home.

Winston had a distant relationship with his father, which is how the British raise a military. He pined for his socialite mother, who largely ignored him, yet he worshipped her, which is how British women ensure they get married. Winston wanted to follow in his father's footsteps as Chancellor of the Exchequer from the age of 12.

Despite Winston's poor academic achievements, this was achieved through his father's posthumous Masonic influence and his mother's influence with Edward, Prince of Wales . . . who later became King Edward VII, known in social circles as 'Bertie'. Jennie Jerome was one of Bertie's lovers in 1874–75 and again in 1877 as soon as she had recovered from giving birth to the Prince of Wales' illegitimate son, Winston Churchill.

From the time Jennie recovered from the birth of the "premature" Winston to the time her position was taken over by Lillie Langtry (the first 'porn star'), Jennie was part of King Edward's "loose box" – the mistresses he put on display at official functions.

As a desolate, lonely child, Winston was subject to depression and found solace in his hired nanny, Mrs Elizabeth Everest, whom he nicknamed "Woom", a low-academic-achieving spelling of 'womb', a place to which he never wholly returned, despite best efforts and substitute cigar. He was more saddened when his nanny died than either of his parents.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

In 1893 at the age of 19, on his third attempt, Winston passed the entrance exam. Even more surprising, as a confirmed academic retard and late emotional developer, he became a politician and a Member of the House of Commons seven years later. ("I'm a retard and I'm okay, I'll enter politics and run the country one day.")

Due to his parental influence – acknowledged, unacknowledged and posthumous – he achieved all his goals, with the media projecting a successful image and his little ditty became, "I'm a politician and I'm okay, I'll enter war and run the world one day."

With his low exam results, Winston enrolled in the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, entering near the bottom of the intake of 102 cadets. (This is really quite dumb.) When he graduated two years later, he was eighth in his class. (The bright ones had left.) As Magister Magistrorum, his father could pulls strings and the military was the military arm of the Freemasons. All of the top four tiers of the military were Freemasons and any war the Freemasons wanted, they got.

On graduation from Sandhurst, Winston was appointed Second Lieutenant in the 4th Hussars Cavalry (1894) and went to Cuba (1895) as a military observer (a Spy who writes publicly) and reported for London's Daily Graphic.

In 1898, Winston was the intelligence officer for the 21st Lancers as a war correspondent (a Spy who talks publicly), and took part in the last full (acknowledged) cavalry charge of the British Empire at the Battle of Omdurman in India, after which the British used machine-guns. It was here that he wrote up Kitchener as "the Conqueror of Sudan" for his five-hour genocide of 27,000 dead and wounded Dervishes (2 September 1898) using new water-cooled machine-guns. Only 500 on the British side were killed or wounded and this was mainly from friendly fire after the barrels melted and spat bullets out in all directions.

Intelligence Corps: "There were two other charges by Mounted Infantry during WWI, but they were by colonials attempting to use bayonets as swords. The ANZACs were successful at Beersheeba because the Turks were all stoned on hashish supplied by the 'King's Yids'.[2]

"The other attempt was by the Canadians in France in 1918, but this was stopped by a Private in the Lancashire Rifles who yelled out, 'Who in the fuck are you?'. When the reply came that the Unit was Canadian Mounted Rifles, the Private shouted back, 'You'll be bully beef if you don't fuck off' – and the Canadians left."

Churchill was awarded ribbons for every battle theatre he reported on and many soldiers wondered why? Churchill was the intelligence officer present.

On his return in 1899, Churchill ran as the Liberal candidate for the seat of Oldham. Arthur Balfour, the Conservative leader in the Commons, summed Churchill up by saying, "I thought he was a young man of promise, but it appears he is a young man of promises." Churchill was thwarted, but became a politician and joined the House of Commons in 1900, via the general election, his father's posthumous Freemasonry influence, and his mother's mistress influence with the heir to the throne, Edward, Prince of Wales – Bertie.

Churchill was promoted to Home Secretary in 1910, just in time for the Sidney Street Siege, which he botched up with bowler hat aplomb.

[2] The 'King's Yids' were Jewish citizens of the Ottoman Empire, later to become the Stern Gang.

Churchill was rewarded for this by becoming the First Lord of the Admiralty when he was just 36 (1911–15). He gave impetus to military reform, including the development of tanks and aircraft carriers. Churchill was also one of the political and military engineers of the disastrous WWI Gallipoli landings on the Dardanelles, which led to him being correctly described as "The Butcher of Gallipoli".

After WWI an enquiry into the disastrous Gallipoli Operation showed Britain's own Vickers Ltd had supplied over 90% of the Turkish artillery and ammunition used to such deadly effect against their own. This was put down to the vagaries of commerce prior to the outbreak of WWI, but the truth was much worse.

By 1911, Vickers' major customer was Whitehall and the company moved its offices from Sheffield to Broadway (the home of the SIS) in Westminster, London, just to be closer to the British Government. In 1927 they merged and formed Vickers-Armstrong and in 1935 the British Government's "Royal Commission, Private Manufacture and Trading in Arms" was set up with Vickers-Armstrong, who immediately began rearming Britain for WWII. To seal the deal, Vickers-Armstrong set up offices at Bathwick Hill in Bath, right next to the British Admiralty. It was all very in-house. The British Goverment were hardly going to tell.

Espavo 5020 - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

Spymaster: "From the first to the last shots, the Turkish Artillery on the Peninsula at Gallipoli was dependent on Vickers' guns and ammunition. Without this supply, Turkey would have been totally unable to defend its territory against the British. This is the most monstrous truth of the entire WWI period. Vickers supplied the very ammunition used to defeat its own Army.

". . . Britain, hang your head in shame . . .

"Vickers was challenged about this after WWI and largely defeated the enquiry by taking the attitude that they could never defeat a customer with an order, no matter how much they may have disliked their custsomer's intentions. The enquiry did not prevent those high up in Vickers from getting awards and honours.

"I used to watch my grandfather polish up his WWI cap badges. He would tell me how, as a young boy of 15, he was repeatedly told he was too young for Gallipoli and had to stay on the Western Front."

When Asquith formed an all-party coalition government (26 May 1915–December 1916) the Conservatives agreed on the condition that Churchill was demoted. (The same condition had been applied to his father two decades earlier and they knew Winston was King George V's brother.) Churchill then served as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, a non-portfolio job whose primary function was appointing Justices of the Peace – essentially area paedophile minders. After six months, Churchill resigned from government.

Churchill stood for five political parties. He didn't care who he stood for, as long as he got his way.

In November 1915, in order to rebuild his political kudos with politicians and soldiers, Winston Churchill decided to serve at the Western Front while remaining a Member of Parliament. He also got to be near, if not meet, the Nordic-Anglo-Saxon colonising protégé Adolf Hitler, whom the British military Freemasons (Tavistock) had put so much effort into training.

As a former cavalryman, W.C. was not qualified to take command in the field, but in December 1915 he was posted for two months' training in modern trench warfare as a Major to the 2nd Grenadier Guards – literally an infantry battalion who throw grenades. From the moment of his arrival in France he was treated as a celebrity by both the British and French. As such, he was kept from the ravages of trench warfare, and for the most, he was in the Reserves out of fire.

Churchill saw only 48 hours of action in December 1915, after which he was promoted on 5 January 1916 to Lieutenant Colonel (Temporary) in command of the 6th Battalion (Service) Royal Scots Fusiliers (RSF), that were to be located near the Belgian border village of Ploegsteert, in the then quiet Ploegsteert Sector of the Ypres Salient, known as the 'Tommies of Plug Street' – British soldiers plugging Germans with lead.

Officially, Winston followed the normal alternating periods of five weeks on the Front Line and five weeks on Reserve, but only from February to 3 March 1916, for which there was no 10-week period. Others, including his wife, thought that a battalion command was more appropriate than Lieutenant Colonel.

Ploegsteert Wood at the bottom end of the Salient (2 km by 1 km) was never lost to the enemy. A short distance from this towards Messines is the church where Corporal Adolf Hitler sheltered in the crypt and painted a number of watercolours during his service on the Salient.

Churchill was first cousin with Hitler's father and the two had many shared characteristics, including speaking, painting and an interest in architecture. Both were Tavistock trained and they may have met during Hitler's Tavistock training in England (February–November 1912). Both were protected Intelligence personnel and could roam around and even exchange information and greetings across lines. Since they were stationed a mile apart and both were painters and the church was the only architectural feature in the area worth painting, it was military intelligence destiny that they met.

This was a planned military bonding exercise, something that would be their secret. One is unlikely to ever find an official record or a witness who lived to tell the tale, and it would only have been recorded in occult channels, and even then, only orally.

In the late 1930s, Hitler sent a telegram to Churchill promising the Wehrmacht would always support Britain in time of trouble – which it did by sabotaging, then abandoning the Battle of Britain, and focusing on OP BARBAROSSA in Russia.

During Winston Churchill's command of the 6th RSF he did not participate in any set battle; however, news reports said "there are reports of close escapes and some daring escapades".[3] Although Winston was a cavalryman and had a rather sticky start, his reputation with the troops was excellent. There wasn't going to be an enemy to fight as long as Winston Churchill was there, so of course they encouraged him to stay. Churchill was used to manufacturing heroism. It was something he had learnt from previous wars.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Kitchener knew what Winston was about and refused to allow him into his army. Kitchener died soon after this decision on 5 June 1916. Behind W.C.'s back the slang of the Ploegsteert trenches went . . .

"Alf a mo, no Abdul stew or Alleyman Anzac soup for this bon Tommy. It's all axil grease not arsapeek for this Bags of Banger, Dog and Maggot . . . gunfire, no hard tack and grungey. It's all Lance Corporal Bacon."

"He's a Base Rat who won't touch no banjo or corkscrew. He's a French battle bowler. Hom forty on the goggle-eyed bugger with the tits."

"He's a numbers dry Donkey Wallopper with duckboard. No bellyache for this rattlesnake. He won't draw crabs. Jack's friend. No Jerry up. His days as a duckboard harrier dodging duds are over."

"Obnoxious dug-out by K of K. No iggry jump off or jildi jumping bags for the old sweat."

"He's no pull-through."

"One blind pig and he's in dock blanco blighty with Birdie. Bonzer brass in a brass hat, British warm with buckshee, dodging the column."

On 7 March 1916 Churchill spoke in Parliament as a serving soldier Member of Parliament and was poorly received. The 6th and 7th RSF then amalgamated (7 May 1916) and Churchill declined the offer to command a Brigade (actually a demotion). This provided him with an opportunity to exit the army, which he did the following day (8 May 1916).

His record showed he served 6 months (Nov. 1915–8 May 1916); however, he was only in France from December 1915 to 3 March 1916 (3 months max), spent 2 months of his training in the Reserves out of fire, then five weeks max in the Reserves, with one or two shows on the front. He only saw 48 hours of action in December 1915 under someone else's command, during which time he was treated as a celebrity and kept in the Reserves away from any front-line action.

Like all previous wars, Churchill was primarily a spy for the expansion of that war and saw a maximum of four days on the Front. Reports from WWI soldiers say they never saw him, nor met anyone who saw him there. It was all for show. It was kudos-building within the media.

While in the army, Churchill wrote to his wife complaining of the small and weak colonial army against the huge professional German army. When he returned to Parliament in June 1916 he promoted compulsory conscription by an Act of Parliament as the key to swelling the British Colonial Forces.

> This was the true purpose of Churchill's visit to the front lines. He joined the army to build up kudos within its ranks so that he could promote compulsory conscription so that more commoners would die and the war would expand. Despite Germany having superior forces, the war was abruptly ended at 11 am on 11 November 1918 with Germany announced as the loser.

In July 1917, Churchill was appointed Minister of Munitions, many of which were sabotaged or sold to the Germans to bomb the British. The incendiary bombs in particular were prolific in German WWII blitzkriegs over London. After the end of the war Churchill served as both Secretary of State for War and Secretary of State for Air (1919–21).

Toxic gas (chlorine) was first used by the British on 25 September 1915 at Loos, the centre of Northern France's coalfields. After WWI, on the possible use of gas weapons, Churchill wrote:

> "I do not understand this squeamishness about the use of gas. We have definitely adopted the position at the Peace Conference of ... gas as a permanent method of warfare. It is sheer affectation . . . to boggle at making his eyes water . . . I am strongly in favour of using poisoned gas . . . The moral effect should be so good . . . necessary to use only the most deadly gases: gases can be used which cause great inconvenience and would spread a lively terror and yet would leave no serious permanent effects on most of those affected."

Churchill may or may not have appreciated that accidents with gas in the trenches were all too common, all too lethal, and the prevailing winds were coming from the German side.

During this time (1919–21), Churchill undertook with surprising zeal the cutting of military expenditure. This gave Germany the advantage as they ignored the Treaty of Versailles, just as the British knew they would. However, the major preoccupation of Churchill's tenure in the War Office was the Allied intervention in the Russian Civil War, which Churchill had helped create by training Stalin in the Sidney Street Siege exercise in January 1911.

Churchill was a staunch advocate of foreign intervention, declaring that Bolshevism must be "strangled in its cradle". He secured from a divided and loosely organised Cabinet an intensified and prolonged British involvement beyond the wishes of Parliament or the nation. It wasn't until 1920 that the last British forces were withdrawn from Russia. Churchill was also instrumental in sending arms to the Poles when they invaded Russia's Ukraine.

Churchill then became Secretary of State for the Colonies (1921) and was a signatory of the Anglo-Irish treaty of 1921. This established the Irish Free State, but only after Irish genealogy had been degraded with the theft of the Irish Crown Jewels by British Freemasons.

The government fell in the 1922 General Election and Churchill lost his ministerial office, his seat and his appendix all in the same month. Two years later, in the General Election of 1924, Churchill was unexpectedly appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. This was due to his house father's posthumous Magister Magistrorum influence and his biological father, Prince 'Bertie' Edward, who had a propensity to give away jewellery to his mistresses, one of whom was Winston's mother from eight to nine months before Winston was born, and with little break.

> Winston was passed immediately to a wet nurse and Jennie Jerome then carried on her affair with Bertie.

Winston Churchill went on to oversee the UK's disastrous return to the Gold Standard which resulted in deflation, unemployment and the miners' strike that led to the 1926 General Strike.

By the mid-1920s many regarded Churchill as being obsessed with continuing his father's political battles from fifteen years earlier. But there are questions over why. His father had died in 1895, there are questions over Winston's parentage, and it was his biological father Prince Edward who was posthumously influencing Churchill's path.

Lord Randolph Churchill and Winston Churchill looked nothing alike and Winston's mother, like her mother before her, was a high-society muse. She would root anything with money or status and gave rise to a plethora of confused parentage that that high society suffered from, as did the generation before it. This meant that many illegitimate royals were promoted into politics to act as proxy for the monarchy.

Both Winston's mother and grandmother were born cuckolders (as was his wife's mother). This brought constant entertainment and confusion to the family tree. It is widely rumoured that Churchill's mother was part Iroquois Indian, but the family tree covered this up with sustained and "proud" marriages, many just after conception.

To create a Warmonger for an International Bankers' war:

1. Hook a woman up with an influential man with the right socio-economic connections.
2. Put the woman in a loose situation and get her pregnant before the future husband does. This may involve providing other entertainment for the husband.
3. Ensure the stepfather is a distant father and absent by the time the son is old enough to question, let alone the public. Absent includes 'dead'.
4. Ensure the biological father remains distant but influential.
5. Never photograph the stepfather and son together, especially once the child's features have formed.
6. Never photograph the biological father and son together and obscure the biofather's name during all of their lifetimes and those of their children.
7. The biological father guides his son's career from behind the scenes. This includes privileged schooling, unexpected promotions and gifts via others to the mother. This guidance is continued through surviving family members.
8. Ensure the mother has little biological contact with the child. Get a wet nurse. Dehumanising the child helps to create a warlord. This is done with an absent stepfather of great influence, a denied biological father of great importance, a society mother who uses a wet nurse, boarding schools and military training.
9. This helps confuse the child between right and wrong and allows them to feel morally right when doing horrendous wrongs – at least they get the attention they lacked.
10. Instil the stepfather's political battles in the child but finance the biological father's real battles.

As soon as the 19-year-old high-society muse Jennie Jerome (daughter of newspaper magnate Leonard Walter Jerome) met Lord Randolph Churchill, she joined him in Prince 'Bertie' Edward's fashionable high-society set. Among that set were the Baron Rothschilds. They were not named individually, just as the Baron Rothschilds. They were also Prince Edward's bankers as they had owned the Bank of England since 1815 and would regularly supply the unemployed Prince 'Bertie' Edward with jewellery to give to the women they approved of being there. These were any breeding women with enough status, money or beauty to be of influence.

Jennie Jerome was known to wear this jewellery and historians have just assumed that it was from Bertie, because that was his pattern. None assumed that it was from the Rothschilds. The Rothschilds later assisted Prince Edward in the 1907 heist of the Irish Crown Jewels, which went to the Rothschilds in return for funding Scott's Antarctic expedition, after which a vast area of Antarctica was named "Edward VII Peninsula".

This was no beef to the Rothschilds as Edward, Prince of Wales was one of their biological sons — fathered and grandfathered by Nathan Mayer Rothschild.

Winston Churchill was born 7½ months after the day of marriage. There was little ceremony, it was a hushed and rushed affair, and there was much fuss about him being born premature which made it to the media. However, it is more likely that the wedding went ahead when his mother was six weeks pregnant, and pregnant to another man, a man with influence over Lord Randolph (Spencer) Churchill . . . now that's a very rich and powerful man indeed.

Certainly, as soon as Lord Randolph Churchill married Jennie Jerome, his finances bubbled up and he had a rapid, though short-lived, rise to political fame – faster in beginning and end than any other in history.

Randolph Churchill's political career ended abruptly when, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, he bluffed his resignation. He expected the unconditional surrender of Cabinet and his restoration to office on his own terms, but the bluff was called, accepted, and he resigned all on the same day (20 December 1886) and never returned to front-line politics. Winston had just turned 12.

Randolph Churchill continued to sit in Parliament as a backbencher, spending most of his time at sport, travel, high society and at the racetrack, but his health declined rapidly from syphilis in 1890. When the public found out, no one blamed him. The general response was, 'No wonder, with a wandering wife like that'.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

In 1891 when Winston was just 16, Randolph Churchill left England for South Africa (Cape Colony, the Transvaal and Rhodesia), shot lions and recorded his impressions for a London newspaper, later published as Men, Mines and Animals in South Africa. He also criticised British politicians. Randolph gave a speech to Parliament in 1893, but the syphilis had taken hold and he was widely disregarded. By 1894 he was viewed as an object of pity. Randolph took off again, in September of 1894, this time with his wife Jennie Jerome, and returned at Christmas very ill and virtually paralysed. He spent six weeks bedridden and then died on 24 January 1895. Winston had just turned 20 and was still training at the Royal Military Academy. During his life, Lord Randolph Spencer Churchill regularly denied Winston Churchill was his son.

Winston spent the first twenty years of his life on a wet nurse with his nanny 'Woom' Everest (1874–75), in boarding school (1881–92), at the Royal Military Academy (1892–94) and then in Cuba (1895), where he reported for London's Daily Graphic.

Winston saw little of his father and even less from 1891 to 1895 (16–20). They were rarely, if ever, photographed together for public use. It was important to the British Monarchy to kill off either the biological father or the faux father to prevent comparison. In Winston's case it was to prevent showing a miraculous lack of resemblance between Randolph Churchill and Winston Churchill – hence Randolph Churchill's banishment to South Africa for four years.

The Rothschilds weren't photographed either. This was something they insisted on from the first production camera in 1839. They didn't exactly have to be quick. By 1850, the Photographer's Kit required a horse-drawn wagon. The first folding camera appeared in 1890 and the first pocket camera in 1899. Trouble really started with the first petite camera with matching lipstick holder in 1930. It was the universal agent Wallis Simpson who took advantage of this for the benefit of Germany.

As soon as Randolph Churchill waned and stopped writing for the papers, Winston Churchill took his place, reporting from Cuba for the Daily Graphic. This gave continuity to the 'Churchill' name and did not go unsupported by the New York Times. Although Leonard Jerome had died in 1891, his daughter Lady Jennie Jerome Churchill still had enough influence to keep W.C. in the media spotlight. The era of Winston Churchill's heroism had begun.

Winston Churchill's return to the Gold Standard had a similar effect on Germany and led to the rise of the Fascists. Churchill's return to the Gold Standard was Hitler's path to power. Churchill monitored what the Gold Standard did to Germany and began issuing warnings of the German Nazi threat, something he had helped to engineer in more ways than one. At the same time, Churchill claimed the Italian fascism of Mussolini had "rendered a service to the whole world" and was "a way to combat subversive forces" – like the commoners' rights to a square meal. 'Square' was a reference to the Freemasons and 'on the square' and 'the square mile of the centre of London', which was full of International Banks' – the players of war.

During the 1926 General Strike, Churchill harked back to the British Empire's glory days when Kitchener murdered 27,000 Dervishes by machine-gun in five hours . . . Churchill suggested machine-guns be used on the striking British miners.

The decision to return to the Gold Standard prompted the economist John Maynard Keynes to write The Economic Consequences of Mr. Churchill, arguing that the return to the Gold Standard would lead to a worldwide depression, which it did. Churchill later regarded this as one of the worst decisions of his life, but one he had to make in order to create WWII and support his nephew Hitler.

> Churchill had acted on the advice of Montague Norman, the Governor of the Bank of England, of whom John Maynard Keynes said: "Always so charming, always so wrong." Montague Norman was the mystery financial champion of the Nazi Party while he was Governor of the Bank of England.
> No one but a very privileged few realised that the Bank of England substantially stood behind the Nazis. This was the greatest secret of WWII. That, and the fact that the incendiary bombs dropped on London were manufactured in Illingford in 1938 and exported to Germany before WWII began. The London Fire Brigade who found this out after a London Blitz were sworn to secrecy and intimidated by the entire British Intelligence structure. They were told to "shut up or face death by firing squad".

During this time of Masonic warring influence, the Masonic warring Churchill edited the Government's newspaper, the British Gazette. During the 1926 General Strike he argued that "either the country will break the General Strike, or the General Strike will break the country". Churchill had developed this manipulative unarguable language at boarding school while trying to render his way back home to his socialite mother who ignored him – as she was instructed to do.

The Conservative Government was defeated in the 1929 General Election and Churchill was not invited to join the 1931 Cabinet. For Churchill, 1929–39 were his 'wilderness years', and he supposedly wrote a four-volume biography of his ancestor, John Churchill, the 1st Duke of Marlborough (Marlborough: His Life and Times, pub. 1933–38) and A History of the English Speaking Peoples (not published until 1958). It is questionable that it was written between 1929–39, or whether he wrote it, and Marlborough was not his relative from the lines he claimed.

'Marlborough' sounds nice and rolls around in the mouth quite well and he too had oil paintings made of himself, but little else about him warrants bragging rights.

John Churchill (1650–1722) was a brilliant general and a lousy politician whose ties to the Crown were through the sack. He married (1678) Sarah Jennings, an attendant to Princess Anne, and was elevated to Baron in 1685 when James II became king.

His elder sister, Arabella Churchill (1648–1730), began service in the royal household under the Duchess of York, King James II's wife, but soon progressed to services under the King. She became one of his mistresses and they had two children together, James Fitzjames (Duke of Berwick) and Henry Fitzjames (Duke of Albemarle). 'Fitz' means the illegitimate child of royalty.

John Churchill commanded the Royal Army during the Battle of Sedgemoor that defeated the Monmouth Revolt, earning the ire of the Protestants. As judicial punishment, Hanging Judge Jeffries invented mass death sentences. This eventually became the British judicial tactic used against large numbers of Boers and Mau.

John Churchill deserted King James II after the Hale Case three years later (1688), and captured Lille twenty years later (1708), for which he was given the title Duke of Marlborough and enough coin to build Blenheim Palace. Four years later, when his aging wife fell from royal favour, he was charged with embezzling (1712) and lived in exile in Europe for two years, returning in 1714 when the German King George I was crowned King of Great Britain. He later became a political general, earning all sorts of fees and bribes and despatching bods left right and centre.

It was said of John Churchill that, sodomy apart, he introduced most other corruption into the British Army. The only reason he was unsuccessful with sodomy was the large numbers of English and Irish women who followed the drum. Some acquired the title "Mother", indicating they had made the transition to 'Soldier's Sainthood', some through sexual services.

Florence Nightingale.

The most famous was the legendary Mother Trimble who called everyone "Duck", "Ducks" or "Ducky", regardless of rank. She assisted the Parlimentary Army during the English Civil War and was genuinely kind, unlike that famous monster of the upper classes Florence Nightingale.

His nephew James Fitzjames (1670–1734) became the Duke of Berwick in 1687 (aged 16) and was nominated as Knight of the Garter in 1688 (aged 17) but failed to turn up for three months so the elevation was withdrawn. James Fitzjames also fled England in the 1688 'Glorious Revolution' and was stripped of all his titles in 1690. He then secured the throne for Philip V of Spain by fighting against the British in 1707.

You can't trust the illegitimate children of royalty, which sadly, includes Winston Churchill.

During this period, Churchill was notable as an outspoken critic of India's independence and he opposed Gandhi who was assassinated on 30 January 1948. The monarchs helped Churchill thwart India's independence by handing out medals like the Order of the Star of India, the Order of the Indian Empire and the Order of the Crown of India.

The Order of the Star of India (GCSI, 1861–1947) was given to Princes or Chiefs of India and British subjects for loyal service (toadies) and groundbreaking service (quelling rebellions through mass murder). Recipients included mass murderers like Lord Horatio Herbert Kitchener GCSI. The Order of the Indian Empire (GCIE, 1877–1947) was added by Queen Victoria on 31 December 1877 and the Order of the Crown of India (for women only) was added the following day (1 January 1878). It was given to British Princesses (her relatives), the wives of Indian Princes as well as their female relatives, and other Indian ladies. The gifting of the Crown of India to high Indian women brought compliance and support for British rule. It was basking in the glory of colonialism, and the Indians' hatred of the British is carried in silence to this day.

Soon Churchill's attention was drawn to the rise of his Tavistock protégé Adolf Hitler and the dangers of Germany's rearmament. For a time he was a lone voice calling on Britain to strengthen itself and counter the belligerence of Germany. Churchill was a fierce critic of Neville Chamberlain's appeasement of Hitler, but he was also an outspoken supporter of the Hitler lackey King Edward VIII, during his abdication crisis.

There was speculation that if King Edward VIII refused to abdicate, Churchill would become Prime Minister. However, King Edward VIII did abdicate and Winston Churchill was cast off into a political wilderness once again, this time for three years. King Edward VIII was Winston Churchill's nephew, but then so was King George VI.

At the outbreak of WWII (9 Sept. 1939), Churchill was once again appointed First Lord of the Admiralty and became one of the highest-profile ministers during the so-called "Bore War" because the only noticeable action was at sea (1939–40). Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain, who appointed Churchill, was then forced to resign (10 May 1940) and Churchill succeeded him, creating an all-party government and appointing his Masonic-warring-self as Minister of Defence. During this early part of WWII (the 'Bore War at Sea'), Churchill presided over his first war crime with the murder of a U-boat crew in cold blood.

After Churchill's appointment in 1939, Speer turned up in Hitler's office in the Reichschancellory and found a disconsolate Goering mourning Churchill's appointment: "Now we are for it. Churchill has been appointed First Sea Lord."

Churchill immediately put his friend and confidant, industrialist and newspaper baron Lord Beaverbrook, in charge of aircraft production. It was Beaverbrook's astounding business acumen that allowed Britain to quickly gear up aircraft production and engineering that eventually made the difference in the war. He was also in the business of stealing the Luftwaffe manufacturing schedules, something which Goering was complicit in providing as the British had funded the completion of Goering's Carinhall mansion in Germany.

1925 Morris Cowley.

1936 Spitfire.

Billy Morris built cars badly. His Merlin engines were fitted into Spitfire planes, but they were built so badly each one had to be re-machined, re-assembled and fitted individually. Even then they were failing at relatively low running times. The largest collection of Merlin engines was then destroyed by the Abwehr, MI-5, or both working together. This was deemed a huge loss at the time, but was actually a saving grace as the Merlins were as crappy as his Morris cars. Lord Beaverbrook was Lord Privy Seal, minister of supply and Lend-Lease administrator with the USA, so there was no limit to what he could arrange or finance.

> During WWII some fine speeches were attributed to Churchill. Dunkirk, 4 June 1940: "We shall defend our island, whatever the cost may be, we shall fight on the beaches, we shall fight on the landing grounds, we shall fight in the fields and in the streets, we shall fight in the hills; we shall never surrender."
> Battle of Britain, 18 June 1940: "Let us therefore brace ourselves to our duties, and so bear ourselves that, if the British Empire and its Commonwealth last for a thousand years, men will still say, 'This was their finest hour'."
> Battle of Britain, 20 August 1940: "Never in the face/field of human conflict was so much owed by so many to so few."

The Allied fighter pilots who won the Battle of Britain then became known as "The Few". They're quite dry the British, and lazy. They only accept reality once someone else has accomplished it for them. All the Germans had to do to win the Battle of Britain was to use drop tanks on all of their planes, instead of just the Me110.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

It was not realised at the time but the RAF failed to follow up on the crashes of "The Few". Comparatively recently, human remains have been found in British aircraft crashed in soft ground. The RAF always act with suitable arrangement and the Army were always called out to guard every German aircraft, but not British ones. The number of RAF aircraft downed by friendly barrage balloons and friendly anti-aircraft guns has never been published, but they substantially outnumber Luftwaffe downed by the same equipment.

> Many of the recordings of these speeches were not by Winston Churchill but Norman Shelley. Churchill also had speech-writers which meant he had nothing to do with some of these speeches other than to turn up drunk and have the re-recording passed to someone else.[4]

Churchill initiated the Special Operations Executive (SOE) under Hugh Dalton's Ministry of Economic Warfare, which established covert, subversive and partisan operations in occupied territories with notable success. Their Commandos established the pattern for most of the Special Forces to follow. Being a Mafia (Stalin) run country, the Russians gave Churchill a new name, the "British Bulldog", which had a friendly but menacing tone. His British codename was "Winnie", hence Operation WINNIE THE POOH to remove his cousin's son (Hitler) out of Berlin.

Churchill met Roosevelt at Ship Harbour, Argentia, Newfoundland (9–12 August 1941). Here they organised the British and American hierarchy to aid the Japanese attack of Pearl Harbor – America's ticket into WWII. Codenamed Riviera, a completely different press release made it to the public. This was called the 'Atlantic Charter'.

Churchill then addressed the US Congress (Dec. 1941 & May 1942) and travelled to Moscow (August 1942 & May 1944).

> Some of Churchill's military actions during WWII could only be described as depopulation exercises. After the Japanese had successfully taken Burma, they threatened to take British-controlled India. Churchill then denied famine relief and 2.5 million Bengalis starved to death in the Great Bengal Famine of 1943.

---

[4] For clarification see Hitler Was A British Agent, 2005, 2006, p. 61.

Churchill also instigated the terror bombing of 'everywhere', starting with the appointment of the known maniac 'Bomber' Harris, who didn't care who he bombed as long as they were alive before he started. Another colleague's equally disparaging remarks went, "Not a great lover of wogs, old Bomber".

> Churchill began bombing Dresden on 13/14 February 1945, three months before the end of WWII. Dresden was of little or no military value. It was primarily a civilian target, doubling in size in the previous 18 hours with 600,000 refugees on the day of the bombing. According to the official British statistics of the time, 13,000 people died out of a possible 1.2 million, but this was Post-WWII white propaganda.

Dresden before the bombing: 'Florence of the North'.

Bombing Dresden rid England of the problem of housing East European refugees once the war was over, and many British considered these people untermenschem (people not considered worthy of living), which was exactly the same attitude as Hitler and his fascists. The East European refugees were human footballs, with the British and German governments passing them to each other. In the back door the messages were "You kill them" . . . "No, you kill them" . . . "Nooo, you kill them".

These East European untermenschem were not Nordic-Anglo-Saxon colonists, but farmers from the Middle Ages. They were people who could put their house on their back, walk across continents and survive winters as well as their livestock. Churchill actually asked for "suggestions on how to blaze 600,000 refugees". Many of them were Jews.

The old Saxon city of Dresden was one of the great cultural centres of northern Europe. It was an ancient city of artists and craftsmen and referred to as 'the Florence of the North'. During WWII it made cigarettes and china and had been a hospital city for wounded soldiers for the last year of the war. No military units and no anti-aircraft batteries were deployed from the city. Dresden had been spared aerial bombing because it was a benevolent city of no military value.

There was only one squadron of planes stationed in Dresden but they were flown out just before the Dresden bombings, as if on cue. The British High Command contacted the German High Command, namely their British agent Hermann Goering, and any possible German resistance was removed. The city of Dresden was then open for attack.

Dresden after the bombing: 'The City of Death'.

Dresden was a defenceless, non-military, unprotected, open city, heavily populated with civilians, the war sick, and refugees, who made up 50% of the recently doubled population. From 10.09 pm on 13 February to 11.11 am on 14 February 1945, Dresden was bombed in a depopulation exercise that killed more than the Hiroshima and Nagasaki nuclear strikes four months later.[5] Winston Churchill ordered the destruction of Dresden and it was the world's fastest ever depopulation exercise. Planned and executed to cause the greatest number of civilian deaths, it left all other war leaders on the bleachers looking like benevolent saints. Churchill ordered the biggest depopulation exercise of WWII.

[5] 290,000 died at Hiroshima and Nagasaki: 140,000 at Hiroshima and 75,000 at Nagasaki, where another 75,000 initially survived due to the topography, but died of radiation-related sickness soon after.

On Shrove Tuesday (13 February 1945), 600,000 refugees fled the Russian Army in Breslau and flooded Dresden, carrying only fearful accounts of Soviet savagery. The city doubled its numbers to 1.2 million and the refugees camped on the bitterly cold winter streets. The mood of the city was grim, but Dresden always had a carnival on Shrove Tuesday. Bands of little girls paraded about in carnival dress and the circus played to a full house.

When the first air-raid alarms sounded, the war-weary wandered into the shelters believing the alarms to be false as the city had never experienced an air raid. They were already in a state of shock that this was their life. They did not quite believe that there could be any more hell than the Russians had just inflicted on them. Such Soviet savagery had caused 600,000 refugees to walk 60 miles in one day.

It was a case of the Russians herding sheoples to the slaughter on behalf of the British. Those refugees that did not walk towards Dresden were shot and the Germans complied by not interfering with the migration. All sides wanted the refugees dead: Britain, Germany, Russia and America. For the unarmed refugees, their only refuge was their feet. They had to walk in a certain direction and that direction was Dresden.

The bomb shelters quickly filled up. Many were left on the bitterly cold streets. Once the city was full (1.2 million) there was no escape; 13 hours and 4 minutes of British and American (but largely British) saturation bombing began at 10.09 pm on 13 February 1945. It was to be the worst man-made killing of all time and Shrove Tuesday was to become the New World Order's 'International Day of Shame'.

Historians unanimously agree that Dresden had no military value, and its only military target, 60 miles away, was not bombed, nor were the railway tracks. The Yalta Conference (4–11 February 1945) had finished two days earlier, and a post-WWII nation's status was based on the number of enemy deaths. Churchill wanted a "thunderclap of Anglo-American annihilation" to present as a trump card to Stalin, but bad weather had prevented the bombing of Dresden until after the Yalta Conference. Churchill went without his trump card and Stalin was gifted much of Eastern Europe. Roosevelt opposed the gifting of so much of Eastern Europe to Stalin and was killed before the Potsdam Conference (17 July–2 August 1945) could confirm the post-war carve-up.

Avro Lancasters flying in loose formation.

An aerial view of the Dresden bombing with a Lancaster dropping a load.

Regardless of this, Churchill was still keen on the Dresden genocide to "disrupt and confuse" the German civilian population behind the lines. It was psychological warfare and it sent a message to the Germans that there was 'nowhere safe to hide'.

The first attack lasted 24 minutes (10.09–10.33 pm). It was "Precision Saturation Bombing" where all the small fires joined to create one big firestorm. This created an artificial tornado of fire so huge that all the available air was sucked out of the streets and into the blazing inferno. The fire winds carried large debris and people were drawn airborne into it. Others were running down the streets with their hair and clothes on fire, screaming until they fell down, or buildings collapsed on top of them. The flaming tornado was so high, the bomber pilots could still see it as they descended onto English soil.

After the first bombing, tens of thousands of surviving civilians left their shelters and escaped to the only places that weren't burning – the 1.5-square mile Grosser Garten, the banks of the River Elbe and the outskirts of the city.

The second British/American raid took this into account and came three hours later at 1.22 am 14 February 1945 with no air-raid warning. Twice as many bombers returned with a massive load of 500,000 phosphorus incendiary bombs (more than 700,000 dropped in total).

The raging firestorm was spread to Grosser Garten and engulfed the entire 1.5-square mile area. A sheet of flame ripped across the grass, uprooted trees and carried corpses and debris into the remaining high branches. The temperature in the centre of the city reached 1600°C. Virtually all those on the surface in the city of Dresden died from these two strikes, in 3½ hours.

Oxygen was sucked out from most of the bomb shelters and those who weren't directly bombed or burnt to death, died of suffocation. Others perished in the blast of white heat, hot enough to melt human flesh. Many hiding underground simply disintegrated into cinders or melted and all that was left was a greasy human waste up to 4 feet (1.2 m) deep. Most of those who survived remained huddled in tunnels far enough away from the city centre to maintain oxygen and waited for the second firestorm to die down.

There were few people left to tidy up the genocide and corpses were photographed in the treetops for days afterwards. The resulting photographs were then blamed on the Nazi Jewish atrocities in the Post-WWII BLACK PROPAGANDA that still rages today. This is loosely run by the Jews with paedophile non-Jews bribed to assist them.

On 14 February 1945 from 10.33 am to 11.11 am American bombers and Mustangs pounded the remaining city for 38 minutes. It was a lighter attack but focused on eliminating any survivors. US Mustangs flew low over the city and strafed anything that moved including refugees; hospital patients and their nursing staff on the banks of the River Elbe; thousands of old men, women and children who had escaped the city; as well as a column of rescue vehicles rushing towards the city. A flock of vultures then escaped from the zoo and picked over their remains. This was an occult hit of gargantuan proportions that destroyed any and all culture in what was a city of peace. Dresden would now be remembered for something different. The occult shifted Dresden from 'The Florence of the North' to 'The City of Death' and it was Churchill's doing – Churchill the occult son of King Edward VII.

After 13 hours, Dresden looked like the horror movies that were to come. It resembled craters on the moon and inspired such post-civilisation movies as Planet of the Apes. Much of the Royal Air Force and Dresden airmen were ashamed of what Bomber Harris had commanded them to do. Some accepted their medals, some refused to wear them and some threw them away. There was rebellion within the army of the occult.

Dresden.

Between 260,000 and 600,000 people were slaughtered in one night, upwards of a third to half of the Dresden population. The dead comprised mostly unarmed refugees, wounded soldiers, their doctors and nurses, the elderly, women and children, and those coming to the rescue.[6]

Dresden.

More than 260,000 bodies and residues of bodies were counted, but those who melted or disintegrated could not be traced. Most of the 600,000 refugees died. The best way to estimate the death toll is to subtract the number of survivors from the 1.2 million known to have been in the city at the time. When this is done, the number of survivors is very small indeed.

The number of dead is closer to 1 million in 13 hours.
Dresden was a depopulation exercise, the magnitude of which the world had never seen before.

Sixteen hundred acres of land were destroyed in the world's most deadly thirteen-hour period. By comparison, only 600 acres of London were damaged during all of WWII. Embedded historians have suggested that Dresden was a payback for the bombing of Coventry, but only 380 were killed in Coventry (1939–45) and it was a legitimate military target storing munitions. The mountains of corpses left in Dresden were then presented by the prosecution team at the Nuremberg Trials as "evidence" of Nazi atrocities against Jewish concentration-camp inmates. This is called 'Post-War BLACK PROPAGANDA' and was used to humiliate the Germans and create sympathy for the Jews. As a result, Germany financed much of the State of Israel after the war and this act is only now being questioned.

SERIAL No. D.83/5

WITHDRAWN

GENERAL ISMAY FOR C.O.S. COMMITTEE.
C. A. S.

It seems to me that the moment has come when the question of bombing of German cities simply for the sake of increasing the terror, though under other pretexts, should be reviewed. Otherwise we shall come into control of an utterly ruined land. We shall not, for instance, be able to get housing materials out of Germany for our own needs because some temporary provision would have to be made for the Germans themselves. The destruction of Dresden remains a serious query against the conduct of Allied bombing. I am of the opinion that military objectives must henceforward be more strictly studied in our own interests rather than that of the enemy.

The Foreign Secretary has spoken to me on this subject, and I feel the need for more precise concentration upon military objectives, such as oil and communications behind the immediate battle-zone, rather than on mere acts of terror and wanton destruction, however impressive.

If ever there was a European war crime, Winston Churchill's British and American depopulation of Dresden on the 13/14 February 1945 was it. Although President Roosevelt was killed soon after (12 April 1945), it was a war crime for which Winston Churchill was not tried at Nuremberg. Such is the fate of the winners of war and history is left to try them posthumously.

Winston Churchill, WWII's greatest killer, 'the Butcher of Gallipoli', 'the Demon of Dresden', was knighted with Britain's highest honour, the Knight of the Garter, on 24 April 1953 and was then awarded Europe's highest honour, the Charlemagne Award (Karlspreis), from the German city of Aachen near the Belgian/Dutch border on 10 May 1956.

The Charlemagne has been gifted from the city of Aachen since its inception in 1950. It was first awarded on Ascension Day 1950 to Richard Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, the founder of the Pan-European Movement, after which even bolder financial steps were made towards building the common house of Europe.

Churchill.

'Ascension Day' is the day the Catholics dedicate the next 12 months to lying.

'Charlemagne' is an interesting choice of name for the common house of Europe as it was used by the Germans to name the SS Division of the Waffen that served in Russia. The Charlemagne Waffen SS won their final accolade by guarding Hitler in Berlin in the last days of WWII. For this they adhered to Ascension Day. Most of these Berlin survivors were Alsatian and ended up in Vietnam with the French Foreign Legion.

Churchill was presented with the Charlemagne Award in 1956 for contributing to:

> "European unification and defending the highest earthly goods – European freedom, humanity and peace. Charlemagne is awarded to the founding fathers of a United Europe who have embodied hope for the integration of a voluntary union > of European peoples without constraint and to safeguard the future of European children and their children's children."[7]

> Winston Churchill was an occult sadist who through murder compliance felt quite assured that he was the leading Nordic-Anglo-Saxon colonist of his times. He makes a mockery of the Charlemagne Award, but then so does the Charlemagne Award.
> Three years after Churchill, Charlemagne was awarded to American General George Catlett Marshall, who ensured Pearl Harbor was bombed without any American personnel in Hawaii being notified. With this in mind, Churchill characterised Marshall as 'the organiser of Allied victory'.

TIME magazine then voted Marshall 'Man of the Year' in March 1946. He became Secretary of State in 1947, started the Marshall Plan for the recovery of Europe (5 June 1947), received America's Distinguished Achievement Award for his WWII contribution (1948), became President of the American National Red Cross in 1949 (intelligence sluts) and Secretary of Defense in 1950 (very worrisome).

General George Catlett Marshall.

When communist hunter Senator Joseph McCarthy bypassed Churchill's accolades and pointed out the e-n-o-r-m-o-u-s errors of General Marshall's ways, which teetered on the wrong side of treason, General Marshall resigned in 1951.

However, this did not deter the communist collaborators, Nobel and Charlemagne. General George Catlett Marshall received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1953 (what a joke!), so it was safe enough to award him the Charlemagne on Ascension Day (7 May 1959) – for his Pan-European ideals of World War. At least Churchill was not alone. The Demon of Dresden had playmates in the Pan-Pacific. But the Charlemagne is a moralistic award and the kiss of death to those who are exposed, and General Marshall was dead within six months (16 October 1959).[8]

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

In 1947, as Secretary of State, General Marshall bought his Charlemagne by announcing the US was prepared to contribute to European recovery. This became known as the 'Marshall Plan' and helped Europe to quickly rebuild.

In 2002 the Charlemagne was awarded to the Euro (yes that's right, the currency) represented by the European Central Bank (President Wim Duisenberg). In 2003 it was given to the President of the European Convention (Valéry Giscard d'Estaing). In 2004 it was given to the European Parliament (President Pat Cox). The accession of ten new member states to the European Union on 1 May 2004 marked the beginning of a new age in the European integration process, the Pan-European movement. It's not a good look, but it is representative of our future.

[8] It was similar for Pope John Paul II, the 26-year Pontiff of the Roman Catholic Church who received an additional special Charlemagne on 24 March 2004 and was dead within 377 days. He too was shamed, this time for running a paedophile movement fronting as a religion, as opposed to running a paedophile movement fronting as a war. Both rely on absent fathers, both are occultists, and neither are 'spiritual'.

This is called believing in your own advertising and patting yourself on the back. “We are for a Pan-Europe, so we will award Pan-Europe and thereby acknowledge ourselves . . . after all, stones lifted on the Charlemagnes to date have revealed Gentlemen of Genocide.” Still, no awards have been revoked. The Charlemagne is a chameleon’s award, not for what they do, but for how the press presents them.

Official biographers still brush aside the atrocities of Churchill, or any description of him as WWII’s leading killer. First it was Hitler who was bad, then Stalin. Official biographers neglect to mention that Hitler and Stalin were both British agents, that Churchill played his part in training them, that Stalin was on the British side, that Churchill and Stalin shared the same great-grandfather, who was also Hitler’s great-great-grandfather – Mayer Amschel Rothschild (1743–1812).

Churchill, Hitler and Stalin were all relatives and all Rothschilds.

History focuses on Stalin as a leading killer because he became ‘the enemy’ of Western Europe soon after WWII in what became known as the Cold War, because it was not ‘hot’. This was something Churchill and Truman planned to a ‘T’ from Potsdam, to the lost nuclear bomb over Japan and their “Iron Curtain” speech in America in 1946.

For this, British Prime Minister Winston Leonard Spencer Churchill and American President Franklin Delano Roosevelt were described as “great democratic statesmen”. Our history books either need to be reviewed or declared ‘occult sanctuaries’ and the Biographical Encyclopedia ‘A History of Occultists’.

The Great Bengal Famine (1943) and the bombing of Dresden (1945) were both depopulation exercises with over three million people dead as a result. Not something you’d want on your résumé, so it was taken off Churchill’s.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -

Winston ‘Windsor-Rothschild’ Churchill’s résumé:

> “Killed three million people in two years with the stroke of a pen . . . oh and um another 10 million on the side over five years . . . couldn’t help myself . . . I’d been running the build-up for a long time, and helped train much of the opposition . . . least of my worries . . . where’s my cigar . . . let history judge me . . . my father was the King of England . . . where’s my cheque . . . where’s Woom . . . I never had any real parents.”

During WWII, Germany placed Germans in Polish houses and removed the Poles out of Poland, some to extermination camps and some to Germany (for labour and protection) including Dresden. When this was going on, Churchill stated in the House of Commons (1944):

> “Expulsion is the method which, insofar as we have been able to see, will be the most satisfactory and lasting. There will be no mixture of populations to cause endless trouble . . . A clean sweep will be made. I am not alarmed by these transferences, which are more possible in modern conditions.”

Churchill tried to convince Britons and the rest of the world that the only way to alleviate tensions between the Poles and the Germans was for the Poles to leave Poland during WWII, and to transfer nationalities in accordance with the new national borders . . . that Churchill and Stalin had established without consulting the exiled Polish government. This would not stand up in any court of enquiry. In these matters, Churchill was completely complicit with Hitler and Stalin, his two Kreigschule (War School) protégés.

> “The exact numbers and movement of ethnic populations over the Polish-German and Polish-USSR borders in the period at the end of World War II is extremely difficult to determine.”[9]

This was to allow Churchill’s killing of Jews (up to 860,000) in Dresden without the genocide being accountable to Britain. Even the photographic blame went to his first cousin’s son, Adolf Hitler.

Churchill was party to the post-WWII treaties that would re-draw European and Asian boundaries. Proposals for post-WWII European boundaries were discussed as early as the Tehran Conference (Nov. 1943) by Roosevelt and Churchill, with the settlement finally agreed by Truman, Churchill and Stalin at the Potsdam Conference (17 July–2 August 1945, Article XIII, Potsdam protocol).

[9] The Churchill Centre website.

Churchill claimed he tried to resist Stalin in carving up Europe, but Churchill instigated the idea with the resistive Roosevelt (1943). Roosevelt declined on too many countries and was killed by the captured German General Gehlen three weeks before WWII ended in Europe. Truman then replaced Roosevelt and agreed to Russia gaining all of these spheres of influence. His life depended on it.

Churchill knew of Roosevelt's impending assassination and confirmed the transfer of Eastern Europe to the communists with Truman by 2 August 1945. He also helped train his distant cousin Stalin (already a proven bank robber and murderer), installing him as the head of Russia. The British also took Stalin out.

Two of these East European boundaries concerned the borders between Poland and Russia (the Curzon line) and between Poland and Germany (the Oder-Neisse line). Despite the fact that Poland was the country that first resisted Hitler – Churchill, Truman and Stalin determined the boundary lines without consulting the Polish Government in exile.

Quite rightly, the Poles felt betrayed by Britain, a country they had fought alongside for all of WWII. The Poles also acted quite brilliantly as proxy British Intelligence Agents in Eastern Europe, something the Brits found as difficult as tipping their bowler hat to a commoner.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -

Churchill and Roosevelt also proposed the boundary between North Korea and South Korea and the removal of Japanese forces from these countries (Yalta Conference, 4–11 February 1945). Churchill and Truman ensured Stalin would have the greatest say in the post-WWII carve-up by refusing to get rid of the Japanese Kwantung Army in China, suggesting it was a huge job. They even had counter-intelligence spread scary bedtime stories at home. Stalin did the job in seven days (9–15 August 1945) and was then publicised as the most powerful man in Europe. Such are the paper tigers of war and the fortunes of bank robbers.

> The 4–11 February 1945 Yalta Conference is now described by many historians as the beginning of the Cold War.
> Churchill tried to cover this up by writing about it later, saying that he could not influence Stalin. He had trained him, for Christ's sake. Churchill was not the man history makes him out to be. He was the biological son of King Edward VII, the stepson of the Freemasons' Magister Magistrorum (the > Master Mason), and the grandson and great-grandson of the International Banker Nathan Mayer Rothschild.

> Both of Winston Churchill's fathers were the secret society planners of wars, as were his grandfathers on both sides, and they both instilled in Winston the means to carry out the largest war of all time and the largest crimes of all time.

Winston Churchill's mother then married (28 July 1900) and divorced (1914) Winston's half-brother George Frederick Myddleton Cornwallis-West and went on to remarry (1 June 1918) someone who looked incredibly like Winston's other half-brother, while Winston's biological father King Edward VII had been having sexual relations with his own daughter since she was 16, if not 15.

Patsy arranged for her daughter Daisy (28 June 1873–29 June 1943) to marry (8 December 1891) the richest German Prince, the Prince of Pless (23 April 1861–31 January 1938), with Daisy's biological father and former lover Prince 'Bertie' Edward attending the ceremony.

Of Winston Churchill it can be said:
"His mother married his brother".

Prince 'Bertie' Edward's only excuse was that Princess Maria Teresa Von Pless was from a previous liaison and didn't know she was his. I say "bullshit" as he had his hand in arranging the hushed and rushed marriage of her mother Patsy whose marriage date of 3 October 1872 was most likely 3 November 1872, with Mary 'Patsy' née Fitzpatrick Cornwallis-West 7½ weeks pregnant and the date officially backdated by royal decree.

> There were no constraints that required morality. These were scum that would be evicted from any and every neighbourhood. As a result, Churchill was a natural-born killer who hid behind the secret societies and finance that backed him – the Masons, the British Royal Family, the Rothschilds and their banks.

President Truman had delayed the Potsdam Conference so he could test the nuclear bomb. This was done successfully on 16 July 1945 in New Mexico and took the focus off royal incest and child sex abuse. It later killed many actors by cancer.[10]

Taking the focus off Royal incest.

[10] Upon further investigation, this was the result of rocks and plants from New Mexico placed in a Hollywood back lot. The cacti positively glowed in the dark and the US Army killed one of its most ardent allies. Actor John Wayne (Marion Robert Morrison) died of radioactive cacti cancer and plain old-fashioned incompetence.

Truman being sworn in.

During the spring and summer (March–August) of 1945, President Truman repeatedly agreed to use the bomb and took the official position that his decision (backed up by General Groves) was one of non-interference on proposals by the Secretary of War Henry Stimson and Secretary of State James Byrnes.

Stalin wanted to enter the Pacific War and had been preparing for it since October 1944. In July 1945, Emperor Hirohito was searching for a compromised peace plan that might allow Japan to retain some of its overseas territories. Stalin discussed these with Truman at the Potsdam Conference.

Presidents, babies and war.

President Truman and Secretary of State Byrnes already knew about this Japanese Peace Plan via American Intelligence reports, so they arrogantly considered nothing new had been proposed and dismissed it, indicating to Stalin that he should do the same.

treasurer@platinumparty.org

> As a result, Stalin promised to declare war on Japan by 15 August 1945. As a cunning 19th-and 20th-century criminal, this was the date at which Stalin concluded war with Japan.

On 26 July 1945, America, Britain and China issued the Potsdam Declaration demanding the Japanese Empire immediately surrender unconditionally or face “prompt and utter destruction”. A day earlier, President Truman had effectively ordered three atomic bombs dropped on Japan.

Lieutenant General Carl Spaatz, the commander of the newly created US Army Strategic Air Forces in the Pacific, requested written authorisation for the use of the atomic bomb. The Acting Army Chief of Staff in Washington, General Thomas Handy, contacted President Truman and Secretary of War Henry Stimson at the Potsdam Conference (17 July–2 August 1945).

Neither President Truman nor Secretary of War Henry Stimson issued a ‘stop order’ and General Thomas Handy gave the order to Lieutenant General Carl Spaatz on 25 July 1945 to drop the three atom bombs on Japan.[11] President Truman could have reversed the order at any time in the 15 days from 25 July to 9 August 1945.

Any size rocket as long as it’s white.

Truman overjoyed with nuclear war.

With a lot of unrecorded insider trading and secret society (Freemasons and Illuminati) complicity, on 28 July 1945, Prime Minister Suzuki announced that his government would ignore the Declaration. America dropped the bombs and Emperor Hirohito retained his position as emperor, although in a more subdued form, but with complete American support.

[11] The Curators of the National Air and Space Museum, The Last Act: The Atomic Bomb and the End of World War II.

There were four targets, Hiroshima, Kokura, Nagasaki and Niigata. Kokura was not hit due to bad weather and the third unexploded bomb was dropped on Niigata. The first bomb exploded at 8.15:15 am on 6 August 1945 over Hiroshima (500 miles from Tokyo). Like Dresden, this was the first time Hiroshima had been bombed in WWII. Unlike Dresden, Kyoto was ruled out because of its unrivalled beauty . . . at least that's the official story.

Major General Leslie R. Groves (1896–1970) graduated from West Point in 1918 with a degree in civil engineering. During the US military build-up, Major Groves served as the deputy commander of all Army construction projects and was a key figure in the building of the Pentagon. On 17 September 1942 he was assigned to lead the Manhattan Project – the atomic bomb.

The real story behind the location of the bombs was more personal. Major General Groves was the senior American officer that served on the President's special committee that briefed on the targets. They originally examined dropping the bombs on a forest, but Groves changed his mind. Bombing a forest was an empty question, and unless there were dead bodies lying around, the Japs wouldn't take it seriously. General Groves didn't want to go down in history as a killer of trees.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

By the end of May 1945 the committee selected, in order of priority, Kyoto, Hiroshima, Kokura and Niigata. In the meantime, the Army Air Forces were ordered not to firebomb these cities. General Groves had the ultimate say on what the committee recommended and was intrigued by the revelation that one of his senior American officers on the committee had a Japanese mistress and child living in Kyoto. As a result, Kyoto was discounted, not because of its beauty, but because of a mistress and an illegitimate child. By July 1945, Kyoto had been replaced by Nagasaki.

Truman was supposedly briefed on the atomic bomb for the first time by Secretary of War Stimson during his swearing in, but Truman is 'true by name and not by nature'. No historian realistically believes anything an American President says during wartime, and President Truman quickly became an insider and a career liar.

The true title of an American President is "Pirate Captain", as in 'Pirate Captain Truman' or 'Pirate Captain Temporary' – the title and codename of George W. Bush.

The atomic bombs cost US$2 billion to develop (around US$40 billion in 2007 figures). America, Britain and Canada worked together, with America taking the lead and Russia kept out of the picture. General Groves to his Los Alamos staff (24 December 1944):

"If this weapon fizzles, each of you can look forward to a lifetime of testifying before a congressional investigating committee." One of them did and everyone ignored it.

Fat Man.

In circles more realistic than embedded historians, Truman was briefed before he became president. The murder of President Roosevelt occurred on the basis that Truman, when president, would launch the atomic bomb regardless of any Japanese peace initiatives, whereas Roosevelt wouldn't, nor would he give Stalin Eastern Europe.

Roosevelt did not want the Cold War, whereas Truman, as president, was prepared to kill 290,000 people and gift Russia an unexploded atom bomb to ensure the Cold War went ahead as planned.

Brigadier General Tibbets.

Brigadier General Paul Warfield Tibbets Jr. (23 Feb. 1915–) had been up on morality charges and there were questions asked in official circles at the time as to whether he was too much of a moral reprobate to drop the atom bomb. All sorts of bods were queried with much soul-searching occurring at high levels. Even the old sodomite running the FBI was consulted and even Hoover was reportedly against it.

. . . named after Tibbets' mother.

Disregarding this, Tibbets became the pilot of the lead bomber and was briefed on The Manhattan Project from 17 September 1944 under President Roosevelt. Truman became Vice-President from January 1945 and Roosevelt "died unexpectedly" three months later.

When General Paul Tibbets dropped the first bomb on Hiroshima he had all the credit for the nuclear raid shone on him. As soon as he landed he was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross and then enshrined in the National Aviation Hall of Fame with 10 additions to his fruit salad. The rest of the crew only received Air Medals.[12]

The US B29 bomber 'Enola Gay' dropped the uranium 235 atom bomb on Hiroshima (500 miles from Tokyo) at 8.15 am on 6 August 1945. The 3-metre-long bomb weighing 3.6 tonnes (8000 lb) was dropped by parachute and exploded 580 metres (1885 ft) above the ground for maximum casualties. It had the equivalent power of 12,500 tonnes of TNT and was nicknamed 'Little Boy' after the recently deceased President Roosevelt. At the point of detonation the temperature reached several million degrees Celsius, creating a fireball which accelerated the radiation into a severe expanding shock wave.

Hiroshima.

[12] The British observer and undercover agent Leonard Cheshire was also on board. He tried to do some good after WWII and created Cheshire Homes but was genuinely tortured by his wartime experiences and suffered from TB.

At the time, 350,000 Japanese citizens and military personnel were in Hiroshima and it was timed for maximum casualties, with many of the civilians walking to work. The area was mainly high-density administrative and commercial buildings jam-packed with people as only the Asians can do. At a 500-metre radius there was 100% destruction of all concrete structures and at a 2-kilometre radius there was at least a 50% kill rate with complete destruction of all wooden structures.

Over 13 square kilometres (5 square miles) 76,000 buildings were destroyed. Only 8% escaped damage. Within four days, the Hiroshima City Survey Section estimated 140,000 people had died from the first nuclear strike. Considering the long-term effects of radiation sickness, genetic and chromosome injury, mental trauma and unborn children being mentally and physically retarded, the death toll has continued to grow.

Hiroshima aftermath.

America's next target was the city of Kokura, now part of Kitakyushu, but it was covered in heavy cloud so the aircraft was diverted to the unlucky bright skies above Nagasaki. An American B29 bomber dropped a second atomic bomb by parachute at 11.02 am on 9 August 1945. The 3.5-metre-long plutonium 239 bomb weighed 4 tonnes (9000 lb) and was nicknamed 'Fat Man' after Winston Churchill. It had the equivalent power of 22,000 tonnes of TNT.

Hiroshima was flat and flattened, but Nagasaki lies in a series of narrow valleys. The bomb exploded 500 metres (1625 ft) above a suburb of schools, factories, private houses and 270,000 people. Over 750 metres, all reinforced concrete buildings were destroyed, but due to the hilly topography only 6.7 square kilometres (2.6 square miles) were reduced to ashes. Of the 51,000 buildings in the city, 22.7% were completely destroyed and 36.1% escaped damage; 75,000 were killed on the day, with another 75,000 dying of radiation sickness soon after, leaving 150,000 dead at Nagasaki.

Regarding the vexed question of whether a third bomb was dropped, the Americans all say “No”, but we know that a third bomb was in existence before testing was done in America on 16 July 1945 (with an earlier test on 17 July 1944 at San Francisco).

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 Mar

Under American instructions, the Russians were approaching Japan from the north and threatened the remaining exhausted and depleted Japanese population. The Japanese were so demoralised and infuriated by the huge loss of life at Hiroshima (6 Aug. 1945), Nagasaki (9 Aug. 1945), the conquering of their Kwantung Army in Manchuria (9–15 Aug. 1945) and the Russians taking the Kurile Islands (August 1945), which they occupy to this day, and the resulting 1 million dead and 200,000 captured, that the Japanese gave the Russians the salvaged atomic bomb and the Kurile Islands, just as the Americans wanted them to do.

> As a reward for gifting the Russians the third atomic bomb, Japan was one of the few countries not to be involved in the irritating Cold War.

The Russian accounts are quite detailed and specify the types of Russian aircraft flown in to collect the third atomic bomb and the special markings applied to the aircraft. Only an intelligence officer would realise that safe conduct for these aircraft would have required special markings for agreed protection. The existence of this story explains how the Russians came by the atomic bomb when the Americans assumed it would take the Russians 50 years to catch up.

> In high office, the real story – the Americans were prepared to gift the nuclear bomb to either Japan or Russia, just as long as a Cold War started. Without the Cold War, their military would fall into disrepair and disrepute. As it was, the Cold War was a military holiday, an occupying rest period between WWII and WWIII – an excuse to maintain their equipment, with scenarios played out as excuses to develop their equipment. The Cold War was also the main excuse for worldwide surveillance.

Russia used 'FAT CHANCE' to put themselves on equal footing with America. They failed to achieve this so resorted to smoke and mirrors, driving their nukes all around Russia pretending they were everywhere. This helped fuel the Cold-War-without-result over four decades. The third unexploded atomic bomb is called 'gifting arms for future war' and is the equivalent of using NTO's (Non-Traceable Ops) to begin a war.

> Truman dropped a third nuclear bomb (FAT CHANCE) on Niigata but it failed to explode, as was planned. It was a gift to Russia via Japan, with the pre-organised Russian attacks on the Japanese Kwantung Army in Manchuria and the Kurile Islands ensuring that the atomic bomb went to Russia to begin the Cold War. This FAT CHANCE atomic bomb might as well have been labelled 'Koba' as it was another operation serving Stalin.

The Russians had begun an atomic bomb project in 1942. Discoveries are a product of preparation and integrity, and Russia was failing on both counts. Rather, they relied on their nuclear programme being stolen from Los Alamos by the Jew, Victor Rothschild, the Third Baron Rothschild no less, and virtual owner of the Central Banking system. Still, little progress was made until the Americans gave Russia the atomic bomb via the Japanese in late 1945. No doubt Victor Rothschild had something to do with FAT CHANCE not exploding.

The third nuclear bomb is not to be confused with the Manhattan Project's 'first' nuclear explosion at 5.29:45 am 16 July 1945, over the New Mexico desert. This plutonium implosion bomb caused a blinding flash and unbelievable heat equivalent to 20,000 tons of TNT, many times that of what was expected. It was 60% bigger than the atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima, but the Nagasaki bomb was 10% bigger again. Los Alamos scientific director Dr Robert Oppenheimer described it with a quote from the Bhagavad Gita, "I am become Death, Destroyer of Worlds".

The third nuclear bomb is also not to be confused with the atomic explosion on 17 July 1944, 35 miles northeast of San Francisco. This was "the largest stateside disaster of WWII", and "remains unresolved to this day", yet it was a planned atomic test by Los Alamos Laboratory scientists.

The third nuclear bomb should also not be confused with the purposeful sinking of the USS Indianapolis on 30 July 1944. The nuke it was carrying had been delivered to Guam four days earlier.

Because atomic bombs have the same physical signature as the formation of a planet – Gamma rays, X-Rays and very fast ions and electrons – the atomic bombs acted like a smoke signal right across the universe. If there was any thinking life in the rest of the universe, this was the flashing neon calling-card – 17 July 1944 explosion; 16 July 1945 implosion; 6 August 1945 explosion; 9 August 1945 explosion – 364 days from explosion to implosion, 21 days to the next explosion, then 3 days to the fourth explosion.

Britain and America managed a combined kill at Dresden of 13,000/260,000/600,000/860,000/1,000,000 over 13 hours, whereas America alone managed a kill of 215,000 in two drops over three days. When radiation sickness is taken into account, the atomic bomb kill of 290,000 rivals that of Churchill's Dresden 260,000 mark.[13] In all reality, Churchill's Dresden kill was 260,000 + 600,000 = 860,000.

However, when the American part in Dresden is taken into account, its kill count from 13/14 February and 6 and 9 August 1945 counts around 600,000; unofficial statistics of course, but the last six months of WWII truly were a killing field, an Occult Mafia hit like we've never seen before.

President Truman wanted to catch up to the warlords Churchill and Stalin. They had been at the game for all of WWII, so Truman posted the highest post-European war kill, thus giving America the most kudos after WWII.

President Truman takes the blame for this one, 215,000–290,000 deaths in three days. Depopulation exercise complete? – occult locations marked, another occult hit for all eternity, plus the pulsing neon sign sent out to the universe for any other life-forms to investigate this way.

> Such is war, without beginning or end . . . and such was Churchill, Roosevelt and Truman, men of war without beginning or end. At least Hitler was stopped. Alive but stopped.

Stalin, on the other hand, was an old war-hand by this time. Little did the world know, Stalin was a British agent, a protégé of Winston Churchill – the ultimate black dog of war. The sly old Tavistock bulldog Churchill managed to keep his reputation relatively clean during his lifetime and outlived Stalin by 12 years.

Churchill was a colonising elitist who had long been desensitized to death. After the war, he expressed contempt for public health care and contempt for improved education for the majority of the population, many of whom had served in WWII. Churchill was a supporter of Nordic-Anglo-Saxon colonisation and pan-Europeanism. He supported the European Common Market and later the European Union, installing France to help him in his new Cold War battles against Russia, the monster-without-monarchy he had helped create. Churchill also made comments supportive of a One World Government and an all-powerful United Nations, itself dedicated to MASSIVE WAR-IN-PEACETIME DEPOPULATION.

> Churchill: “Unless some effective world super-government for the purpose of preventing war can be set up . . . the prospects for peace and human progress are dark . . . If . . . it is found possible to build a world organization of irresistible force and inviolable authority for the purpose of securing peace, there are no limits to the blessings which all men enjoy and share.”

The most interesting aspect of this Illuminati Big Brother security-minded speech is that Winston Churchill was a main instigator of the depopulation exercises of WWI (Gallipoli), the Bolshevik Revolution (the installation of the first Mafia government – Jewish to boot), and WWII, with special reference to Dresden in the last days of that war.

At the beginning of the Cold War, Churchill borrowed a phrase from the recently deceased Joseph Goebbels and mentioned the ‘Iron Curtain’ in a 1946 speech at Westminster College in Fulton, Missouri, while the guest of President Truman:

> “From Stettin on the Baltic to Trieste on the Adriatic, an Iron Curtain has descended across the continent. Behind that line lie all the capitals of the ancient states of Central and Eastern Europe. Warsaw, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Budapest, Belgrade, Bucharest and Sofia, all these famous cities and the populations around them lie in what I must call the Soviet sphere.”

Vienna wasn’t included and nor was Belgrade under Tito’s compromise – socialism. This was wishful thinking for Churchill, but he got the rest correct. Tito was Churchill’s cousin and Vienna was already sufficiently neurotic . . . and fascist.

Prior to the war, in the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, this was called a ‘sphere of influence’. At the Yalta Conference (4–11 February 1945), Churchill negotiated with Roosevelt, on behalf of Russia, to gain as big a communist sphere of influence as possible. The end of a war always sets up the next war. In this case, it was the Cold War.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

> In the final days of WWII, King George VI awarded his uncle Winston Churchill campaign medals for all the places he had visited at war. Churchill ended up with a ‘fruit salad’ of medals, even commemorating wars he had served in as a journalist. As a journalist of high breeding, he was also considered a spy wherever he went. Like Hitler, as an agent of war, Churchill was awarded medals whenever he lifted a foot. He didn’t even have to make it to the front line and rarely did.
>
> Churchill was not the great peacemaker he was made out to be. He inherited wars from his fathers, carried out war and gifted new wars to the next generation. Churchill was a great genocidal gentleman, another mass murderer, equal to Stalin and Hitler, working with Stalin and Hitler, having trained Stalin and Hitler.
> Churchill gave Eastern Europe to the mass-murdering Mafia communist, Joseph V. Stalin, and carried out his own assassinations for political purposes at home. His greatest buffer was an embedded press gang that presented him as a nice genial cigar-smoking gent whose only fault was the drink and the black dog (depression), which was blamed on the drink. Churchill was an angel really, rarely, rearly.

Immediately after WWII and his government's electoral defeat, Churchill was offered peerage as the first-ever Duke of London (House of Lords). But looking at what happened with his fake ancestor the 1st Duke of Marlborough, charged with embezzling and exiled within four years of dukedom, Churchill refused. He couldn't face exile, insider trading charges, or repeating history that far back. One generation was enough. There was also the 'shades of Chamberlain threat with his elevation to Lord President of the Council, followed by a quick and uncelebrated death by MAD'.[14] The sounds of "The Duke of London is dead" would have reverberated loudly in Churchill's ears.

In order to use the ammunition mountain left over from WWII, the Korean War blew up out of nowhere (1950–53). America and Britain hastily put together a combined UN operation to fight for it and pay for it. It was the ideal prelude to WWIII, and everyone involved, including General MacArthur, was planning for it to go atomic. At the last minute, Truman blinked and stopped a further atomic explosion in an act of conscience, thus saving the world in the blink of a crook's eye.

When the Korean War was ending and WWIII was due to start, the Russian Generals repaid the favour and followed British instructions by killing Britain's Tavistock rebel protégé Joseph V. Stalin (Koba).

Churchill contracted out 17 history writers for six volumes of The Second World War (published 1948–53). He became Prime Minister for the third time in 1951 and the embedded press gangs managed to cover up Churchill's genocides by calling him "the greatest living Englishman" from 1953. He would remain an MP until his resignation (due to ill health) in 1955. That his biological father was King Edward VII was never revealed by the British press, but all of my intelligence contacts knew, including King George VI's doctor, and my father, who used to shear his sheep.

During his period as Prime Minister (1951–55), Churchill renewed his "special relationship" with the United States as they formed post-war order and prepared for the next war, the Cold War, a concept introduced at Yalta in February 1945 and reintroduced by Churchill into mainstream America in 1946 under Truman's guidance using the Nazi Goebbels' dialogue.

Churchill spent much of his last years as a guest of the Chief of the Mafia, Aristotle Onassis on his yatch Christina. Onassis (1906–75) had replaced the Jew Meyer as Chief of the Seven Families. Onassis liked having Churchill around because he was a fellow boozer and always on top of his game when it came to advice and contacts. Prince 'Tax' Rainier was known to both men, and most of the Mafia's heroin was run through Monaco on its way to America. Churchill's wife refrained from sitting at the bar because Onassis had covered his bar stools in hide from the penis of a sperm whale, lending the Greek to some obvious jokes.

> After WWII, America was the big military power and Britain watched as its imperial prestige declined. Britain needed a soft war for its military like a toothless geriatric needs thick soup. As such, Britain and America decided to oppose the Russian conquests of Eastern Europe, reneging on what they had agreed to at the end of WWII. The Cold War had begun.

Not a shot was fired. The toothless military were occupied eating thick soup in a cold climate. All the countries were occupied (except Japan) and it became a surveillance war, a war-in-peacetime with the citizens going to extraordinary lengths to survive and attain the most valued commodity stolen from them – Freedom.

> In the world of freedom and culture, Churchill was what we call "an arse". He was a magnificent speaker, a drunk, a manic-depressive and a Tavistock Psych-Ops double agent. He really, rarely, rearly touted for peace.

In 1953, Churchill became a Knight of the Garter – Sir Winston Churchill – and was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature, "for his mastery of historical and biographical description as well as for brilliant oratory in defending exalted human values". He employed 17 writers on contract who all agreed to publish under his name. Some of his speeches were made and improved upon by others. They may have defended exalted human values, but his actions didn't.

> Winston Churchill was Britain's greatest-ever mass murderer, the Butcher of Gallipoli, the Demon of Dresden, the Gentleman of Genocide, a status that only occultists enjoy. Six decades later he was put forward as Britain's greatest ever Briton. Out of 60 million, 59 million people didn't vote, and on a grey day in November 2002, Winston Churchill was crowned 'The Greatest Briton of All Time'. Britain values its occult leaders above all others. So does Israel.

The elevation and Nobel Prize was followed by a stroke in June 1953 which paralysed Winston's left side. Stubborn as he was, it took two years for him to retire (5 April 1955). He had become a drooling fatherless child in search of attention, much like the world he created.

While recovering from his June 1953 stroke, he wrote and finally published A History of the English Speaking Peoples (Vols.1–4, 1958) that he claims to have started between 1929 and 1939. Six years after his stroke (1959), the longest-serving other Member of Parliament died and Churchill inherited the title of 'Father of the House' for longest continuous service (1924–59) – 35 years of Churchill, involving the worst war in history. Despite retiring, he retained a seat in Parliament until 1964.

The British are so easily fooled, largely because they eat tasteless food too quickly and swallow information just as fast – without tasting it. It was to be two decades of pea soup before they even opened a window.

> In 1956, not yet sick of being fooled by the press, the German city of Aachen gave Churchill the Charlemagne Award for contributing to the European idea and European peace. The 'European idea' is 'Nordic-Anglo-Saxon colonisation through murder compliance' and 'European peace' is 'security through war' . . . which is no security at all.[15]

Sir Winston Leonard Spencer Churchill, KG, OM, CH – Knight of the Garter, Order of Merit, Companion of Honour and Charlemagne Award.

The Knight of the Garter (KG) is given to the Sovereign (themself), their eldest son and 24 nobles. Its motto 'Honi soit qui mal y pense' – 'Shamed be the person who thinks evil of it' – brought about the new Age of Chivalry. Of all the orders, it is the highest British order, but includes the most degraded knights. These include King Charles I (executed in the Glorious Revolution of 1649),[16] the Duke of Ormond for treason (1715), among at least fifty others, beheaded, degraded or removed. Churchill's ancestor, the 1st Duke of Marlborough, escaped with just a charge of embezzlement in 1712. The Knight of the Garter (KG) has come to symbolise 'trading in countries' fortunes'.

The real New Style date is 30 January 1648, but the British fudged a whole year.

The Order of Merit (OM) is limited to the ruling Monarch and 24 members. It is awarded for distinguished service in the armed forces, science, art, literature or culture. It does not entitle one to be called a knight.

The Companion of Honour (CH) is considered a junior class of the Order of Merit, consisting of the Sovereign and 65 ordinary members. It is conferred upon men and women for services of national importance. The motto of the order is 'In action faithful and in honour clear'.

Secretary of War Churchill was doing the work of the KG, OM, CH – the work of 'shameful, evil, British military matters, contracting history writers to make war appear honourable and the monarchy clearly faithful through it'.

> Churchill was a Nordic-Anglo-Saxon coloniser through murder compliance who acted as though war is security . . . but we all know, war is no security at all. War is profit at the cost of human lives. This sums up Churchill better than anything else – 'Profit at the cost of human lives'.
> The Monarchy's titled message to Winston Churchill was: 'Thanks for using your family influence to side with fascism, colonise towards communism and keep our reputation clean.'

By an Act of Congress in 1963, Churchill became an honorary US citizen. The US and British Nordic-Anglo-Saxon colonists celebrate their mass-murderers. After all, war makes colonisation easy.

Fascism is a fast war on freedom and culture.
Communism is a slow war on freedom and culture
– a war of attrition.
The post-war result was mass communism in the realms of freedom, culture and family.

Churchill never won any war. He created three wars (the Bolshevik Revolution, WWII, and the Cold War) and destroyed peace in between. He was Tavistock's Bulldog, running fast and slow wars and working with all players, with much of the bankers and opposition his relatives.

Winston Leonard Spencer Churchill was a double agent Prime Minister trained by his own country's war schools and supported by his own country's secret warring society. He was the Freemasons' Winston Churchill espousing ORDER OUT OF CHAOS . . . but he had to create the chaos to attain the order. That chaos was 'War' and that order was 'Nordic-Anglo-Saxon Freemasonry Communist Colonisation'.

San Francisco's Nuclear Explosion

There was a sudden mushroom of bright white light to 1800 feet, then another mushroom of white light to 10,000 feet, an intense roar and then a concussion blast travelling around 720 mph (1 mile every 5 seconds). This was reported by several eyewitnesses before there was any knowledge of what a nuclear explosion looked like.

Everyone within a 50-mile radius felt the blast. The explosion destroyed 5 ships, a diesel engine, 16 boxcars, Port Chicago and an entire town. The damage extended for 200 miles and included 12 other cities. It blew out windows and blew heavy doors off their hinges. "The force of the blast was greater than a 5-kiloton atomic bomb."[1]

The blast registered as 3.4 on the Richter scale in parts of distant Nevada and formed a blast crater 700 feet long, 300 feet wide and 66 feet deep (210 m x 90 m x 20 m). Two years later it was twice as big, as the US Government dug out all surfaces of the blast crater. This was presumably to remove radioactive material. There seems to be no other valid reason.

The magnitude of the blast was between (10)18 ergs and (10)72 ergs. The lower (10)18 ergs is commensurate with a chemical explosion if everything blew up at the same time. The higher (10)72 ergs is commensurate with an atomic explosion. All of the chemicals did not blow up at the same time. It was an atomic explosion.

At 10.18 pm on 17 July 1944 a 9000-lb nuclear bomb was set off in Suisan Bay in Port Chicago,[2] 35 miles northeast of San Francisco and 70 miles southwest of Sacramento; 322 workers, trainmen, ship's crew, stevedores (ship loaders), sailors and marines were killed. Most of them died instantly and most of those that died were Black (202). It was the largest stateside disaster of WWII, yet no conclusions have been reached as to its cause.

---

[1] No Share of Glory, Robert E. Pearson, 1964, p. 19.

[2] Port Chicago was renamed 'US Naval Ammunition Depot, Concord' aka 'Concord Naval Weapons Station' on 18 January 1946.

The bomb was on a Liberty ship, either the E.A. Bryan or the SS Quinalt Victory on the other side of the same pier. The Victory had no people on board, and those scientists that were on board at 9.30 pm left before the bomb went off at 10.18 pm. The Bryan had few people on board except for Black stevedores loading the nearly full ship. Its cargo was ammunition and explosives.

The atomic bomb that exploded was a low-yield weapon set off in the hold below the waterline. The holds went down four storeys. A nuclear explosion below the waterline mimimises the spread of radioactivity. Regardless, Port Chicago's Contra Costa County still has one of the highest rates of cancer in the United States and Port Chicago has been abandoned as a town ever since. It is now considered a buffer zone in case of another explosion.

S.S. "E. A. BRYAN"

At the time, the Liberty ship E.A. Bryan was fully laden with tons of ammuniton and chemical-based explosives: 5292 barrels of bunker C-type diesel fuel; 4600 tons of ammunition (fuses, detonators, guncotton, smokeless powder in bulk); and 1780 tons of high explosives, much of which were unstable. As a result, the Bryan was lying low on the water. With the 9000-lb bomb, the Victory was also lying low in the water.

The manifest records of all the munitions loaded aboard the E.A. Bryan were available then, as they are now, except for two boxcars. The records of the contents of these are still not available. They could be dud chemical explosives, working chemical explosives, a nuclear bomb, or nothing. Apart from the two boxcars, the Bryan was fully loaded with chemical explosives. This covered for the nuclear bomb which had to be tested in a harbour, had to be tested from a ship, and had to be tested under cover of being a chemical explosion.

The atomic bomb was not on the E.A. Bryan. It was on the SS Quinalt Victory and it is most probable that the two unnamed boxcars on the Bryan contained dud chemical explosives.

During the four-day loading process of the E.A. Bryan, shells and bombs were accidentally dropped, yet none exploded. At the time, most of the crew (White) took leave from the ship as it was being loaded by Black stevedores (ship loaders). Blacks were only allowed on the ships as stevedores, cooks and bottlewashers.

The E.A. Bryan was destined for Tinian Island in the Mariana Islands, from where the B-29 Enola Gay[3] flew out to drop its atomic bombs on Japan 13 months later. This was also a ruse to make the researcher believe the atomic bomb was on the Bryan and not the Victory.

The SS Quinalt Victory, a six-day-old 7606-ton vessel, arrived at Port Chicago at 7 pm on 17 July 1944, three hours before the explosion, and was tied up to the same pier on the opposite side to the Bryan. The SS Quinalt Victory was then visited just prior to the explosion by Los Alamos scientists in a "shiny black car". The Quinalt Victory contained one atomic bomb. The Bryan carried two boxcars of undeclared dud chemical weapons and no atomic bomb.

[3] The night before the bombing, Brigadier General Paul Warfield Tibbets Jr. named the plane-to-bomb-Hiroshima after his mother 'Enola Gay'. Most just buy a box of chocolates and tell them how well they are doing, but Tibbets was considered by the FBI to be a sex offender and had a lot to overcompensate for.

At the time of the Port Chicago atomic explosion, the B-29 was not operational and it was believed that no plane could carry the load. The plan was to deliver the nuke by ship and detonate it in the enemy harbour. This was called the 'Hydrodynamic Theory of Surface Explosions'. A nuclear device had to be delivered by ship and by sea.

The holds of both the E.A. Bryan and the SS Quinalt Victory were as deep as a four-storey building. Detonations below the waterline vastly reduced any lingering radiation after the explosion. The Los Alamos Laboratory scientists were interested in the explosive potential and ability to kill instantly, not the ability to kill over time. Lingering radiation sickness would have resulted in massive lawsuits, so radioactivity had to be minimised. The best way to do this was to store the atomic weapon in the bottom of the hold, below the waterline, and call the explosion 'chemical'.

On 2 August 1939, Albert Einstein wrote to President Roosevelt stating that a nuclear bomb was possible: "A single bomb of this type, carried by boat and exploded in a port, might very well destroy the whole port together with some of the surrounding territory . . . However, such bombs might very well prove to be too heavy for transportation by air."

The minimum critical mass for U-235 is 15.5 kg. By 1944, the US had 93 kg. This was six times the minimum requirement. Ipso facto, the US was capable of producing, testing, delivering, storing and using six atomic bombs in 1944. By 1945 this had increased to 289 kg[4] and they were capable of producing 18 minimum-requirement atomic bombs.

The final specifications for the Hiroshima bomb were completed in mid-February 1944,[5] and by March 1944 the hardware for at least three Hiroshima-type weapons had been ordered.

[5] This was verified in the Manhattan District History [the building of the first atomic bomb], Project Y, The Los Alamos Project, Vol. 1, LAMS-2532, directed by Joseph O. Hirschfelder, Los Alamos, 1961, 600 pages. This included History of a 10,000 Ton Gadget, Los Alamos Laboratories, Autumn 1944. This refers to projects accomplished after 1 August 1944 (two weeks after the Port Chicago explosion). Joseph O. Hirschfelder specialised in the general phenomenology of nuclear explosions, including the formation of the shock wave in the air, the early radiation history, the ball of fire, the blast wave carried through the air at great distances, and the effects of blast and radiation on human beings and structures. For this, Port Chicago was a necessity, and with his Above Top Secret clearance, Hirschfelder could install colleagues into positions and command any actions, including those of the Commander of Port Chicago, US Naval Captain William J. Parsons, who was subsequently promoted four times.

The US government did have the capability to produce several nuclear weapons at the time of the Port Chicago explosion. It needed to test them, was in a position to test them, and tested one in Port Chicago, 35 miles northeast of San Francisco.

Building Port Chicago began in June 1943 and at the time of the explosion it was 80% complete. The first loading pier was ready for use in May 1944, two months prior to the explosion. The reason given for not finishing the pier was a shortage of manpower, yet after the explosion the entire pier was rebuilt within a week. This suggests pre-preparation and a planned nuclear test with self-sabotage and cover involved, quickly followed by a fully functioning unit.

Offically, the entire port of three piers was rebuilt and fully functional "by 1 April 1945". This does not negate the previous statement of one pier rebuilt within a week, but it is sleight of hand in the use of words.

At the time, the only way to deliver a nuclear strike was by ship detonated in the enemy harbour; therefore a nuclear test would have to be in a harbour and not in a desert (where it was tested 364 days later) . . . and the best harbour to use would be the one exporting the greatest volume of chemical explosives. That was Port Chicago.

As the long-range B-29 bomber was coming on board, with the possibility that it could carry the atomic bomb by air, the US captured Tinian Island in the Northern Mariana Islands, 1000 miles from Hiroshima, and within long-distance bomber range.[6] Thereafter, all vessels carrying nuclear weapons headed there (via Guam, 60 miles south). The B-29 did become operational, it could fly the 2000-mile return flight, and it could carry the atomic bomb, but only just. The B-29 barely got off the ground and it was so touch-and-go the atomic bomb had to be armed mid-air. This was done by Captain William J. Parsons.[7]

Opposite Port Chicago was the heavily guarded Mare Island. It contained components for the nuclear weapons and these were shipped out to Tinian Island in the Pacific on the USS Indianapolis. This may have been all of the components for an atomic bomb as the Victory and Bryan had been destroyed.

A Los Alamos document, 'History of 10,000 Ton Gadget', describes the testing of an atomic device and all its parameters. Step 11 states: "Ball of fire mushroom out at 18,000 ft. in typical Port Chicago fashion." This would indicate that their officials were observing, filming, taking notes and generally using the 17 July 1944 Port Chicago explosion as a nuclear test and thereafter referring to it as a nuclear test.

The US Navy filmed[8] the entire explosion on nitrate-based film from across the bay and the filming continued on to include delivery of an atomic device by the USS Indianapolis to Tinian Island in the Pacific. The film was later stored at Port Chicago/Concord. When the Navy became aware of the public's knowledge of a theory of an atomic test at Port Chicago they destroyed the film, which is another way of saying it was classified and don't bother asking.

[6] Tinian Island is at 34° 23′ 07″ N, 132° 27′ 19″ E; Hiroshima is a 14° 57′ 112″ N, 145° 38′ 54″ E.

[7] Due to the Port Chicago SS Quinalt Victory atomic test in San Francisco, when the 'Little Boy' atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima by plane, it was not untested. The atomic bomb had already been tested at sea on 17 July 1944 and on land on 16 July 1945. 'Little Boy' over Hiroshima was the first atomic bomb successfully dropped from a plane and exploded mid-air.

[8] Nitrate-based film stopped being made in the 1950s, but there are reports this nitrate-based film was used by Hollywood in the 1960s. This would make the 1960s 'Hollywood nuclear explosion' the genuine article.

At Port Chicago, post-test caution was the same as for a nuclear test elsewhere. The only pre-test caution not taken was to remove people out of the area, but the test had to be done in an area where there were other explosives so it could be blamed on chemical explosives. For the test scenario to be as valid as possible, the atomic explosion had to occur on a ship, in a harbour, with people around. Those people were mainly Black people in a heavily racist America. Since all the chemical explosives came together at a port and Port Chicago was the largest US loading point for munitions, the world's first nuclear explosion had to occur at Port Chicago for maximum cover.

Four days after the explosion, on 21 July 1944, the District Intelligence Officer wrote a confidential memorandum to the Commandant Twelfth Naval District. He confirmed 'a "shiny black car" at 9.30 pm at the foot of the pier of the [Port Chicago] Naval Magazine. The vehicle was not a navy vehicle and not a business vehicle, but it did have authorisation to be near the pier, and the shiny black vehicle had to have authorisation to be near the pier.'[9]

As soon as the Port Chicago atomic bomb exploded, a team of Los Alamos Laboratory scientists were at Port Chicago assessing it in record time. This resulted in 400–600 pages of memoranda and reports citing parameters and artefacts.

Most witnesses stated there were two explosions about 45 seconds apart. A nuclear explosion has two phases – a ‘pressure phase’ and a ‘suction phase’.

The Port Chicago explosion was both chemical and nuclear. The chemical explosion was the ‘cover’ and the nuclear explosion was the ‘test’. There were several optional causes of this time delay.

1. Those who were close enough to see the three explosions separately all died.
2. Those who survived saw the chemical explosion and the pressure stage of the nuclear explosion as one. The chemical explosion set off the pressure phase of the atomic explosion and this was followed by the suction phase 45 seconds later.
3. The atomic bomb was purposefully set off under test conditions and the chemical bombs exploded as a result. By the time the non-synchronous chemical explosion reached its zenith, it was engulfed by the atomic explosion and too small to register. The Los Alamos Laboratory scientists were on the Quinalt Victory setting up the bomb at 9.30 pm then scarpered, returning ASAP to assess the damage.

The most viable option is point 3. The atomic bomb was set off under test conditions by Los Alamos Laboratory scientists on the Victory. The chemical bombs on the Bryan then exploded as a result and their input was removed from the equation.

The Liberty ship E.A. Bryan docked at Port Chicago on 13 July 1944. Loading of munitions began at 8.30 am that morning and continued until the explosion at 10.18 pm four days later. To build up sufficient cover that it was a chemical explosion, the E.A. Bryan was loaded with 50.04 tons of 20-mm HEI Tetryl Cartridges; 50.09 tons of 5-inch 38-calibre Common Projectiles; 36 tons of 16-inch Tar. Mk2-4A Projectiles; 87.55 tons of 1000-lb GP AN-M65 TNT Bombs; 106 tons of 1000-lb AP AN-M33 Bombs; 26 tons of Fin assemblies for AN M-65 Bombs; 60.35 tons of incendiary Cluster M7; 97 tons of 350-lb DB AN-Mk 47 Torpex Bombs; 93.52 tons of 100-lb Fragmentation Cluster An-M4; and 42 tons of 40-mm AP Tracer Cartridges. This was just enough ammunition and explosives to be at the lower end of an atomic bomb . . . if it all exploded simultaneously.

Establishing a cover story is all-important in war. One of the excuses for the ‘chemical explosion theory’ was that the SS Quinalt Victory’s mooring lines were carried away, or the bollards were damaged and this damage spread through into the areas carrying explosives. However, eyewitnesses reported seeing the ship’s gear secure and all gear in place moments before the explosion. This explanation was yet another ruse.

Another excuse was that the chemical explosives on board could have made the lower magnitude end of the explosion [(10)18 ergs], but this would only be achieveable if these chemicals were ignited simultaneously. Since this was improbable, unless it was the largest organised unannounced fireworks display in history, it was not a chemical explosion, but an atomic explosion at Port Chicago.

The whole scenario was a live test of one atomic bomb, whether it was on the Bryan or the Victory. It was on the Victory, as Blacks were loading the Bryan, and Whites did not trust Blacks with anything at that time, especially not an atomic bomb. The atomic bomb was loaded onto the SS Quinalt Victory before it came into Port Chicago and then exploded three hours later. This was all within an hour of the Los Alamos scientists leaving.

The incendiary bombs being loaded onto the Bryan were wedged so tightly in the boxcars, they were difficult to get out and their activating mechanisms (fuses) had already been installed so they were considered “hot cargo”. As a result, the incendiary bombs were gingerly loaded one bomb at a time. The chemical bombs were set up to either set off the nuclear bomb, or be reported later as capable of exploding if mishandled.

Records of the boxcars loading the cargo were stringently kept, except for two boxcars whose contents have never been disclosed. These were marked “classified”. The Whites did trust the Blacks with the two classified boxcars of undisclosed material because they were known at the time to be ‘not nuclear’.

SACRAMENTO

Shortly after the atomic explosion, 300 Black uninjured enlisted Navy men refused to return to their work loading ammunitions. They were then confined belowdecks on a barge and told they would be executed if they didn't return to work; 275 did return to work but were still convicted of insubordination; 50 of the Black enlisted were then formally court-martialled, making Port Chicago the largest mutiny in US history.[10]

The resulting enquiry also blamed the explosion on 'incompetent Blacks' and 'competition between loading crews'. "The colored enlisted personnel are neither temperamentally or intellectually capable of handling high explosives." (Welcome back to the 1940s, where Blacks are blacklisted and used for White man's blame.)

Further possible causes were listed as "Inherent defects in the bombs [and the] presence of a supersensitive element which was detonated in the course of rough handling."

The Coast Guard and the Port Director's Office had personnel without enough experience to supervise the loading of the ships. The Coast Guard warned the Port Director's Office of this in October 1943.[11] Contract stevedores were used at the other Bay Area Navy facilities, but the captain of Port Chicago found 'conditions so bad that he was unwilling to take responsibility for it', and was unable to locate experienced staff, so he took the extraordinary precaution of withdrawing the Coast Guard detail altogether.

This allowed for the next option, with reports that Germany had a long-range sabotage programme, not a plane, but agents on the ground. It was far easier to access Port Chicago without a Coast Guard, and far easier to blame a chemical-atomic chain reaction on German saboteurs. This took the focus off the Los Alamos Laboratory scientists. When this didn't work, there were always the Blacks – dead Blacks and those Blacks who'd been court-martialled, whose word would thereafter be disregarded.

The Coast Guard loading detail was absent at Port Chicago and Mare Island, and the Coast Guard loading detail was absent on the night of the explosion.

[10] On 23 December 1999 the Black formerly enlisted Freddie Meeks was pardoned by President Bill Clinton. He was one of only two survivors.

[11] This pattern was copied in the Intelligence-controlled sinking of the (Mikhail) Lermontov in Picton, New Zealand. It was sunk on 16 February 1986. Many of those involved were intelligence officers who would have studied the Port Chicago explosion and sinking. Sinking a ship has cons all of its own. The main ingredient is authority.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

A short time after the Port Chicago explosion, it was reported that nine German officers and two guard dogs were secretly buried at Benicia, California. This could have been a German suicide mission, and indeed a lot of the Los Alamos scientists were Germans (and German Jews) and were as prone to corruption as easily as their latest lap dance or other shame.[12]

Equally, and more likely, the burial of the nine German officers and two guard dogs was a leaked bluff designed to keep one off the scent that the Port Chicago atomic explosion was an inside job, another Pearl Harbor, another 9-11, with the Blacks taking the blame the Muslims now have, and the Los Alamos scientists performing their nuclear test on a friendly population while avoiding all blame.

And when you dig a little deeper there is another time delay of blame two months after the atomic explosion in the form of a leaked classified document. Confidential memorandum ND12-16-Bd (SC) S78 Serial 40312 from the Commandant Twelfth Naval District to the Officer-in-Charge, Naval Ammunition Depot, Port Chicago (23 September 1944). This memorandum called attention to the Torpex bombs, all 97 tons of them: "Torpex generates a hydrogen gas which causes expansion within the projectile, rendering it necessary on occasion to release this gas in order to reduce the projectile's sensitivity to accidental detonation."

At the time of the atomic explosion, Victor Rothshild, the Second Baron Rothschild, was stealing as much of the Los Alamos nuclear data as he could get his hands on. These were then taken straight to Russia or given to the Cambridge Five and leaked to Russia. Victor Rothschild was the fifth man in the Cambridge Five.

Among these documents would have been 'History of a 10,000 Ton Gadget' and the Army-Navy Explosives Safety Board's Technical Paper # 6 'Port Chicago Explosion', as was 'Project Y'.

[12] Jewish scientists have long been considered by intelligence to have at least three masters – the Zionist Intelligence Betar, the Soviet Union, and the country employing them.

Although the atomic test results were muddied by the chemical explosion, the atomic test results were bigger than a chemical explosion, and bigger than a chemical explosion could possibly be. The atomic test did occur, it did occur amongst buildings and people, and it could be used to predict the workability, kill rate and damage area for future atomic bombs (which would be able to be improved upon). The chemical component of the explosions could easily be taken into account and discounted, or added as a component to future nuclear bombs. The residual radiation (5–10%) was minimised by a subsurface explosion from a ship. The remaining immediate radioactivity was then cleaned up by digging out the harbour floor surrounding the atomic bomb crater.

The 'History of a 10,000 Ton Gadget' was leaked through a Christ Evangelical Lutheran Church rummage sale,[13] and when this was discovered, nearly four decades after the event, the US Government and Los Alamos Laboratory suddenly and retroactively reclassified the Army-Navy Explosives Safety Board's Technical Paper # 6 'Port Chicago Explosion'.

There was only one atomic bomb in the Bay. Bryan had two boxcars of undisclosed merchandise and these were dud chemical explosives which needed to be disposed of. The two boxcars were a ruse, as though they were components to make an atomic bomb, which the Blacks had let off through mishandling. The atomic bomb was not on the chemical-laden E.A. Bryan, it was on the SS Quinalt Victory, which had been tied up within 100 feet of the Bryan for three hours.

A new and nearly complete port and two new ships were used. This was further cover with the question posed: "Why would the US blow up a new port and two new ships when they were so needed?" It's just not logical. The fact is, it was near the end of the war and this was (in the US eyes) going to make the war end sooner.

There is also the matter of America testing its products. America always tests its products on people when those products are new and when the surrounding products are new. America does not test its new products on a population surrounded by old products. That is for psychological testing. Risking thousands of lives and critical infrastructure was part of the test and part of the cover.

[13] This was found in the bottom of a box by Peter Vogel, a journalist who studied under Dr Edward Teller – the father of the American H-Bomb. He then wrote The Black Scholar, The Last Wave From Port Chicago (published in July 1982), and was then interviewed on KVON Doubletalk radio on 26 December 1989.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

When one asks, "Why would the US government test its atomic weapons on its own population?" one can ask the question, "When has it not?" The human question is answered by racism. During segregation, Blacks were barely considered human and were not allowed to be crew on US Naval ships. When the better part of 322 Black servicemen died, their component was considered NHI – No Humans Involved.

America could not test the atomic weapon in the Pacific. The Pacific had too many foreign observers, the explosion would have been seen at 200 miles, the cover story would not stand (a chemical explosion), and an alerted Axis powers may have resulted in a pre-emptive strike from a breakaway German High Command who had been threatening and attempting to kill Hitler throughout WWII. As it was, parts of the German High Command tried to kill Hitler three days later in the 20 July 1944 Bomb Plot.

Another improbability comes from the Navy Commander at Port Chicago, Carl Wehr. Wehr cites that 180,000 tons of ammuniton was leaving the West Coast for the Pacific each month. The largest amount came out of Port Chicago. Of the 250 boxcars of ammunition waiting to be loaded and in the revetments, "none of the ammunition was damaged".[14] Wehr had not seen the official reports, but then cites the Torpex as being a relatively new explosive, more powerful than TNT and far more sensitive. Topex was prone to exploding when dropped.

Wehr's statements seem to be mutually exclusive – '250 boxcars of sensitive ammunition and none of them exploded'. This points to the boxcars not containing any ammunition in preparation for the planned nuclear strike. The heat was enormous and the sensitive Torpex should have exploded.[15]

Explosives are eminently traceable, especially as to their factory of origin. This is something the US ignores in its dealings with Iraq. The explosives used by the insurgents in Iraq have US and Israeli markings and are given to the Iraq insurgents in forms that do not look like bombs. Some are good, some are faulty, some need to be put together, some explode in the process . . . and most are given by the Israeli-controlled Druze to the Iraqi 'insurgents'.

[15] A chemical explosion reaches 5000°C and an atomic explosion reaches several tens of million °C in milliseconds.

There are improbabilites in war and it is these improbabilites that flourish. Entire wars are dedicated to killing, experiments in killing, and denying being the author of those killings. That America should kill its own in an atomic test (but mainly Blacks in a racist America) was all encompassed in the war plan.

What was the difference to killing their own at home, or taking them overseas and watching them die there? To the American command it was 322 American deaths versus 290,000 Japanese deaths. To the American command, they were actually saving lives. Commoners think otherwise.

Spymaster: “This is a recon photo taken from a USAAF P38 Lightning at 15° shortly before the explosion. Any I.O. witnessing this aircraft taking this photo would instantly know the whole area was slated for destruction and bug out – which the I.O.s did and took the White people with them. This photo has then been put forward for photo recon interpretation and that’s why it is labelled. If the photo was labelled in the States, it was probably done as a training exercise, for cover, complete with delays, then sent overseas for interpretation. Photo recon usually labels roads and paths depending on their usage. It is suspicious that the labelling is so cursory [brief]: e.g. ‘Pier w/ship’ should read ‘Pier w/Liberty ship and cargo of so many thousand tons’.”

Very soon after the Port Chicago nuclear test, the atomic bomb that dropped on Hiroshima was placed on board the heavy cruiser USS Indianapolis and then shipped to Guam, 60 miles south of Tinian Island. This load of classified material codenamed ‘Bowery’ was delivered on 26 July 1945. Four days later the Indianapolis headed towards the Philippines, parallel with Japan, and was sunk at 12.14 am on 30 July 1945, torpedoed by the I-58 Japanese submarine commanded by Captain Mochitsura Hashimoto. The I-58 had been modified in September 1944 to carry the Kaiten manned torpedo, but a conventional torpedo was used.

USS Indianapolis in Pearl Harbor.

The Indianapolis sank in the Philippine Sea in the incredibly short time of 12 minutes. Of the 1196 men on board, about 300 went down with the ship and about 900 remained. The survivors floated in shark-infested waters with no lifeboats, no food or water, and the ship was not noted as downed. It took an unusually long four days before they were even spotted. The rescue should have been under way inside four hours, merely through lack of communication. After four days, another 584 had died and only 316 were still alive.

Something caused the US military to decide not to use light cruisers to transport nukes. The Indianapolis was a heavy cruiser. Japanese submarines were notorious for being unable to sink heavy cruisers and Captain Mochitsura Hashimoto did not have the greatest record, although he had the best torpedoes in the world. The reasoning behind using a heavy cruiser was the knowledge that it would be able to deliver its payload. American ships, including heavy cruisers, were generally sunk from destroyers and not from Japanese subs.

Subs were often placed in positions to ambush ships, and at the time of the attack the USS Indianapolis was not zigzagging, as it would normally do for self-defence.

Torpedo damage to Indianapolis.

Captain Charles Butler McVay III survived the sinking but the United States made the unusual decision to court-martial him. On 10 December 1945 they flew Captain Hashimoto to Washington to assist in prosecuting Captain McVay. This was the only case in the entire war where a rival captain was called to court-martial a US Captain. Even John F. Kennedy wasn't court-martialled for allowing the sinking of his PT-109.

McVay upon rescue.

The court martial was so outrageous Congress and the press protested. McVay was court-martialled for "failing to zigzag" despite evidence he had been instructed not to zigzag in self-defence (thus identifying his ship for the Japanese submarine).[16] There was also overwhelming evidence that the US Navy had deliberately placed the Indianapolis in harm's way, on a course parallel with Japan, knowing Japanese subs were in ambush positions. McVay then became the only captain to be court-martialled, with more recently declassified evidence showing he was a scapegoat (for the purposeful mistakes of others).

Captain McVay.

The Freemasons absolutely dominated all command positions in the US and British navies – and a scapegoat is a scapegoat among the goat-mounters (Freemasons) and they all want to hop on for the ride.

Captain Hashimoto.

---

[16] Captain McVay would have been forbidden to talk about this in his own defence.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Former Captain Mochitsura Hashimoto: "I do not understand why Captain McVay was court-martialled. I do not understand why he was convicted on the charge of hazarding his ship by failing to zigzag, because I would have been able to launch a successful torpedo attack against his ship whether it had been zigzagging or not . . . the translator did not tell fully what I said . . . the Navy side did not accept some testimony that were inconvenient to them . . . at the time of the court martial I had a feeling that it was contrived from the beginning . . . I wonder if the outcome of that court martial was set from the beginning."[17]

From Pensacola, Florida, Hunter Scott wrote to Captain Hashimoto and suggested he write a letter to Senator John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. This was then brought to the attention of the New Hampshire Senator Bob Smith, who convinced Secretary of the Navy Gordon R. England, who convinced President Bill Clinton, who passed legislation that exonerated Captain McVay. In July 2001 the Navy Department followed suit, but they never overturned the court martial. The US military never has.

At the time of the sinking, Japan was in the process of pulling out of WWII, but America would not accept their surrender until they had dropped nuclear bombs on them. With this in mind, torpedoing the USS Indianapolis was most likely an inside job, sinking the ship in a timely fashion – 13 days after the Port Chicago atomic explosion and 4 days after dropping its nuclear payload to Guam. None of the 1196 crew were supposed to survive and none were supposed to write their memoirs, but they did. On the other hand, those in the atomic loop were elevated both during and after the war.

US Naval Captain William J. Parsons worked directly under J. Robert Oppenheimer at the Los Alamos Laboratory and was instrumental in designing and constructing (and testing) the world's first atomic bomb. Captain Parsons was then made the head of Port Chicago. Immediately after the explosion, Parsons was promoted to Commodore. Parsons then authored Effects of the Tidal Wave in the Port Chicago Explosion and prepared the Port Chicago 'nuclear data', which he had transmitted to his superior officer Rear Admiral W. R. Purnell, a member of the Atomic Bomb Military Policy Committee.

[17] In a letter to Senator John Warner before Captain Hashimoto died in 2000.

Captain Parsons then headed up nuclear tests in the Pacific. Three months after the Port Chicago nuclear explosion, Captain Parsons was the bombing officer aboard the Enola Gay when it dropped its U-235 atomic bomb on Hiroshima. Immediately after this, Captain Parsons was promoted to Rear Admiral, and as Rear Admiral Parsons he became the Chairman of the Joint Crossroads Committee and Deputy Task Force Commander for Technical Direction of the Bikini Atoll nuclear tests between 1946 and 1954, of which there were at least 20, including the first hydrogen bomb test in 1954.

There is plenty of chronological evidence in US Naval Captain/Rear Admiral William J. Parsons' career record to suggest that he was behind the atomic explosion in San Francisco's Port Chicago Harbor, that he organised it, that he profited from it, and once it was successfully tested, that he dropped a nuclear bomb on Hiroshima and then repeatedly blew up Bikini Atoll for eight years.

The first atomic bomb was delivered on the SS Quinault Victory, which was laid up next to the chemical-laden E.A. Bryan. The atomic bomb on the Victory was destined for Guam/Tinian Island, as were all ships carrying atomic bombs.

Black American Navy personnel were the first victims of an atomic blast, not the Japanese. The atomic explosion at San Francisco's Port Chicago was a test made to look like an accident.

In 1957, 13 years after Port Chicago, an Air Force plane accidentally dropped a 42,000-pound MK-17 hydrogen bomb when it hit turbulence over New Mexico. It was America's first 'droppable' hydrogen bomb and its largest bomb, 625 times the size of the Hiroshima bomb. When it landed it left a 25-foot crater. The nuclear device was not detonated and it did not explode. Lucky for all America.

This incident was denied for 28 years, until 1985, when the Air Force Inspection and Safety Center confirmed the incident after an Albuquerque journalist asked the simple question: "Have they ever had any nuclear accidents?" followed by a Freedom of Information Act request with the Pentagon and a 10-month wait.

I ask a similar simple question, “Why”, and a reader somewhere can lodge this “Y” with the Air Force Inspection and Safety Center followed by a Freedom of Information Act request with the Pentagon. Like a Japanese prostitute, I’m sure the Pentagon will say “Love you long time”.

Stalin-Dzhugashvili-Rothschild

Stalin was born Iosef Vissarionovich Dzhugashvili on 21 December 1879 in Gori, the Republic of Georgia, 40 miles west of Tbilisi. He was nicknamed 'Soso' as a child. Like Hitler, Stalin's family history is full of cover stories – layer upon layer.[1]

Stalin's mother, Katerine Meladze, was a peasant girl who had been taught to read and write. She came with strong aspirations. Her father died before she was born and she was raised by her uncle Petre Khomuridze. Her extended family were craftsmen and innkeepers with connections to merchants and a few aristocrats, so Stalin had a prominent godfather.

At 16, Katerine Meladze[2] married Besarion Dzhugashvili (22) a self-employed cobbler, which then came under the banner 'artisan' – one step above 'peasant'. Unlike most Georgian artisans at that time, Besarion was able to read and write.

Their first two sons died in infancy. Their third son Iosef/Stalin was born when Katerine was 22 and Besarion (nicknamed Beso) was 28. As a third son, by Georgian and Russian tradition, Stalin was considered a gift from God, but he was accident-prone, so was rarely free of physical pain. He had measles, scarlet fever and smallpox, which left him badly scarred and earnt him the name Chopura (Poxy). He was then run over by a carriage and got blood poisoning which withered his left arm and shoulder. In 1890, his legs were run over by another carriage and he got another nickname, Geza (Crooked).

---

[1] Katerine Meladze was also known as 'Ekaterina Georgievna Geladze-Djugashvili' (also 'Gheladze Dzhugashvili') and was nicknamed 'Keke'.

[2] Stalin's names were 'Ioseb Jughashvili' or 'Iosef Vissarionovich Dzhugashvili' ('Son of a Jew'). His affectionate childhood names were 'Soso' and 'Soselo'. He was called 'Chopura' (Poxy, aged 6) and 'Geza' (Crooked, aged 11), 'Ryaboi' (police nickname for pockmarked face, so Stalin wore makeup, especially for photos); 'Kochba' (the leader of the Jews who lead an uprising against the Romans); 'Koba' (a hero in the romance novel Nunu by Kazbek, 1899–1913); 'J. Besoshvili' (son of Besarion, which he used for his journalism in 1906); 'Oganess Vartanovich Totomyants'; 'Chizhikov'; 'David'; 'Ivanov'; 'Ivanovich'; 'Nizheradze'; 'Vassily'; 'Vassilyev'; 'K. Kato' (his first wife's knickname); 'K. St.'; 'Ko.'; 'Stalin' (Man of Steel, which Lenin gave him in 1912/3); and 'Joseph Stalin' (Jewish for "Prince of Steel"). Stalin was variously born on 6 December 1878 and 21 December 1879. When Russia changed from the Julian to the Gregorian Calendar on 14 February 1918, 13 days were added. These calendar changes occurred across the globe between 1582 and 1923 and also involved adding another year by some countries, principally the British Empire. No one seems to know what happened to this extra year, but it was used for historical obfuscation, especially of foreign British agents.

Conditions were harsh and a third of the children saw their fathers go bankrupt, get disabled in some way, or die before they turned 13.

Stalin's father Beso was of average height, with long eyebrows and a big black moustache. He was very gloomy, considered odd, and when he came home the children stopped playing in the rooms. When Stalin was six, Beso started to go downhill and the family moved house nine times in ten years – something you do when you fail on the rent. He took to the drink, lost customers, and their marriage broke up in 1890.

The second time Stalin was run over by a carriage, and was recovering in hospital, his father gave him an ultimatum – move with him to Tbilisi and become a cobbler, or return to Gori, live with his mother, and train as a priest. Stalin took to his mother's pantry and Beso soon followed his son, begging to be taken back. Katerine refused and Stalin never saw his father again.[3] Besarion sought solace in alcohol and lived in a Tibilisi dosshouse. Two decades later he was taken to hospital and died from cirrhosis of the liver. That was 1909.

Single-minded Katerine instilled an obstinate pursuance of goals in the young Stalin, and by many accounts, beat him as much as Beso. She had been 'deserted', demoted from an artisan's wife to a drudge (a person who does tedious, menial, or unpleasant work), but managed to cajole enough money out of some authority figures to get Stalin off the streets and into school. She had become religious, which is what you do when your level of entertainment is at an all-time low, and she directed Stalin into the priesthood – something he failed at miserably.

Georgians speculated Stalin was illegitimate and this was the reason Besarion deserted his unfaithful wife and her offspring. Out of this legend, two names emerged: Nikolai Przhevalsky and Prince Yakov Egnatashvili.

Nikolai Przhevalsky was a heroic Georgian explorer and misogynistic homosexual. He hated women and would hardly have had sex with one. Knowing himself to be misogynistic, he spent his time exploring Central Asia, and was on the Chinese border when Stalin was conceived.

With a bit more research, limited by how much a Semitic-backed historian can tell you,[4] Stalin's father became Prince Yakov Egnatashvili, a boxing enthusiast and wealthy Jewish wine merchant in Gori who employed Stalin's Jewish mother as a laundress (drudge work).

[3] In official depositions Stalin stated that his father had abandoned the family.

Espayo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

In Gori, Armenians ran commerce, foreign capitalists controlled industry, and Georgian aristocrats, upstaged in their own capital city, led a more or less tolerable life in the fertile countryside; hence a prince could be a wine merchant and wouldn't have much say in what foreign industrialists did, including having sex with their home help.

The problem with this parentage is that Yakov was well-built and Stalin was puny. As an adult, Stalin stood 5 foot 4 inches (1.62 m) with a potbelly, narrow shoulders and false teeth. He was not robust and had to use his mouth and lack of judgement to bully. His fists were useless and he would have lost almost any fight – typical amongst the Jews.

To make it to the world stage you need connections. Those connections have to be to a financial empire, to Jews, to warmakers, preferably to the Rothschilds, and preferably with some huge family shame attached. Shame helps with the required silence for the unseen hand to remain unseen and keep working.

That Stalin's father was a drunk and beat him does not provide enough shame. That Stalin's father was a homosexual is shameful, but that he was a hero cancels this out. That Stalin's mother Katerine was a laundress for a wine merchant and took one on the copper does not provide enough shame.

The winners of the war write the history, and the Rothschilds funded both sides of the wars, so they were always writing history.[5] The Rothschilds were manipulating wars decades ahead, and this included the protagonists of war. The protagonists of war were always written into the history books as retaliating against some great evil after a long struggle . . . and the agenda of those wars was always to secure some financial benefit to the Rothschilds. This meant that the Rothschilds were always reliant on some great speaker. During war, leaders that could not whip up a crowd were killed off – Neville Chamberlain included. This is called 'engineering patriotism' and it requires a great speaker.

In the build-up to Stalin's conception, the Rothschilds needed to secure the ports that were to deliver their oil to the West. To achieve this, they ensured the port was under Russian protection and under armed guard. Russia has long been taken over by the Jews, and the [5] The Rothschilds own four of the six publishing houses, and most publishers are a subset of these six main publishing houses. This is why there is so much information praising Jews or establishing them as victims and justifying their right to self-determination in someone else's land, which is now most, if not all countries.

Rothschilds have manipulated Russian politics and history as much as they have manipulated British politics and history, and Israeli politics and history. This included the removal of the Czar and the Russian monarchy, the purchase of vast tracts of Palestinian land before it became Israel, and interbreeding with the British Royal Family (to such an extent that they have been a subset of the Rothschild family since the ugly Queen Victoria and before). This came complete with all the shame that Hitler and Stalin had about their parentage.

Funding, and then interbeeding, with the European royal families enabled the Rothschilds to create war wherever and whenever they needed to secure their interests. This was generally where there was oil, just prior to exporting, and amongst factions that were giving the Rothschild-supported Jews a hard time somewhere else.

The Rothschild conception of Stalin builds upon these stories cover upon cover upon cover.

Prince Yakov (James) Egnatashvili was a wealthy Georgian-Jewish wine merchant. Baron Edmond de Rothschild (1845–1934) was a slightly built heterosexual wine producer and connoisseur who sold his wines under the name 'Carmel'. Edmond was part of the Paris branch of the Rothschild banking empire and was "not directly involved in the finances" – but how could you not be? He had dinner with his father and brothers, who were the leading bankers in France, and had free access to the safes with their unlimited funds – so much so that the Rothschilds burnt their bank records to hide the real history.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Baron Edmond de Rothschild (1845–1934).

Stalin's hometown of Gori had been a worldwide trading centre. It was a famous grape-growing area, a place to buy horses from the great Central Asian horse markets (to improve the Rothschild thoroughbred lines), and to secure the new oil fields in Baku.

The Rothschilds were in competition with the Rockefellers' Standard Oil, and along with oil, they needed access to a port, and that port would have to be secure.

To achieve their warring aims (securing a port for oil exports), they sent their benevolent son. Benevolence is the best form of cover when securing information for war, and Edmond always fronted as being involved in charities.

The benevolent son, Baron Edmond de Rothschild, was weedy, not involved in the bank, loved the arts, was sensual and passionate, and, like many of the Rothschilds, he was prone to conceiving illegitimate children.

One Rothschild was known to acknowledge twenty illegitimate children, but trouble and strife at home were a primary reason for writing the Rothschild history otherwise. Once Stalin had become a 'success', what wealthy parent would put their hand up and say "That's my boy".

The great Baku oil region in the Caucasus began to be developed in 1873, with Stalin conceived six years later. The Caucasus included Georgia, of which Gori was an important wine and trading town. A Rothschild conception with a Jewish laundress/drudge/divorcée was not a difficult task when you were in control of the area's most profitable exports – oil, wine and horses (as compared to its biggest exports, timber, wool and cotton).

Two years before Stalin was conceived,[6] the Rothschilds arranged a war between their two clients, Turkey and Russia, no doubt funding both sides. As a result, the southwest Georgian port of Batumi, 20 kilometres into Turkey, was annexed in 1878 and became the property of Russia. Batumi remained armed and guarded. The Rothschilds then funded the Baku-to-Batumi railroad and shipped the Rothschild oil from Baku in the Caucasus, to Batumi on the Black Sea, and then on to the West, thus competing with Rockefeller oil.[7]

In another of history's scams, no doubt blamed on religion, Russia got 20 kilometres of new land, a subtropical deepwater port (14–22°C), a new railroad, and a share in the oil . . . and the Rothschilds secured their market share alongside the Rockefellers.

History doesn't mention that the British were bribed to support the annexing, and in exchange, were 'allowed to occupy Cyprus', or that the Russian military was virtually taken over by the Rothschilds in the process and has been at their beck and call ever since.

[6] Stalin was conceived on 6 March 1879 ±18 days. This was between 16 February and 24 March 1879. The Old Style Gregorian Calendar would make this 21 February 1878 ±18 days.

[7] Batumi was formerly 'Batum', 'Batoum', 'Bathus', or 'Bathys', meaning "deep harbour". It is the last stop on the Transcaucasian railroad and the Baku oil pipeline. In 1901, Stalin returned to Batumi and organised strikes. It was a tough ask for a cripple named 'Geza Chopura' (Crooked Poxy).

The Rothschilds can now call the Russian military up, or tell them to stand down. Variations on this include having the Russian military make statues and movies of historic battles that never existed. This is called ruse history and it covers much of history. Much of history is distraction history, just as much of the news is distraction news.

This has carried through into Russian politics. Over the last 100 years, Russian politics can best be described as "a liar's paradise". The best liars move up the political ladder. Those who murder and lie become president. With the president of Russia or the USSR, the most important criteria is to secure oil for the Jews. Behind the scenes, and behind history, most Russian presidents are Zionists – the former KGB/FSB head and President Vladimir Putin among them.

Baron Edmond de Rothschild was the youngest son of James de Rothschild, the head of the Paris branch of Rothschild banking. It was Rothschild tradition that the youngest son do charity work and put a nice face to the Rothschilds' warring empire. Using these qualities, attributes and station as cover, Baron Edmond de Rothschild did much of the legwork for the Rothschild oil experts and the creation of wars.

treasurer@platinumparty.org

Edmond was sensual and oversensitive, methodical and meticulous, but given to Marie Antoinette manners, which made him not politically correct, especially when alcohol, a distant location and a full set of breasts combined to present themselves into something called urge-and-opportunity.[8]

Whenever Baron Edmond wanted to reach a specific destination he would whip up his troops and jump in his palanquin – a horseless, wheel-less carriage which four men lifted and did the walking for him.

[8] Later in life, Baron Edmond de Rothschild developed a strange aura of religion and emanated an ethical obsession – hence Jewish historians all record his personal traits in later life and don't mention the stray rooting in his early life. According to an astrological chart, Baron Edmond de Rothschild had "a mobile, changing and unpredictable sensitivity, over-oriented to contemplation, a trend to love the marvellous, to be open to the indefinable, and to perceive people and situations as a whole . . . with a tendency to go right to the goal, with no detour and no nuance of any sort. He moved very slowly and removed all resistance."

Baron Edmond de Rothschild loved to travel overseas on the family yacht. From France to the Caucasus, the yacht stopped on the shores of the Black Sea, then he travelled by land in his palanquin across the Republic of Georgia, resting up with the wealthy Georgian-Jewish wine merchant Prince Yakov Egnatashvili. Edmond was a well-known wine connoisseur and his family owned the world's finest vineyards and only wanted to expand.

Bored, but happy with his sailing; exhausted by his land travels, but elated by his stylish arrival; Baron Edmond de Rothschild got drunk with his business associate, spilt wine all over his shirt and went down to the laundry. The disillusioned wife of a cobbler, with two dead sons, Katerine Dzhugashvili (22) helped Edmond (32) off with his shirt and the two conceived a child on top of the warm copper one winter's evening. This "sensual and sensitive opportunism" may then have became a pattern for the entire time Baron Edmond was at Prince Yakov Egnatashvili's estate.

A child was conceived – the God-sent third son – and named Iosef Vissarionovich Dzhugashvili, with the nickname 'Soso'. By the time Stalin turned six, his father began to notice a lack of resemblance and took to the drink. They moved nine times in ten years, his business went downhill, and he moved away from the family when Stalin was 12.

In his late teens, Soso/Iosef's seminary training was funded by the wine merchant Prince Yakov Egnatashvili, who in turn was rewarded with a secure wine contract with the Rothschilds. Typically, this would involve supplying the Rothschilds with wine, grapes, cuttings, viticultural advice and trained workmen.

Soso/Iosef was kicked out of the seminary for espousing Marxism, then became the disgruntled, but organised thief Koba, who specialised in robbing Jewish jewellery stores and banks – those that were in opposition to the Rothschilds. After a particularly violent robbery in which Iosef/Koba clubbed people to death with a pistol butt, Lenin named him 'Stalin' – "Man of Steel".

J.W. STALIN
Foto 1894

Stalin in 1894, aged 15.

As 'Joseph Stalin', the illegitimate Rothschild was now the Jews' 'Prince of Steel' and spent most of his life as their agent – protected, trained, and in power. By the age of 73, Stalin was planning WWIII under his own steam. The Rothschilds weren't ready, so they conspired to take him out in the 'Doctor's Plot'. In typical Jewish historymaking, this has not been solved to this day.

The illegitimate children of the Rothschilds (Stalin and Hitler) had a love-hate relationship with the Rothschilds, their banks, and their oil interests – typical of illegitimate children – as is failure to be appreciative.

The two favourite illegitimate Rothschild sons failed to appreciate that the only reason they were elevated by the unseen hand was due to their Rothschild parentage. What the Rothschilds knew was that their hatred could be utilised – so they were trained in public speaking.

Baron Edmond de Rothschild had been planning to buy up vast tracts of land in Palestine (506 km^2) to create a homeland for the Jews, and in the 17 years from 1882–99, he spent US$100 million on the Jewish colonisation of Palestine.[9]

The method of acquiring Israel was so expensive, a war was required to finish the purchase . . . but the Rothschilds' biggest fear was having hundreds of thousands of poor Jews arriving and requesting handouts. Socialism was for the rest of the world and not for their State of Israel, so the poor Jews would have to be killed. This task was given to the illegitimate Rothschilds, in particular Stalin and Hitler . . . and they took to it like a handshake in a business deal.

treasurer@platinumparty.org

As soon as the Jews (Hitler, Stalin, Churchill and Roosevelt) had killed enough Jews, WWII was cancelled and the State of Israel was created. This new Jewish state included all the lands Baron Edmond de Rothschild had purchased . . . and Israel has been the centre of armed conflict ever since, with the last 60 years of Israel's wars advertised in the media every week as "another breakdown in Middle East peace talks".

[9] Estimation by David Landes, Harvard economist and historian. US$100 million is the budget of a small country, although the Rothschilds are suspected of printing the money for these purchases. These purchases were all done through local agents to avoid the watchful eye of the Sultan of the Ottoman Empire, who was also the Caliph of the Muslim World. In Palestine-soon-to-be-Israel, Baron Edmond de Rothschild was never known by his name, only by the titles given to him – The Baron, The Prince, The Well-known Benefactor, or Father of the Settlement. This is reminiscent of Churchill ordering counterfeit money to pay the US for arms in 1940 before Lend-Lease came in – the US answer to Britain's counterfeiting.

Like Russian politics, the media is a liar's paradise. "Another breakdown in Middle East peace talks is code for "war in and around Israel continues as planned, and continues to be fronted by naïve media support".

With the Rothschilds owning the banks that fund both sides of the wars, supplying oil to both sides of the wars, having spent over US$100 million puchasing land in Palestine/Israel, bringing Westerners to live on Israel's Rothschild kibbutz[10] for mind control as sleeper agents, and training Israeli intelligence to subvert Western politics . . . the Rothschilds have no intention for peace in Israel, nor for that matter, the rest of the world.

Many of the Western sleeper agents were then promoted into the media and always give a sympathetic Semitic tinge to reports on Israel. On top of this, the Jews purchased vast tracts of the Western media, control others through lobby groups, and old intelligence agents are financed through the media at such a rapid pace, they now virtually own the thing (Rupert Murdoch with Fox and BskyB).

When you don't play the game, you go the way of Robert Maxwell, dead from a heart attack off the back of his yacht near the Canary Islands.[11] As an Israeli agent, Maxwell was given, what was virtually a state funeral, on the Mount of Olives, where the most revered heroes are buried.

Instead of "wandering Jews", we now have "wandering Arabs". The Jews were supposed to wander in a desert for 40 years. Whether the desert was real or metaphorical, the Arabs have been wandering in a metaphorical desert for the last 60 years.

To remove the Arabs out of Palestine and all surrounding oil-rich countries, the Jewish-controlled media has been establishing sympathy for Arabs in the West. This has extended into Western politics, itself controlled through sexually-deviant shame.

[10] A kibbutz is a planned collective community that can be traced back to the creation of Israel (1948) and continues to the present day. Combining socialism and Zionism with practical labour (Labor Zionism), the kibbutz are a unique Israeli experiment, one of the largest in history. With media support and subtle Israeli Intelligence influence, they attracted interest from the entire world. The kibbutz held up to 7% of Israel's population and have raised a disproportionate number of Israeli military leaders, intellectuals, and politicians, as well as shaping the image foreigners have of Israel more than any other Israeli institution. (Wikipedia).

[11] Robert Maxwell (d. 5 November 1991) was born Ján Ludvik Hoch (b. 10 June 1910) in what is now the Ukraine. It was then the easternmost province of Czechoslovakia.

Baron James de Rothschild.

Baron Edmond de Rothschild.

It would appear that Stalin named his first son 'Yakov' (James), after his supposed father and wealthy Jewish wine merchant Prince Yakov Egnatashvili, after his real father Baron Edmond James (Yakov) de Rothschild, and after his real grandfather Baron James (Yakov) Mayer Rothschild.

Stalin's grandfather was Baron James de Rothschild of Paris, whose father was Mayer Amschel Rothschild. Hitler's grandfather was Lionel Nathan Rothschild of London, whose grandfather was Mayer Amschel Rothschild. This meant that Stalin was second cousin to Adolf Hitler's father.

This is not dissimilar to the genital loop where Churchill was first cousin to Adolf Hitler's father Alois.[12] It also means that Churchill and Stalin were related. Churchill's great-grandfather was Mayer Amschel Rothschild. So was Stalin's. This made Churchill and Stalin second cousins. In plain language, the relationship is:

Yakov.

Stalin with daughter Svetlana and son Vasily.

Churchill was first cousin to Adolf Hitler's father.

Stalin was second cousin to Adolf Hitler's father.

Churchill and Stalin were second cousins.

Stalin was a full Jew.

Churchill was $^7/_8$ Jew.

Hitler was at least ½ Jew and probably ¾ Jew.

Baron James de Rothschild.

In the racket of war, oil-for-transport, and tax-for-peace, the achievements of Stalin's grandfather Baron James de Rothschild offered protection to his son Baron Edmond James de Rothschild, which was passed down to his illegitimate son Iosef/Soso/Chopura/Geza/Koba/Stalin.

Baron James de Rothschild was the most powerful banker in France, but he didn't get there by patronising the arts. Edmond's father was known for his deception,[13] back-door dealings, the rape of most European countries' banking systems, and as the instigator of wars for over 50 years. This made Baron James de Rothschild something of an equivalent killer to his grandson Joseph Stalin, but has never been acknowledged as such.

Betty de Rothschild.

In 1822, Baron James de Rothschild was elevated to Baron by the 'Holy Roman Emperor' (essentially Austria) and was then awarded the French Legion of Honour in 1823. This made him and his children virtually untouchable in Europe. Along with his sophisticated Viennese niece/wife Betty, he was the centre of Parisian culture and also had the patronage of King Louis Philippe of France. When the French monarchy was toppled, he managed to gain the patronage of Napoleon III.[14]

---

[13] Baron Edmond de Rothschild inherited this trait. During the Peace Conference of 1919, he spoke one thing to the Zionist Sokolov, and another to the anti-Zionist Sylvain Lévi, with both believing him to be genuiine and the Baron also believing himself to be genuine.

[14] Some say the French monarchy was toppled because King Louis Philippe dissed his sophisticated niece/wife Betty, not allowing her into the court because she was not Christian. This may not have been the primary reason as there was a drive to topple the monarchies all across Europe, replacing them with the hidden Rothschild dictatorships and puppet governments – but one of his sons may have taken up the challenge to avenge his mother.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Baron James de Rothschild also played a major role in the development of railroads, in which his son Baron Edmond de Rothschild was to follow. By the time Baron James de Rothschild died in 1868, the Paris House of Rothschild was the wealthiest of them all with a capital around £12 million. This made his son Baron Edmond de Rothschild virtually untouchable. Conceiving Stalin was easy. Covering for it was just as easy. Rothschilds could suppress history with the raise of an eyebrow and buy the justice system with a wink and a nod.

From the 1880s, Baron Edmond de Rothschild became involved in Jewish affairs. This included the pogroms in Russia, which involved killing poor Jews and exiling Jews so there would be a need for a homeland. It also made the Russian monarchy easier to topple. Wars, whether civil or international, always rely on public support.

To purchase Palestinian land, Baron Edmond de Rothschild used the Sefarades (Arabic-speaking Jewish natives). The Sefarades got all the background information about the Palestinians and acted as intermediaries and go-betweens with the local authorities to buy large amounts of Palestinian land. If a Jew like Baron Edmond de Rothschild was known to be involved, the Ottoman pashas would have interceded in what later became known as "The Rothschild Colonization". Baron Edmond used to say, "Capital was the first settler in Palestine", and it was, but many of these settlements are now ghost towns.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

In 1911, Baron Edmond de Rothschild became the President Consistoire de Paris. After WWI he joined the political activity of the Zionist organisation and aided the chemist Chaim Weizmann (later Israel's first president), his cousin's grandson Lionel Walter Rothschild, and the Jewish Lord Balfour to assign British support for a state of Israel. This became the Balfour Agreement and was essentially a letter that received a lot of post-written hype.

Edmond helped form the Palestine Jewish Colonization Agency (PICA) and was then named the honorary president of the Jewish Agency in 1929. He tried to buy the Wailing Wall several times and failed, but his attempts killed even more Jews, this time their mass slaughter at the Wailing Wall in 1929.

It wasn't until the 1850s that the "science of Judaism" was born in Germany and France, and institutions were founded like the Palestine Exploration Fund in London, and the Biblical School in Jerusalem.

This was 'backed up' by Baron Edmond's archaeological obsession and the suppression of archaeological material that was not of Jewish ancestry – the selective manufacture of archaeological digs.

Archaeological digs always have predetermined goals, and their funding is based on achieving these goals, and not other goals, or the goals of others. By extension, the Jews discovered they could be the actors in history and that with their selective finds they could modify the script of history.[15]

The Rothschilds' original family home in the ghetto of Frankfurt on Main. Hardly what you would call a ghetto – it's a five-storey mansion.

[15] Zadoc Kahn, M-M Chapuis and Max Polonovski, head of the Jewish heritage in France.

The archaeological digs were intensified to show “witness items”, and these were used to justify the occupation of Palestine. These were widely advertised through the media such as the Jewish-owned TIME magazine, and every flake in the West wanted to take part in these discoveries.

This continued through Baron Edmond de Rothschild’s manipulation of the logistics of the Alliance Israélite Universelle for the benefit of his own designs between 1899–1920. (The AIU was founded in 1860, ten years after the birth of the “science of Judaism”.)

From WWI, the German-Russian influence in Jewish Palestine was dominant. This had come about under a British mandate and it became necessary to break this apart, so . . . Britain and Germany were at war in WWII, then Germany attacked Russia in 1941, then Britain and Russia were in a Cold War, 1961–90. This removed any cohesiveness amongst the dominant German-Russian influence in the Jewish-occupied Palestine, and the Jews became autonomous in Palestine with the formation of Israel in 1948.

The Wilson Declaration of 1919 led to the saying “the right of the peoples to self-determination” – which was designed to bounce back as a justified war for an Israel in Palestine. After WWII this was further refined with the redefinition of Human Rights, which was then signed by the new president of the Alliance Israélite Universelle, René Cassin – a Rothschild agent in a Rothschild agenda-driven university.

This was all part of the ‘science of Judaism’.
The illegitimate Rothschild son Joseph Stalin also signed.

This goes a long way to showing that pieces of paper (contracts and declarations) aren’t worth the paper they’re printed on, and if you break the rules on the world stage, rather than act, the Moral Right sends you another piece of paper, equally as valueless and less powerful than a slap on the wrist with a wet bus ticket – which is what the United Nations is known for.

The history of the pioneers after the Holocaust (which the Jews call Shoah) and the foundation of Israel in 1948 was also rewritten. The way history is transmitted to official historians and recorded is called historiography. The result affects our collective memory. If false, it is brainwashing.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

The media now specialises in this form of brainwashing and the Shoah/Holocaust is now incorporated into many films, although the completeness of its reality is questionable. The Holocaust is still being used to cover for Jewish crimes to this day. If any other race or religion committed the crimes the Jews do (mass murder, war creation, mind control, the takeover of entire mediums like film, televisions, print, and entire industries like porn, ecstasy, banking, and arms manufacture), then there would be a public outcry. As it is, we just sit on our backsides and watch them deliver it to us on TV. That it makes no sense doesn’t seem to bother us. That it is delivered, and we don’t have to do anything to receive it, is a pleasure.

It was much the same thing. Stalin and Hitler were both National Socialists who filled the void of toppled monarchies. Still, I wouldn't have minded being in the meeting rooms when these plans were being discussed.

BROTHERS AT ARMS.

The Illegitimate Rothschild Family Tree

An illegitimate family can promote its children without others crying nepotism. When this family is rich, it is a scenario for massive influence and when this family owns the central banking system, it's is a force for history. The 20th century was just such a family operation.

Like the later half of the 19th century, all of the 20th century belonged to the Rothschilds and there were virtually no major events that weren't organised and executed by them.

It is incredulous that a son of a cobbler, a son of a customs agent and a son of a peasant would rise through the ranks of supported crime to become dictators of countries and occult mass murderers. It is not what you know, it is who you know – and when it comes to war and leading countries into war, it is who you are related to.

Wars are not fought between countries, they are fought for an extended period of time for resources and bankers' profits. The war draft is not a government draft, it is a bank draft, and currently each person sent into war has a collateral value of $100,000.

Hitler murdered 22.5 million people – currently US$22.5 trillion.
Stalin murdered 68 million people – currently US$68 trillion.
Mao murdered 66.66 million people – currently US$66.66 trillion.[1]
Churchill murdered several million including 860,000 in 13 hours.

The Rothschilds' Hitler, Stalin, and Mao killed 157.16 million between them. Including the Rothschild-Churchill kills, this is over 160 million.

So what does it take to kill 160 million people?
Four illegitimate Rothschilds.

The Rothschilds owned the central banking system and created wars for resources and loaned money to both sides. The governments surrendered their citizens to death in exchange for bank credit. To achieve this con of history – commonly known as war – the Rothschilds used their illegitimate sons as a patriotic front – no nepotism suspected.

There are no heroes in war, only those who haven't resisted. The culture of war heroes is supported by the banks. It costs nothing to award a hero, just a bit of brass, silk and ceremony, and everyone loves a ceremony. Everyone likes to believe they lived and died for something, but in the case of war, they are wrong.

---

[1] More recent figures suggest Mao killed 300 million – making me a casual conservative.

This makes 136 white hats (‘death and misfortune’).

There are another 8 white naval hats to the outside (‘forever guarding’).

There are 2 naval white hats leading (‘to lead’).

There are 8 soldiers facing backwards (‘all of history past’).

There are 5 bearskin hats (‘occult tradition and sacrifice’, dating back to Waterloo).

There is 1 Winston Churchill.

Separating the two naval white hat leaders out, the 158 people + 2 leaders reads as (‘to lead one occult everywhere’).

In its simplest summation, the 160 people in the procession, including Winston Churchill reads as ‘one birth to death’.

Winston Churchill was a Freemason and a Druid. According to the Golden Dawn coven numbers, of which Winston Churchill was an occult practitioner, his funeral cortège signifies: “The future has misfortune everywhere. Death and death after a process, and war, and war in peacetime will create an infinite void. Life is occult through and through, from beginning to end there is death and misfortune. Occult tradition and sacrifice forever guards all of history past. Lead one occult everywhere. This is one birth to death.”

Nothing has ever summed up Churchill better than this funeral cortège . . . yet this is more or less a standard military funeral procession.

Chief Justice Sian Elias is a thief, a slapper,
a Sayanim Mossad agent, and a contract killer.

Judge Hole has syphilis.

Brian Edwards is a paedophile. He wrote Prime Minister Helen Clark's biography, HELEN, Portrait of a Prime Minister, 2001.

"This is a remarkable story of courage and endurance, the story of an exceptional woman told by one of New Zealand's most respected and enduring broadcasters and journalists. Brian Edwards has been close to the epicentre of power since the late 1960s, when his subject's political odyssey was beginning. His authoritative account is the first book to be published on Helen Clark and will provide the indispensable foundation for any future biography." In 2006, Helen Clark was ranked 20th in 'The Forbes 100 Most Powerful Women'.[1]

Brian Edwards is a bisexual and a paedophile. He was first caught in bed with a 12-year-old girl at Messines Road in Karori, Wellington in 1971. He was caught in bed with another 12-year-old girl at 21 Salamanca Road in Kelburn, Wellington, in 1981, and was evicted soon after, for unpaid rent. The 12-year-old girl was from the Anglican Samuel Marsden Collegiate. Brian Edwards has chicken legs and a neckline that resembles a rooster. He has a PhD in Franz Kafka, which creates a riddle of law and international politics, and a society where the innocent are convicted and the guilty are let of scot-free.

Helen Clark is a KGB operative and tried to launch a nuclear strike on New Zealand's Taupo, working in conjunction with the Zionist Vladimir Putin, who lived in Wellington posing as a fisheries inspector (1980–82). This was done under cover of a Nuclear Free Zone. Much of this was published in the New Zealand Truth on 22 March 2007, and none of it has been answered. Helen's 'friends' are now beginning to ask questions.

[1] Forbes Asia, 18 Sept. 2006. Forbes is a Zionist rag that supports such Jewish rogues as Robert Maxwell (aka Jan Ludvik Hoch) and Rupert Murdoch, who kidnaps his own staff to make the news; and such KGB agents as Helen Clark, who was complicit in the same kidnapping of Olaf Wiig and Steve Centanni, as was Anita McNaught, Olaf Wiig's wife.

The Jews are not good rulers of the planet. They bred the Jewish leaders of WWII, hid their Jewish secret society origins and then used them to kill Jews in order to create a state of Israel. Ever since, Israel has been a Mecca for war, peace frauds, oil thefts, insurance jobs (9-11), international designer drug rings, and political-psychological sex-rings.

The sexual and psychological training of Western leaders has led to such control of governments, voting has become a complete waste of time, disguised, rather badly, as free choice.

This has resulted in a One World Order where entire economies are controlled by globalisation, where stock and financial markets are rigged – the Jews again – either to retain or replace the current leader of a country.

The British Police are constantly fitting people up for crimes that they, or their secret society, committed. The British Police then colonised the planet with their methods and now police everywhere routinely fit up their citizens – especially when they have spoken out.

Hitler, Stalin, Churchill and the British Monarchy were all related. They were all Jews, and all a subset of the Rothschild family. The famous five then went about migrating Jews through pogroms, and killing Jews under the guise of war. As planned, this created enough public sympathy to be given a country. Israel has been at war ever since and has provided the mechanisms and arms for most international conflicts from 1948 – with the Rothschilds creating the conflicts from the 1840s.

The media has become an exercise in lying to the public. The Jews control the media and the people in it. Through media lies the Jews have presented themselves as a meek peace-creating people. The opposite is true. The Jews are the biggest warmongers on the planet. They control the finances, the media, monarchies, governments, drugs, the sex industry and the financial markets – but principally they control the US Government to such a degree that America's international policy is Israel's domestic policy.

So why is Henry Kissinger, the Jewish mass murderer of some 50 million people, in the White House, and why has he remained unchallenged for four decades? A little background on inside jobs might help. Let's start with the British Police, Pearl Harbor and a nuclear test in San Francisco.

Notes: New Zealand

Chief Justice Sian Elias is a thief, a slapper,
a Sayanim Mossad agent, and a contract killer.

Judge Hole has syphilis.

Brian Edwards is a paedophile. He wrote Prime Minister Helen Clark's biography, HELEN, Portrait of a Prime Minister, 2001.

"This is a remarkable story of courage and endurance, the story of an exceptional woman told by one of New Zealand's most respected and enduring broadcasters and journalists. Brian Edwards has been close to the epicentre of power since the late 1960s, when his subject's political odyssey was beginning. His authoritative account is the first book to be published on Helen Clark and will provide the indispensable foundation for any future biography." In 2006, Helen Clark was ranked 20th in 'The Forbes 100 Most Powerful Women'.[1]

Brian Edwards is a bisexual and a paedophile. He was first caught in bed with a 12-year-old girl at Messines Road in Karori, Wellington in 1971. He was caught in bed with another 12-year-old girl at 21 Salamanca Road in Kelburn, Wellington, in 1981, and was evicted soon after, for unpaid rent. The 12-year-old girl was from the Anglican Samuel Marsden Collegiate. Brian Edwards has chicken legs and a neckline that resembles a rooster. He has a PhD in Franz Kafka, which creates a riddle of law and international politics, and a society where the innocent are convicted and the guilty are let of scot-free.

Helen Clark is a KGB operative and tried to launch a nuclear strike on New Zealand's Taupo, working in conjunction with the Zionist Vladimir Putin, who lived in Wellington posing as a fisheries inspector (1980–82). This was done under cover of a Nuclear Free Zone. Much of this was published in the New Zealand Truth on 22 March 2007, and none of it has been answered. Helen's 'friends' are now beginning to ask questions.

[1] Forbes Asia, 18 Sept. 2006. Forbes is a Zionist rag that supports such Jewish rogues as Robert Maxwell (aka Jan Ludvik Hoch) and Rupert Murdoch, who kidnaps his own staff to make the news; and such KGB agents as Helen Clark, who was complicit in the same kidnapping of Olaf Wiig and Steve Centanni, as was Anita McNaught, Olaf Wiig's wife.

The Jews are not good rulers of the planet. They bred the Jewish leaders of WWII, hid their Jewish secret society origins and then used them to kill Jews in order to create a state of Israel. Ever since, Israel has been a Mecca for war, peace frauds, oil thefts, insurance jobs (9-11), international designer drug rings, and political-psychological sex-rings.

The sexual and psychological training of Western leaders has led to such control of governments, voting has become a complete waste of time, disguised, rather badly, as free choice.

This has resulted in a One World Order where entire economies are controlled by globalisation, where stock and financial markets are rigged – the Jews again – either to retain or replace the current leader of a country.

The British Police are constantly fitting people up for crimes that they, or their secret society, committed. The British Police then colonised the planet with their methods and now police everywhere routinely fit up their citizens – especially when they have spoken out.

Hitler, Stalin, Churchill and the British Monarchy were all related. They were all Jews, and all a subset of the Rothschild family. The famous five then went about migrating Jews through pogroms, and killing Jews under the guise of war. As planned, this created enough public sympathy to be given a country. Israel has been at war ever since and has provided the mechanisms and arms for most international conflicts from 1948 – with the Rothschilds creating the conflicts from the 1840s.

The media has become an exercise in lying to the public. The Jews control the media and the people in it. Through media lies the Jews have presented themselves as a meek peace-creating people. The opposite is true. The Jews are the biggest warmongers on the planet. They control the finances, the media, monarchies, governments, drugs, the sex industry and the financial markets – but principally they control the US Government to such a degree that America's international policy is Israel's domestic policy.

So why is Henry Kissinger, the Jewish mass murderer of some 50 million people, in the White House, and why has he remained unchallenged for four decades? A little background on inside jobs might help. Let's start with the British Police, Pearl Harbor and a nuclear test in San Francisco.

Growing Up International Part Five: Ages ten to twelve

I am writing these autobiographical articles to help others understand how some international occultic societies program their members. The information in the articles is specific to the group I was raised in, but many of the methods described are used by other groups.

Trigger Warning: this article contains graphic descriptions of trauma and programming setups

By age ten, most children raised at the facility are quite accomplished in various areas, including training (they are at an age where they now develop their own training plans for others, and can work independently in most areas); and are able to do fairly advanced military exercises.

These years are basically used to build upon the previous skills learned, and to provide increasing opportunities to work independently in preparation for entering adult roles, which occurs at age 12 or 13, when they become full fathers in the order.

The scenarios and challenges given are increasingly complex, and the child will begin multi-tasking. Computer and hacking skills are now at an advanced level as well. While formal schoolwork is done, it is increasingly supplemented by more advanced practical skills in areas, such as:

- Performing surgery, including fetal transplants (assisting at first, then developing the ability to do so over time)
- Prenatal programming interventions
- Monitoring and evaluating baselines and outcomes for infants and children being programmed in the labs, and developing individualized training plans for review by the adult trainers, as well as problem-solving
- Increasing complex field missions, ranging from infiltration, to gathering intelligence
- Overseeing other children, and modeling skills and tasks
- Acting in increasingly complex roles in the programming labs (e.g., dressing in a specific role such as Lillith or Bel, and then combining this acting role with ongoing evaluation of how the child being programmed is responding to their script

Follow •••

- Helping to develop new technology or designer drugs with adult mentors drawing from fields that include chemistry, organic chemistry, neurobiology and others
- Dimensional travel (to the 12th and 13th dimensions) and advanced mage skills

The above are just a few examples of the skills that the children develop during the preteen years. They also increase on baseline athletic skills, with daily martial arts, sparring, and use of weapons, as well as the ongoing military exercises.

By the age of twelve, the child is considered ready (or almost ready, there is some variance between children) to step into their adult role. The long-anticipated “coming of age” ceremony, and the receiving of a full father’s black robes to replace the brown acolyte’s robe will occur.

All of the children at the facility, as well as selected leadership from the other 12 international occultic groups, come to the initiation into full fatherhood ceremony (note: females as well as males are are given male names in the order, and are addressed as “father” after completing this rite). This is the ceremony in which the child Anthony becomes “Father Anthony”.

The initiation ceremony begins early in the morning (at dawn), at a private location where an arena is located. The circular arena is surrounded by seats, where the various leadership in the groups sit. Each section will have the group banner displayed overhead, and there are canopies to help protect from the hot sun. The young father-to-be has been carefully instructed over the last year on what is expected, and how to perform their role. In the center of the arena are 1000 golden poles, with individuals of varying ages, from infancy to young adulthood tied. The group of fathers-to-be will spend the day killing them all with special golden knives, in a mass sacrifice that initiates them into the order.

Because it is hot, and the work becomes difficult, they are allowed to drink from golden bowls that contain wine during the day. At first, the infants and young children set up a wail and a cry that is chilling, but gradually ,as the day goes on, silence slowly overtakes both children and young adults. As a sacrifice is completed, a portion of blood is collected in a special bowl, and taken to an altar at the center of the field (dedicated to Satan, called “Theo” or ‘god’ by the members of the order).

By the end of the day, the young initiates are exhausted, and weary in both body and soul; the wine does not numb the pain and awful, soul-deadening effect quite enough. Some of the initiates stagger, or even fall, from this weight; but they are expected to rise and continue without assistance, or they will be unable to receive their ordination. Most do, but occasionally one will fail to be able to. The other initiates are under orders to kill the one who fails and does not rise within 15 minutes to continue.

Finally, as the sun begins to fall in the west, the ordeal is over. The killings and sacrificial offerings are completed, and the young initiates present themselves to the council. They are then blessed, take the oath of obedience and loyalty, and are given their father’s robes. They have spent the day conducting sacrifices to show their complete obedience and loyalty to satan, and to bringing in his plan for the world. The members of the council greet the new fathers with a kiss and embrace, and then they are honored at a special banquet attended by the top leaders of the other societies, as well as the leadership in the Order.

After the feast, the new fathers are allowed to rest. Due to the oppressive effect of conducting mass ritual slayings, the fathers are allowed several needed days to rest and recover; days spent with those they love best. Each one is praised and given special time with their main mentors and parental figures in the order as a reward for completing this difficult ceremony.

Soon, they will begin their new life as a fully adult member of the order, working in their adult role. Childhood is now considered over, and their real work will begin: to pave the way for the coming occultic messiah, and to help implement a world that will be ruled by him.

Stephanie,
It was very difficult when I first remembered; I grieved for days, and am glad I had supportive friends during that time. I know that I am forgiven; that there is nothing that God cannot forgive from our past, and so I am now at peace with the fact that this is the past; and that I have chosen to leave this type of life for one where abuse does not occur.

To be clear, This is part of the Vatican. Endorsed by the Pope and Bishops. For me, being raised as a Catholic. this information is mind boggling.

Growing Up International Part Four: Ages Six to Twelve

I am writing these autobiographical articles to help others understand how some international occultic societies program their members. The information in the articles is specific to the group I was raised in, but many of the methods described are used by other groups.

Trigger Warning: this article contains graphic descriptions of trauma and programming setups

At age six, the members of the top class ('top' is decided by the trainers according to the child's performance in the previous 5 years) within the Jesuits enter the Vatican school. Classes have both boys and girls – trainers assign children to classes not according to gender but by performance. Other schools for training Jesuit children exist besides the Vatican one, and in all schools, the training will continue until graduation at age 12 -13 (when the individual becomes a full Father in a special ceremony). Military training continues until late teens, with yearly "boot camps" the members of the Jesuit army attend. Over time, the number of students diminishes (due to deaths during military exercises, or during programming) and by the time the children are 12, fewer children remain than began classes at age 6.

The Vatican School

The Jesuits like to tell their children they are receiving the "best education in the world". In some respects, it could be called "well rounded", but it has terrible aspects as well. A typical day would be as follows:

- Wake up at 5 am. The school is divided by age into classes of 12 each, separated by age: the six-year-olds are in one class, the seven-year-olds in another, etc. Each class sleeps in rows of beds in the same room, with the class leader taking the position by the door (to answer if anyone comes, and protect the class from any possible threats). Normally, the leader's "second" and "third" in command will sleep near him or her. I was the class leader for my class, so I slept closest to the door. The signal for waking up is a voice over speakers within the room saying

“Today is an opportunity to do great things for the Order; you are blessed to hav

- Quick cleanup at the communal bathroom (5-minute showers done together in a dress quickly (easy, since the brown acolyte robes are hung up the day before; this is what the children wear until they receive a Father’s black robes at age 12 or 13, except when they are being hosted in outside families, when they wear “normal” clothes for that country). The children rush downstairs to the communal dining room, where a nutritious breakfast is served. They are allowed 8 minutes to eat (to this day, I eat extremely quickly and never understood why, until I remembered the short times allowed to eat). There may be assigned tasks before chapel that are relevant to the children’s training, such as checking supplies for the military exercises, or cleaning up the lab areas, including the areas where animals are kept, such as primates, for experiments and teaching.
- After chores, the children go to chapel. This is a time of singing and devotion (to Satan). The children sing beautifully, sounding like a professional choir, but the lyrics are quite different from Christian hymns. The older children and teens at times create and write new songs, if they have musical talent.
- After chapel, classes begin. The first classes are “gym” with physical training exercises, including martial arts, hand-to-hand combat, and learning to climb ropes, etc. After this, the morning classes are devoted to typical school subjects, only much more advanced since the children are genetically modified for strength and intelligence). Children have already learned to read, write, do math, think and ask questions in a logical manner and so on, before the age of 6, preparing them to begin the more advanced studies in the Vatican school. Classes consist of learning various languages, world and civilization history, politics, economics, the history of various religions, advanced math, reading classics from every culture (in the original languages as the children get older).
- At noon, there is a quick break and meal (15 minutes).
- In the afternoon, there are “anatomy and physiology” classes where subjects (usually, homeless people or those purchased from refugee camps) are used to teach topics such as how to torture (including skinning alive; paralysis points, pain points, how to use knives and other instruments to inflict pain, including heated needles and rods). These classes also include demonstrations of various techniques for killing a human being, from suffocation, to poisons (the children are taught how to administer, and see the effects), to knives, and other methods. The children are given a living human being to “dissect” and learn anatomy from, since this knowledge is essential when torturing or programming others. In some of these classes, a live demonstration of the various areas of the brain is conducted, with one of the trainers using a probe to show the response to various areas being touched; and the children are taught to read brain monitors with real-time brain scans (much more advanced than the most advanced PET scans today), to read emotional and cognitive responses to stimuli. Practical “on-hands” classes in how to do programming are done in the afternoon as well.
- There is a half hour break in mid-afternoon, when the children are free to play soccer in an outdoor courtyard, or other active games.
- Around 5 pm is a short dinner break.
- In the evening (and, at times, in the afternoons) are the mage and witchcraft classes. This is when the children are taught spells, rituals, how to sacrifice animals and humans (using techniques taught in the afternoon classes), and how to read and write the ancient magical manuscripts.
- There is a short evening chapel afterwards, with a short talk about current world events and announcements of special events.
- Bedtime comes at around 9 pm; although the children may be woken during the night during special holidays or seasons to participate in the associated rituals and/or festivities.

The above is a generic schedule. School runs year round, in 4-6 week intervals, with a short" summer break" although training still continues. There is a short military camp at the end of each interval, and a special longer military camp. The children are also rotated through their host families, making coordinating scheduling quite complex (there are individuals who do this scheduling of children and host families to ensure that they are together at the same time). A typical child may spend a week in the UK with a host family, then complete 5 weeks of school; then, a brief military camp. After this, the child might be hosted in Germany for a week or two with their German family (mother, father, brothers, sisters), then return to the school for 4 weeks and military camp. After this, the child may spend 1 week in Russia, and 1 week in the US, then 1 week in Israel, then returns to Rome for more schooling.

While the child loves the host families in each presentation, they never fully bond to them; they know their real home is in Rome – with their brothers and sisters in their class, and with the Fathers they love.

The school years are very busy and full. There is very little time for "recreation" or free time, other than the daily break in the middle of the afternoon. In addition to the above schedule, the child will undergo regular programming, and will also be learning to program others (a training class which teaches the children how to install and reinforce programming is part of the core curriculum). Under the supervision of the older trainers, the children are mentored until by age 12 they are full trainers, able to do all that the adults do in this area. Some children with specialized skills are given special mentorship, and become head trainers when they are older.

Leadership skills are honed. A class leader is chosen for their ability to inspire the love and loyalty of the other class members, their own strength and skills, and the ability to make decisions for the good of the entire class and think quickly. Each child in the class is ranked according to ability, and the leader will have a "second" (who takes over if the leader is ill) and a "third" who helps back them up. Learning to work together, help one another, and overcome obstacles together is an important part of the training. The children compete against one another in a friendly fashion, and the daily scores (individual and class) are posted on a digital bulletin board for comparison (test scores, athletic scores, awards, special achievements, etc.). The goal is to instill excellence, and the competition is fierce at times, but typically within bounds (cheating and sabotage is frowned upon).

As the child matures, they are mentored in going on missions (including assassinations, and intelligence gathering), and assessed for the ability to think quickly and strategically under pressure. They are also mentored spiritually, and learn increasingly complex mage and witchcraft/sorcery skills. The child is continually assessed for their areas of greatest ability and performance, and are often given advanced training in subjects or skills they excel in (such as martial arts, ancient languages, military strategy, politics, etc.)

The child learns to perform surgery, both normal surgery (for healing), and specialized surgery such as performing placental transplants (this technology has been available for years, and is now part of the prenatal programming done; the fetus is transplanted into another birth mother, and is told that the first one "did not want" the fetus; this creates a huge rejection wound and bonds the fetus even more strongly to its trainers and the demonic. The child also learns various neurosurgery skills, and may receive advanced training if they show ability.

During these years, the children go to other schools (often within a monastery) for a semester, and the children at the other schools will come and spend a semester at the Vatican school. This allows for greater cross-training, and helps the children learn how things are done at various places.

As the child becomes older, they become skilled agents in every area: gathering intelligence; following and getting rid of “targets” while staying invisible and untrackable; training others; advanced mages. By age 12 or 13, if they have survived the previous 6 years of training and missions, will have the equivalent of a medical degree, a law degree, an advanced degree in political science and languages, and are equipped to “fit in” within almost any culture and strata of society. They are advanced mages and sorcerers. The child is now ready to undergo the ceremony to become a full Father, and receive their black robes.

Thank you for this breakdown. There are thousands of emotions that must come with living in this education facility/home. You have siblings there, comradery and yet many painful experiences too. Sending love to survivors as they journey life.

this is insanity. sounds like a horrifying movie that can’t be true. i have thought for a few years now that jesuits are the ones behind the new world order. i am canadian, P.E.Trudeau was our PM and now his son is. Do you know if they went through this training? Any knowledge of them? God bless you and keep you, Svali. if i can ever do anything to help you, it would be an honour. i’m a bible believing Christian, with all my hope in Jesus Christ. Lois

Hi, I prefer not to make comments about specific individuals. But I do believe that many of the leaders in countries around the world today are either mind controlled, or blackmailed into compliance. Thank you for your kindness.

Growing Up International Part Three: Ages Three to Six

I am writing these autobiographical articles to help others understand how international occultic societies program their members. The information in the articles is specific to the group I was raised in, but many of the methods described are used by other groups.

Trigger Warning: this article contains graphic descriptions of trauma and programming setups

At age three, the others in my group and I graduated from the white tunics we wore, to longer brown tunics (what acolytes in the order wear). This showed we were no longer infants and toddlers, and our training would progress with greater expectations.

The Monastery

At this time, I began to spend regular time at a monastery north of Rome that is very old and ancient, and not part of the "public" tours. The monastery is completely walled in with high walls. Inside, it was beautiful, with a walled in garden and bench on one side; a circular fountain in front of the main doorway inside, and flowers. The grounds were kept immaculately.

I was there to learn numerous things, including discipline (I learned to scrub the stone floors on my hands and knees without complaining; every once in a while, I would finish scrubbing, and to teach me humility, a father would come and urinate on the floor, and tell me to do it again. Normally, though, the tasks were completed and I could go to class.

At this time, I went into classes for part of each day (the preschoolers are genetically enhanced and highly intelligent, and go for four hours a day), where I learned languages, oral history, and how to read and write (I could do so by age three and a half, in several languages). I was also learning martial arts (one of my favorite classes at the time), and military skills, including how to take apart and put together a gun, how to shoot a target; how to defend myself against an attack dog; the use of various poisons, basic field first aid, how to climb over barriers, running, how to follow someone without being noticed, and other skills.

Follow •••

Amnesia and "Don't Talk" programming

I was also undergoing extensive amnesia programming at this time. In one setup, a father would come into the room, talk to someone else, and I was given a forget code by the father as he left. Later, I would be asked what I remembered. If I remembered anything at all, the father (who was someone I loved) was brought in and tortured in front of me (to show the "effect" of "remembering" on others). In one setup, I was switched through several parts in succession while doing a small "mission"; later each part was quizzed regarding whether they remembered any part of the sequence that they shouldn't. One time, they did; then the Father I loved held a gun to my head, and told me, "If you keep remembering, I will have to shoot you; we can't afford a security risk like this, much as it would hurt me to do this." I had seen a child shot for remembering too much (too much bleedthrough), so I knew the threat was real. The next time, I had complete amnesia when taken through sequences. My parts had gotten the message.

There were other amnesia setups, such as the "Remember the Flowers" setup (where the pool in the garden was filled with the partially submerged bodies of children and adults who I "remembered", some were doubles of myself and my classmates, as well as fathers I loved; the pool was also filled with water lilies). Each child represented a "flower" and the warning was to not remember, or they would be killed.

Because age 3 is a time when the child is very creative, many internal structures put in previously were heavily reinforced. These included internal trees (Tree of Life, Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, and Cruz, or the Cross of false martyrdom); the Garden of Eden, including the snake, Adam, Eve and Lillith (the first mother of all witchcraft, also called "Adam's second wife" by the programmers).

Spiritual Programming

At this time, the spiritual programming was also heavily reinforced for various systems. These included:

- Babylonian programming: deities, rituals and learning how to do sacrifices to the deities was done. These included Ashtoth, Bel, Ashtaroth, Molech and others. In one programming ritual, the child has hundreds of golden needles with wires inserted, and is hung from this series of wires in a very painful sun ritual (to Bel).
- Egyptian programming: deities and parts were reinforced, and sacrifices to Ra, Horus, Set and others was taught. For each of these "classes" the oral history of the cultures was also given. Internal pyramids with altars were installed, and chambers where the various parts lived internally were created. I was left in a re-creation of an ancient Egyptian chamber, chained to an altar; it was a rough night indeed, as I was terrorized by actors portraying "demons" and "Egyptian gods". This trauma reinforced the programming, and was meant to make it very difficult to remember.
- Ancient Ones programming: these were very old earth deities, with many appearing as giants in groves overseen by "ancient ones" with white hair and mage or high witchcraft/warlock skills.
- Q'bala programming: this was also installed to a greater degree during this time, with the three trees tied to the delta computer logic system.
- Druid programming: This programming was conducted in ancient groves, and included learning the appropriate sacrifices, how to set the stones in a magic circle, and being tied to a very large and old oak tree for the night.

Throughout these years, I was also taught how to perform rituals and sacrifices, learning how to dissect first a corpse, and later a living human being (homeless people were used in the school for these purposes). By the time I was six, I had dissected and learned how to carve a cadaver and living person expertly, how to peel skin (a torture technique), and other "skills". I knew all of the major organs, circulatory and nervous system structures, and nerve points. I was becoming very skilled at torture. At first, as a young child, I would turn white, or even vomit, but soon learned that this was not tolerated, and learned to dissociate my feelings.

Programming Training

All children in the group I was raised in have at least basic competency as a trainer or programmer. This training also continued in the "lab" time, and included instructional classes where my classmates and I were allowed to watch the older trainers and ask questions. We were also taught skills on homeless people and others considered less valuable, learning how to install programming; read brain scans and monitor responses. By age six, I had significant basic competency as a trainer, and could install many basic programs successfully.

Learning to Hate Traitors and Anti-Interrogation (setups)

Because loyalty was so basic to the order, my classmates and I were taught to heavily fear and hate traitors through setups that included:

- "traitors" breaking into the monastery and attempting to rape my classmates and I and set fire to the room. We fought them off, but they began overpowering us, until the Fathers came and drove them away
- Running away setup: all children become angry with the fathers during their training, and are allowed to "run away" with a setup . I "ran away" in anger, trying to escape my abuse at the monastery, and was picked up by friendly people who offered to take me to "safety". I agreed, and they drove me to another town. That night, and for the next three days, I was abused non-stop in terrible ways, until I managed to "escape" while they were sleeping, and was found and taken home to the monastery by the Fathers, who said they had been "sick with worry" about me. They would then ask me what my punishment should be for worrying them this way; once decided, the father would then go through half of the punishment for me (to show their "love). This setup was designed to teach me that the outside world was much worse than what I was undergoing, and to teach me to mistrust and hate "outsiders."
- During military setups, during which we camped out after marching all day, at times I would be "abducted" by an "enemy" (non-member of the order) who would spend time interrogating me. As a preschooler, this involved simple levels of torture, and refusal to answer questions. Later, I would manage to "escape" and the Fathers would rescue me, take me back to the monastery, and praise me for my "bravery" under torture, etc.

Learning to "rescue" others

Learning to rescue loved ones is a critical skill and belief system taught, since so much programming involves rescue of not only the self, but loved ones, from trauma, torture or death. These setups often involved doing something considered very "disobedient" (al l children do from time to time; the anger and rage from the constant abuse leaks out, and they defy orders or do things to act out their pain; this is expected and planned for). Upon defying an order, I was ordered to be flogged with a whip that had small bits of bone attached (a flagellum, a favorite punishment of the Jesuits). I realized that the amount of whipping ordered would likely cost my life (I had defied very badly). But then, the Father I loved most stepped in, and said "I will take the punishment for you." I was stunned. He was flogged until his skin was stripped and bleeding, looking at me the whole time with a loving face. I cried and screamed, and this reinforced for me the belief that if you love someone, you will take their pain for them.

Over the years, I learned to do this myself, in setup after setup, until the ultimate ones in which the Father I loved most asked "I know it will hurt badly, but are you willing to die for me?" I was four, and I said "Yes". I allowed him to put me to death, then resurrect me with resuscitation equipment and spiritual means. He then said "Now we are tied by death and life." I literally trusted him with my life. The main thing is that out of my great love (for this individual who manipulated me) I willingly agreed to the death and resuscitation. This is foundational for programming, because the individual must agree before it can be truly successful.

Green House (MI6)

At age 3 ½, I was taken to Green House (named after Col. Green of MI6) for the first time, with my classmates, for training. Green House is rented out to various groups for training at times, with the purpose of my undergoing the Green House training to be an agent. At this time, my delta computer system programming was also layered upon the base programs set up in the womb and during infancy, using the sophisticated computerized technology there. I was literally hooked up to a computer, and for days, taught to simulate everything it did internally. My delta parts learned to talk with a computerized flat affect, and to perform internal system checks, to store information in various security layers, etc. I also improved my skills with a gun, a knife and other abilities.

Introduction to the Vatican School

At age six, I was already a competent trainer (programmer), with the ability to program others with basic programs. I knew human anatomy inside out, was skilled at torturing others in numerous ways, was learning various rituals, and had already performed several assassination missions (the first one completed at age 4; I was deadly as a child, which the order counted on, since no one would suspect a child that young). I had been hosted in several countries around the world for three years now and was building up my covers in those countries. I was now ready to enter the Vatican school.

Hi Svali
when you wrote, “where the pool in the garden was filled with the partially submerged bodies of children and adults who I “remembered”, some were doubles of myself and my classmates, as well as fathers I loved”, did you mean that the bodies of the children were literal clones of you and your classmates?

That is a great question. I meant that some were genetic doubles; others were individuals surgically altered to look like them.

Hi Svali, How would they do those “doubles” of yourself ? is it similar to clones ? Do they make a lot ? Can they make as much as they want ? Thank you for this blog and everything you put in it because I can assure you that yes ! you are helping a LOT of people. Those are precious informations that definitely help for healing process and for other things as well. Bless you !

Growing Up International Part Two: The First Three Years

Note: this article contains graphic descriptions of trauma and programming setups under Mengele

At the moment I was born, and took my first breath, my birth mother was killed by being pulled apart as I came out of the birth canal. This trauma was designed to create a guilt that the programmers would build upon the rest of my life: the belief that by living, I "killed" my birth mother. The guilt would be used to drive me to perform ceaselessly over the years in an unconscious attempt to justify being alive.

A ritual was done immediately, in which one of the people I had bonded with in the womb (my primary trainer – a father I loved) began to suffocate me, asking me if I would accept a demon present behind him; if I did, he would let me live. I agreed, and was allowed to breathe.

I was given to a woman to nurse, one of several nannies at the cult facility I was raised in who would nurse me, rock me, and sing me songs about the group I was in, the heroes in the group who performed great deeds, and songs of praise to Satan.

My genetic mother and father were also present, and participated in a ritual that dedicated me to Satan.

Afterwards, I was taken to the newborn nursery where other infants in my group (we were raised in groups of 12) were in their cribs. Each infant in a group was born within a day or two of each other. My birth date was January 5, an important date to the group I was born to: Epiphany. I was considered one of the "gifts of the magi" to the group, and many other infants were born on this date as well.

Spiritual Programming

From my first breath, the programming was non-stop for the first three years. The programming involved numerous setups in which trainers dressed as various "deities" ("celestial beings") appeared by my crib, clothed in white or silver robes, and glowing with a soft light, voices taught me to love them – and to identify with them.

Others trainers dressed as "demons" and showed the splits created just before their appearance how to act and sound like a demon, with guttural growls, snarls, etc. These splits learned as toddlers to enjoy eating raw flesh, the only food they were allowed.

The highest (core) systems were bonded to trainers who dressed as ascended beings. Their eyes were covered with crystals to prevent me as an infant from seeing human eyes, since these parts were taught to hate and fear mortals through setups that involved "humans" or "mortals" raping and torturing them, until the "ascended beings" rescued and comforted them. I bonded completely to these creatures that appeared in various forms: a young form (appearing like a small dinosaur), a huge form (resembling Jabba the Hut or a similar grotesque appearance) and a beautiful form, looking much like a beautiful human but with unhuman eyes.

My love for these creatures would be tested time and again over the years. These parts felt that only these "celestial" creatures could love them, and they all held one feeling in common: they utterly despised mortals and the human race, who had tortured them in the womb, and were committed to the destruction of the human race (my fetal rage was held by them).

Celestial Paradise and "Hell" programming

As a baby, I was placed in a special baby carrier designed as a chariot in the programming labs. This chariot slowly rose upwards on a clear cable to an upper level of the lab staged to look like celestial paradise. In this "paradise" beings dressed in silvery white robes greeted me, held me, comforted me and gave me sweet drinks and cake. Harp music played, and a celestial "choir" sang songs of the joy of ascending. I realize that this sounds more like a Hollywood studio than a programming lab, but a young infant is very susceptible to believing these setups, since they have limited life experience to balance it against. As an infant, I truly believed I was "ascending to the heavenly realms" and loved the experience – and the beings who lovingly greeted me there.

As an infant, I was also taken at other times to "hell", which was a programming studio at a lower level. Trainers dressed as Abbadon and Apollyon came to my crib, grabbed me, and told the young infant me that I was going to be "punished for my sins" of "disobedience." It was a terrifying experience as they took me down a long, dark tunnel to a place lit with flames, with demonic creatures (young trainees in costume) dancing around poles where victims were tied and being tortured. As I descended into this place of horror and fear, I heard the "demons" discussing how young and tender I looked, as they drew nearer and tried to cut some flesh off with a knife, or spear me with a fork. I screamed in terror, and then "Satan" appeared and "rescued" me in this setup (in others, various people, such as the trainers I was bonded to, or a messiah figure were the ones who rescued). "Satan" scooped me up and took me away, telling me that as long as I obeyed him, I would be safe and he would protect me.

By the time I was three years old, I was utterly and completely committed to the belief that those who obey "ascend" and those who disobey cult directives and orders "descend." The proselytizing that began in the womb, and reinforced heavily, had taken hold. I had internalized the creatures ranging from angels, to demons, to celestial beings, to dragons, and others inside, and had created an internal "heaven" and "hell" to hold them in. Punishment for questioning the group's orders included the inside parts being dragged into the internal hell by internal representations of Abbadon and Apollyon, and rewards for instant obedience and good performance (such as killing on command, doing sacrifices well, etc.) included being allowed to visit "paradise" and communicate with the beings there.

I was considered successfully spiritually programmed by the trainers who installed these setups and beliefs. It would not be until years later, when I became a Christian, that I learned to my great surprise that the Bible never mentions a hell populated by "demons" who are overseen by "Satan" with the power to "torture" individuals; instead, the concept of Sheol is quite different, and the gehenna of final judgment is very different from the cult setups I experienced.

Early Loyalty and Anti-Christian Programming

Loyalty was considered one of the greatest imperatives of the Order, and extensive time and thought was put into the programming for loyalty. Men and women dressed in shabby clothes would come into the nurseries where the babies were, shouting "we are traitors and are here to get you." They would hit, rape and abuse us; all the babies would be screaming, until one of the Fathers would come in and "rescue" us from these terrible "traitors". Numerous setups of this type were done, until the mere mention of the word 'traitor' would make our infant hackles rise.

A man dressed as "Jesus" would also walk into the infant nursery at times, abusing the infants and causing intense dislike and pain. Again, the infants were "rescued" by one of the Fathers, who "chased" him away.

Presentation and Amnesia Programming

Because the Jesuits are international, they create presentations to be hosted in various presentations in the infants. Nine presentations were created for the infants in the group I was in: a presentation for America, another for the UK, another for France, another for Germany, one for Italy, one for Japan (where the Jesuits have a large interest and alliances with the clans that operate there), one for Russia, one for Amsterdam and one for Israel. The latter was considered one of the most important, since the Jesuits do extensive intelligence operations against the Mossad and Israel, and have numerous agents placed there.

The programming labs had rooms set up, where members of the future host families would meet with and interact with me. I met my parents and siblings from each of the families I would have in these various nations, and they took family photos with me, talked with me in the host country language, and worked on my amnesia cues (to prevent bleedthrough, or having memories or speaking in the "wrong" language). I grew close to the other siblings and my new parents, and was warned in the various presentations to never remember the cult facility, and for presentations to never remember living in another country, on pain of the death of the host family. Sacrifices were done several times during the first three years, and agreements made to keep the amnesia intact between presentations intact.

In one country (France), to my joy I was to be hosted with my identical twin, E. We both loved our times together during the presentation programming, where we were taught how to be part of a "normal" family and interact normally, to create our covers within these countries and cover the fact that we were actually raised in a cult facility.

The closest friends and family members in each of the host countries were, of course, cult members, since for the first three years, I spent almost all of my time in a cult facility and would not be actually spending time in the host countries until I was three years old.

Just before I went to host in the countries, each time, an important event occurred. I would be asked to “remember” living in the cult facility, would say something about it to the host parents. That night, a baby sibling (considered expendable, but allowed to bond with me over the past several months) would be killed in front of me because I “remembered”. This trauma was used to seal the amnesia between presentations. The cult host (the real “host” in an international system) also made agreements to never allow memories of the “real” (cult) life rise to awareness in the presentations. The Fathers would have me go into a room where a Jesuit Father was present, along with the host family, and later ask me if I remembered anything unusual. If I remembered the Father, who I loved greatly, the Father was brought into the room and tortured in front of me, to my screams and distress, because I had “remembered” the cult life. I was supposed to completely forget seeing a father when in my presentation, to completely “blank out” any memory of this other life.

In one setup, I would go into a room where cult objects were placed. My presentation was switched out. Later, I was asked what I had seen in the room. One time, at age two, I remembered and reported seeing a dead body and a chalice, and a Father in the room. The Father then came into the room, held a gun to my head, and said I would have to be killed, since my remembering would endanger the Order. I vowed to always forget. He said I must, or he would be forced to kill me, as sad as that would be. The next time the setup was done, I forgot, and lived. I did know children who actually were shot, because they kept remembering in spite of their trying hard to obey. The gun was not an idle threat; I had one brother shot this way, and never forgot this.

Pirate Programming

Babies love parties, and there was a special setup done in the programming labs with a pirate ship, jolly pirates, plenty of good soup and cake, songs and holding for the babies. This setup was done to create an internalization that would keep the internal baby parts inside and entertained, unless they were called out to be programmed.

Mengele and Senseless Deaths

Mengele (“Herr Josef” as I knew him) was head of the programming labs during this time. There was one lab in Italy, another in East Germany, and another in Switzerland at this time. He had students who walked around and mimicked him, assisting him. His main assistant was a young woman named “Hilde” with blond hair, blue eyes and an ice cold manner much of the time. Hilde was extremely efficient, and knew exactly what he wanted. Herr Josef was not one of the three Fathers I loved (bonded to primarily) but he was a primary trainer, and I bonded to him out of necessity and survival.

Mengele loved “survival of the fittest” setups, and would place two bottles in the middle of a roomful of infants. A bell would sound, and the infants would all crawl quickly to the bottles; those who got there first and could fight off the other babies “won” and got a bottle that day. The others were killed in front of the survivors, to teach what happened to “slow” or “expendable” babies.

Mengele did not value human life at all. He would kill 99 babies in order to find one baby he felt was “worth keeping” out of a batch. He was terribly manipulative as well. Babies in the nurseries were punished terribly for disobedience. If a baby held onto the bars of the crib, because the baby didn’t want to be taken out to be tortured (programmed), Mengele would chop the hand off in front of the other babies, as an “object lesson”. All babies would watch this scene with round wide eyes and horror, as the consequences of disobedience or hesitation were shown dramatically. Herr Josef would say “That was a BAD baby; you don’t want to be a BAD baby” and all the babies, including me, made the instant decision to never be the “bad baby”.

Only ten babies out of a thousand would survive the first six months in this kind of environment. Mengele and his programmers insisted on absolute, complete obedience even in infancy, including allowing sexual abuse (babies were taught to open their legs on cue and allow this sadistic cruelty without crying), as well as other forms of abuse. If a baby cried too long after a programming session, or failed to greet Mengele with a smile and outstretched arms even after a previous day of unthinkable pain, the baby would be placed in a sliding box that would be locked for a day, abandoned in the dark as punishment for disobedience or “bad behavior”. The baby would be taken out, frantic to be held, and told to never disobey again, or they would be kept in the box “forever”.

I was rewarded for performing well: I would be held by a nanny who rocked me and gave me a bottle, and who would then take me to a window to get a peek at the outside world and sunshine. Or the Fathers I loved would come and spend the precious 15 minutes a day that I cherished, telling me they loved me, holding me, and teaching me what they expected (including allowing sexual abuse).

By the time I was a toddler (15 months), I was put in a cage in a room with dozens of other children my age in another “survival game” that Mengele made up. A buzzer would sound, the cage doors would open, and we would all rush to get food and drink. We had to fight one another to get food. There was only enough for two or three. I remember that after a few days, the little girl in the cage next to me seemed sick; she wouldn’t get up or run any more when the buzzer rang. I felt sad for her, and when I ran and fought and got my food and water, I took some to her, and tried to get her to eat, but she wouldn’t eat or drink. I didn’t understand what was wrong with her, but to my dismay she got weaker each day until one day she fell asleep and didn’t wake up any more. I tried and tried to get her to wake up, but she wouldn’t. Other children were getting sicker and sicker, and only three of us were alive and healthy out of the sixty children. We watched the others slowly die, one by one, and wondered why Herr Josef thought this was a good thing, and praised the three of us so highly. I felt guilty and sad that I was alive and the others had died, and that I couldn’t wake the little girl in the cage next to me up.

In another setup, as a baby I learned to crawl through a maze. At intervals, there would be a bridge; another baby would be crawling from the opposite direction. I had to crawl across the bridge, and get to the other side, or get shocked; so did the other baby. The only way to get across was to push the other baby off the bridge. If I did so (and I always did), I was rewarded with a bottle and no more shocks; but I also had to watch the other baby be killed. I was said, but also knew that the price of my survival was the death of another; Mengele made that very clear in his infant programming.

Mengele had several top assistants who were younger (teens) that I began bonding to. By age 12, children in the Order are considered adults, and they by age 13 were full trainers. One would become my primary trainer during most of my childhood, and was a Father I loved; her name was Father Matthew and I wanted to be just like her when I grew up.

As soon as I could toddle around, I tried to follow her around any time I was allowed to. By age two, I was allowed to wear a little white coat like Fr. Matthew's, and tried to act and sound like her. I wanted to be a head trainer just like her, and she and the other Fathers said that one day I would, because I did very, very well and learned quickly. Most importantly, I had survived many of the brutal tests of strength and intelligence that Mengele put infants through during the first year of life; I was considered a "keeper" and to have potential by him and the other fathers.

Any infant that survived the facility during this time period was at the top of the charts for strength, intelligence and survival instinct. Those who would be chosen for leadership also had another quality that I had shown by trying to save the little girl next to me: the ability to look out for the interests of others, and the common good. All I knew is that life the first three years was a constant round of pain, testing and sadness with all too few moments of nurture and bonding.

Oh my goodness, how could they do this to the birth mother? And your Father comes as a survivor. This is exact how the patriarchy is built.

“By the time I was a toddler (15 months)” how you manage to remember that because an average adult’s memory doesn’t go that far in the past or her infancy.

Growing Up International: Part 1 (prenatal programming)

This article describes what it is like to grow up in a cult facility overseas. There are several internati

During the first three years of my life, I lived fulltime in a cult facility in a European country, before I ever met my host families in various countries. This facility was under the direction of a well-known programmer. This is how my life started:

I was conceived in a petri dish in the late 1950’s at a genetics laboratory in Switzerland. By the time of my birth, I was considered “generation 3”, or the third generation of genetic enhancements. The first two generations were prototypes for physical beauty. By G3, the gene for intelligence had been discovered, as well as for improved muscle strength and healing capability. Later generations improved upon these foundations as genes for even greater intelligence, theta skills and other abilities were developed.

On the third day of life, I was implanted in the woman who was my birth mother, but she was not my genetic mother (who was a ranking member of the group I was raised in; the well-known programmer was my genetic father). She, along with other birth mothers, were taken to a special facility in Europe where the prenatal programming would begin, since the experiments on pregnant women conducted by Mengele had proven that programming begun in the womb lasts longer and is more difficult to break than programming that occurs after birth, when the infant has the opportunity to interact with the outside world.

For the first two weeks, my birth mother was treated extremely well, praised, petted and told what a “special” baby she was carrying. Beaming programmers and their trainees brought her choice foods, and told her what a special person she was, to be part of carrying a baby that would be part of a “new breed” of individuals. This kindness was unfortunately the priming for the later setups and betrayals that would occur, with the purpose of creating rage against the human race in her unborn child.

After two weeks, the torture began. The birth mother was told to do something repugnant to her (e.g., lick up urine and feces off the floor, or a similar act), and as she hesitated, the punishment was quick and brutal: agonizing, squeezing pain to her limbs and partial suffocation, as she was told "You must always obey, immediately." A tone was also played with this injunction. The rationale for this treatment? A developing embryo and fetus automatically synchro waves with the mother, and their young spirit feels what the mother's spirit does. The extreme distress is imprinted on the unborn child as well as the mother.

At this point, a reader will wonder: but the baby doesn't have a conscious mind yet. Why do this before brainwaves and consciousness develop? The rationale the programmers use is that the unborn embryo's spirit is present, and the spirit will never forget these events, which lay the foundation for later programming.

How does the birth mother not abort her unborn child with these traumas? The programmers will administer specific drugs to prevent this occurrence, although contractions may begin in some cases.

I know these things happened, not only because of memories my parts have shared, but also because when I was older, and ran the facility, I and other trainers did these same things to birth mothers. The things we did to these women and their unborn children are among the things I most regret doing in my past.

As the weeks go on, the torture and programming sessions become more severe, along with the rewards (operant conditioning techniques). Both mother and child are subjected to electric shocks, the instillation of drugs that induce severe, agonizing pain (as part of the "seal of mortality" programming, during which the fetus is told that this pain is their "ascended" self feeling the pain that "mortals" feel; this is part of the installation of a fear of mortality in the "higher" or "ascended" parts within the system). The fetus is then told that the birth mother can be "saved" from the pain if the fetus is willing to "rescue" her by taking in a demon. If the fetus complies, the stimulus for pain is stopped, or an antagonist drug given to stop the effects of the pain-inducing drug, and an injection of a bliss-producing drug is given, while both mother and fetus are told that this is the "joy of ascension", etc.

The real goal is to teach the fetus to rescue the birth mother; this will be the foundation of later rescue programming that will chain them to the group (e.g. the need to rescue those they love from torture or death if their programming breaks).

The punishments for disobedience become more severe: the end of a finger is cut off from the fetus, who experiences agonizing pain (this small digit will grow back if done early enough in development, but the trauma remains in the subconscious throughout the lifetime), as a punishment for "disobedience". Digits are cut off of the birth mother as well, and she is raped and traumatized by a pretend "Jesus" to teach the fetus to hate Christianity and all it represents.

All the foundation templates for later programming, and the first splits, were created during the months before birth. This includes the installation of an inside "Satan" who believes they are completely "evil", the inside "god" (whose voice sounds like the outside main programmer), an inside "He who is to come" (antichrist; this has changed to "he who has come" in recent years), and top controllers and core guardians. These are created to protect the developing core from the reality of the complete helplessness and reality of a world where horrendous abuse – including rape with special instruments – occurs in the place that should be safe and protected for the developing child.

Fetuses like warmth, dark and security; but bright lights are shone into the womb as punishments. A voice accompanied by a bright light is placed outside the womb, and the voice proclaims that they are "god" and that in order for the birth mother and fetus to survive, this voice must always be obeyed.

By the end of the seventh month, the birth mother's limbs have all been traumatically amputated, and she is forced to eat out of a dish like a dog. Soon after this, the ultimate abandonment occurs: the birth mother loses her mind completely, and the link to the one the fetus loves most is gone. The fetus is in complete despair, and the she hears a voice, kind, loving and reassuring her that while her "mother" abandoned her, this person loves her and will always be "there" for her.

I was that fetus, and I reached out to that voice as if it was a life raft. This was my primary trainer, aware of Mengele's teachings, and the one I loved most as a child; I bonded completely to him at that moment, because my life depended on it (fetuses that do not accept or receive this bonding will die in the womb in a short period of time; this is another of the terrible experiments that Mengele did on pregnant women and fetuses that the public has no knowledge of).

This voice told me they loved me, and were waiting eagerly to see me when I was born. This gave me a reason to continue living, in the midst of a world filled with pain, despair and darkness.

This was life before birth in a programming facility in Europe. Soon, I would be born, and the abuse ("training" was the name given to it) would continue.

These methods are still employed today, in training facilities around the world. The goal is to create a programmed individual during their most vulnerable time: before birth. The deepest delusions of "god", "powerful demons", supernatural creatures, ascended beings, celestial paradise, torturous hell are best installed during a time when an individual has had no interaction with the outside world to dilute the delusions with real-life experiences. These delusions have no resemblance to the truth found in the Christian Bible, and are installed as part of the core belief system for individuals born to international occultic groups that follow these precepts.

Healing is a process

Was I Illuminati or Jesuit? Healing is a Process

Since I started my blog, I have received several emails asking why there appear to be several differences between the personal history related in my newer articles, and the ones I wrote several years ago (available at this site). This post will explain why.

Healing dissociation is a process. Often, memories come in 'layers' or 'stages', filling in previously missing gaps in the story, or shedding new light on an old story. In a way, it is like the process of completing a jigsaw puzzle: small portions of the puzzle are filled in initially, but the ability to view the "whole picture" only occurs as more pieces come together. It is a natural part of the process of healing from dissociation and mind control, to progressively learn more about one's history and self, as one's faith grows and different parts (including the host) increasingly experiences the blessings of internal cooperation and healing. In this post, I will describe two major 'stages' of discovering my life history: knowing that I was working for the Illuminati, and knowing that I was in the Jesuit order.

One of the most outstanding differences between my first set of svali posts (written roughly twenty years ago) and my posts from the last two years is this: I had written back then that I was a member of the Illuminati; in many of my more recent posts (2017-2019), I write that I was a member of the Jesuit order, and have described in no less detail various aspects of a childhood and adulthood in the order.

Both sets of posts describe my life history. They are not mutually exclusive experiences. I worked in the Illuminati in the US, and was also a part of the Jesuit order. When I first began my healing, my first layer of cult-related memories was of being an Illuminati programmer in the United States. I was in my American system of parts, and was mainly learning about the traumas and cult activities that I had been involved in within the US. The process of addressing the dissociation and healing from the memories that were coming was very difficult. Having to decide what to do and how to move forward with God as I realized that I was not just 'making it all up' was very difficult. As difficult as it already was, I assumed (wrongly) without exploring further that the Illuminati memories already represented all of my cult-related life history. My posts years ago reflect this perspective.

While I did not realize at that point that significant portions of my personal history were still dissociated, I was aware that I had not fully healed yet. I had several responsibilities during that time (including raising my children after I received custody and working 2-3 jobs to make ends meet). During this time, I stopped writing my svali posts online for a period of time. Finally, in 2006, I had the opportunity to spend two years fulltime on healing (I went completely offline at this time).

During this two years, I journaled intensely, often up to 8 hours a day. This was when more of my life history came forward, as parts deeper within began to share. I discovered that the work for the Illuminati in America was only part of my life, and I actually was part of the Jesuit order. I learned that I had not only been a programmer for the Illuminati, but had been one for the Jesuit order. I also discovered the cult had constructed identities and life histories, 'presentations', for other parts of me in other nations, with other names and families. I learned that my very name, family and life in America was also a 'constructed identity' by the cult and that I had been assigned to work with the Illuminati in the US for the Jesuits since I was a child. My American mother was one of my main trainers in America, I first met her as a very young child at the Jesuit training facility in Rome (She was not my only trainer, I had several others). She, along with Dr. Timothy Brogan and others, had helped program my American system of parts to only remember life in America and to completely believe that she, my stepfather and my sister were my only family.

This new set of memories overseas was no less heartbreaking and shocking for me to uncover. Again, my sense of who I was and my history as I had understood it, was shaken. On many days, it felt like I had to process my life story all over. A couple of supportive friends who were crucial to my healing during that time, and what I had learned during the earlier phase of healing about God's faithfulness, comfort, ability to bring truth, dealing with denial and so on truly helped me through this extremely painful phases of my journey. The fact that before 2006 – 2008 I did not remember this portion of my history does not invalidate what I wrote in my earlier articles; I just didn't have this part of the story yet when I wrote them. Healing is a process, and memories may be held by several layers of parts. It does not invalidate the memories of one part, if they are unaware of the history of the others. The fuller picture unfolds as the person progresses in healing.

It has not been easy learning why I had not remembered my Jesuit memories earlier in my healing journey: I had deep attachments with the fathers who had raised (and programmed) me. While much of what I had with the fathers were in fact 'trauma-bonds' (they had traumatized then rescued me to create dependence), there was also love and affection – they had been my world, and I lived to please them since early childhood. As a very young child, I had promised them that I would never betray them. 'Not betraying' and remaining loyal to them meant that I could never remember the Order if I tried to heal, and that I would never address my deeper programming and break the mind control that they had installed. It had been 'easier' for me to address my Illuminati memories as I did not have the same depth of investment in protecting them or being loyal to them as I did the Jesuits. As a child and adult serving the Jesuits, my life in the Illuminati in the US was one of my 'jobs'/'assignments', but the Jesuits were who I then felt were my 'real' family and home.

I started to know and process these memories as God helped me to realize to a deeper level that healing and rejecting the group's programming to not remember was not a betrayal (that was a deception introduced when I was very young in order to control me), and that it did not mean that I did not care. Wanting my mind to be free did not mean that I was hurting the fathers. I started to learn more about my Jesuit history after growth in several areas of my life: knowing that God cared about people in the Order and wanted them to know the truth too; knowing that God loved me enough to hold me through the grief and anguish that would come as discovered my Jesuit memories; knowing that God could protect my heart, mind and body as I addressed the deeper programming and parts related to this aspect of my life history; knowing that God could help me to know truth and cut through all the confusion and pain. Basically, increased faith and understanding of God's love and power enabled me to start remembering and processing my Jesuit memories; earlier in the journey, I did not have the capacity to do so. This stage of my healing came too as my system of parts grew utterly tired of being mind controlled to keep secrets, being only partially healed and vulnerable to the cult, and decided to 'risk' trusting God to heal.

My memories of having been programmed in a facility overseas, and being part of the Jesuit order with large parts of my life being in Vatican, have been consistent since 2007. I have been blessed with direct validation for some of my memories as well. I have also noted that my statistics for site visitors have often shown more visitors from Italy to my site, than any other country. There are several possible reasons for this: what I write may resonate with Italian survivors; there could be a deep desire to learn about dissociation and deprogramming within this country; or other reasons. I pray that my posts bless those who read them, including those in Italy.

I do hope that explaining the healing journey will be helpful in promoting understanding of the process a bit more.

Hi. So I'm not so crazy when i say i was trafficked thru the vatican. That i was programmed and oh my goodness who has our files? I wanna know the truth.

I watched a kay tolman video and she prayed to break the Jesuit oath. 6 little nazi soldier alters popped up in me in the system and i was like woah. Anyway i knew Jesus then and he came in and they got in a tank with him and started breaking down the military structure of my delta asassin programmed alters. The next night God integrated those 6 little soldiers that i was in my sleep.
So some of your testimony here helps me understand why i said things about the Vatican and different system in different country programs.

Vatican Book Part 1

Six years ago, I wrote a book about the Vatican for therapists, and have only shared it privately until now, except for 1 excerpt in a blog post awhile back. Over the next few weeks and months, I will be posting the book here online. I believe that in this time, this information needs to be known in order to help others. This is the preface and first two parts. Please be aware that the information in this could be extremely triggering for survivors. It also contains Christian content.

The Vatican and the New World Order: Methods, Purpose and Overcoming Their Agenda

This book is an overview of the Vatican and its military/black ops arm, the Jesuits, and how they work, by a survivor of Jesuit training. It is meant to be helpful to therapists who work with dissociative individuals, since many of the methods used by the Jesuits are used by all of the international occultic societies in the world to some degree. Please take note that this is not a complete description of the programming or belief systems of the Jesuit order. It is an overview of several aspects of Jesuit programming and teachings.

My prayer is that as difficult as this material may be to read, that it will help educate those who help survivors break free of occultic abuse as to the nature of the programming that their clients may have undergone, and the spiritual underpinnings of this programming.

I. Who are the Jesuits?

The Jesuits, or the Society of Jesus, is the “black ops” and military arm of the Vatican. The Vatican is the wealthiest business entity on earth, and is wholly dedicated to bringing in the New World Order, and its coming leader, known in former years as “he who is to come,” and since 2000 as “he who has come” (the individual called the “antichrist” in the Bible).

This book is in no way a reflection upon most Catholics, who have no idea of what the top leadership of their church believes or practices in private. The public face the Vatican shows, and the private, hidden face that very few know about, are quite different.

Jesuit History

While today, the Jesuits attempt to publicly portray themselves as benevolent, their roots go back to the beginning of the Christian church. The first gnostics attempted to corrupt the teachings of the church in the first century, and taught the first theories of “ascenscionism” and “descensionism” (which the Jesuits still teach today).

By the third century, the Christian church had grown at what to the early Roman pagans seemed an alarming rate. The pagan leaders, advised by their oracles, came up with a plan to corrupt and destroy the church from the inside. Christianity was declared the “state religion,” the persecutions stopped, and the move began to mainstream it into the paganistic beliefs of the Roman Empire.

At the same time, a secret cabal of leaders within the early leadership arose. Their goals were to gain political and financial control of the church and to promote their doctrines, which included many of the early gnostic beliefs.

The ideas of penance, self-flagellation, and “salvation by works,” took root. As the centuries passed, the divide between early biblical Christianity, and the actual occultic practices of the leadership hierarchy grew greater. Indulgences (buying “forgiveness”), confession to a priest, and the angling for political power at the highest level of the Roman hierarchy became more pronounced.

By the early middle ages, powerful Italian families such as the Medicis and the Borgias began using methods such as poisoning and assassinations, and spying upon enemies, to consolidate their power and gain election to the papacy.

The term "Vatican spy" was born during this period. The monarchs of Europe were well aware that the Pope in Rome had agents in their courts who spied upon them and reported their activities to the Vatican – including whether the required tithe monies were being sent to Rome. These Vatican spies and agents became consolidated under the military power of the Roman Catholic Church: the Jesuit Society. This Society was responsible for the establishment of the opium trade between China and Europe, among other less than savory acts.

During the late middle ages, the Jesuits began sending "tutors" to instruct the monarchs of Europe in Latin, mathematics and higher learning. They were considered the finest instructors in the world, and this gave them access to the children of the monarchy and wealthy during the 1500s and 1600s, where they could accomplish their real agenda: putting these royal children under their sway through secret occultic training. This is one reason why all the royal families of Europe became heavily involved in the occult and in serving the Vatican through membership in at least one of the twelve secret societies, such as the Illuminati and the Knights Templar.

The Jesuit Society is extremely hierarchical, and military. They are headed by a man known as the "Black Pope," or Superior General, and this man is the REAL leader of the Vatican. He is feared by all within its corriders, and is at the center of a web of intrigue, vice and power that is difficult for many to comprehend.

Directly beneath him are three generals, known as the "First General," "Second General" and "Third General." These are part of a council of twelve top generals in the order. They are quite proud of the fact that they are the actual physical generals of satan's army on earth, and each commands thousands of troops throughout the world ready to do battle for the one they honor: satan himself, and his seed. These generals believe they have been directly commissioned by satan himself.

II. What does the Jesuit Order Believe?

The Jesuits are occultists of the highest level (mages). Each member has been dedicated to satan from birth, and trained in occultism from infancy on. The Jesuit monasteries are used as training grounds for the young Jesuits, who are brought in at birth. Those who survive the rigors of the first months of infancy (when "weeding out" is done, and only one in ten infants survives) undergo extensive training in all the occultic arts, and in all of the intrigues and deceptive practices that the Jesuit Order is infamous for.

The Jesuits believe the oldest lie man has believed since the Garden of Eden: they believe in the ability of man to ascend and to achieve "god" status through acts of devotion and service to "gods", specifically, what they call the gods of the Pantheon that rules over Gaia (earth dimension). Failure to obey the Directives of the Order, or disobedience to this pantheon, results in descending into hell in their belief system. They believe that ascending is the act of overcoming the flesh and any human feelings and emotions; it is the act of moving to a higher spiritual plane where feelings and needs are left behind.

This is often accomplished through the act of physical dying and resuscitation (this will be discussed more later). The process of undergoing repeated deaths during their training as mages is supposed to help a Jesuit overcome the fear of death, and promote the ability to travel through the dimensions.

The Jesuits believe in numerous dimensions (13), just as most deep occultists do. These dimensions reflect the spiritual travels outlined in Greek mythology, which are actually records of spiritual travels, such as the Iliad. The beings who inhabit these dimensions are considered "enlightened" and the goal of dimensional travel is to achieve enlightenment, to shed mortality, and to ascend. These travels are quite painful and dangerous, and the Jesuits celebrate those who are able to travel to the highest levels and become an "ascended master."

AntiChristian, Anti-Semitic

An important aspect of the Jesuit belief system is their utter hatred of Christianity and the Jewish race. Their beliefs are in direct opposition to the commands of God as outlined in the Bible, and they directly teach their followers from infancy on to hate and fear the Christian God, Jesus, and Scripture, and to hate the Jewish race. Their hatred is so great, that the Vatican helped fund the nazi cause behind the scenes, and actively supported Hitler during the Second World War, until public opinion caused them to do so secretly. They funded Mengele's experiments in the concentration camps (this will be discussed in more detail later in this book) and created the "Vatican ratline" that helped Mengele and other infamous nazi war criminals to escape to Argentiina and other countries.

Satan's Throne

The Vatican was built over the original spiritual center for early Rome, a cave that was inhabited by the beings "Roma" and "Vatus" who gave it its name (these were later changed to Romulus and Remus). While there are several public levels to the Vatican, there are also several levels beneath the ground that the public is completely unaware of, where spiritual ceremonies are conducted. These ceremonies revolve around the worship of the four entities that the Fathers venerate:

Althea (the "tree of life" which also gave the name "Aborae de Vitae" to the primary Jesuit training monastery north of Rome), and who also represents "The Spirit";
The Beast, whose room and alter are five levels below ground, hewn out of stone and where sacrifices occur both on the alter and in the cave-like room beneath the alter;
Satan: Satan's Throne is a magnificent room that sits at the lowest level.
"He who has come" (Satan's physical Son)

Satan's Throne

The stories at the Vatican say that it took over forty years of work by several crews of workmen to hew out Satan's throne, which is a large room, and to polish the bare rock into a room of great beauty. Trompe d'leoil paintings of windows adorn the walls, lit by recessed lights; and the smooth, marble-like floor is covered with designs painted in gold and black ebony. The long hall has a long red carpet that leads up to a raised dais, and on this dais is a huge throne, one that would require a giant to fill: Satan's throne. After it was built, the work crews were all killed, to prevent their leaking the secret of what lies beneath the upper levels of the Vatican.

Satan's Throne is the spiritual center of the Vatican, the "heart" of its activities.

On specified days, a long red carpet is strewn with ground shards of glass, or nails, and when the doors are opened, the hall is lined with Jesuit Fathers on both sides, who consider it an honor to be present. Petitioners then arrive, and must crawl on their hands and knees over the glass in order to kneel at the throne. Inhabiting it is a huge shadowy being whose ring the petitioner kisses, then arises when told and asked their request.

If their request is considered favorable, it is granted, but always at a huge price. The death of an enemy may be given, but the petitioner must first offer a huge sacrifice, and undergo enormous pain. Information regarding future events; or the secret machinations or plots of others may be provided, but there is always a price.

At times, those coming to the throne come there for judgment. They have been found to be traitors to the Fathers or the coming order, or to have wandered from “the path of obedience” because Satan is the worst legalist on earth, and punishes heavily any who even think disloyal or disobedient thoughts towards him and his cause. The judgments may vary from an extremely painful and expensive penance, to actual death, which is executed within the throne room.

Sacrifices within the throne room are frequent, bloody and dramatic. This is an integral part of the Jesuit worship system, because at its heart, the Roman establishment is occultic.

Satan’s Son

For years the Jesuits called the expected leader “he who is to come,” “the anointed one,” and considered him the bringer of the New Order they have longed for over the centuries. The Jesuits specifically had an antichrist breeding program, in which they took young women who were mated to satan himself in order to carry his child. The fetuses were spontaneously aborted in most cases; or else killed the mother prior to birth.

In 2000, an infant was born, and the word was out: “he who is to come” had arrived, and is being carefully raised and tutored by the Jesuit Fathers at the Vatican.

While he is still a child, he is extremely physically beautiful, and filled with evil. At this time, he sits on satan’s throne, and makes judgments, since he is his direct seed, or so the Jesuit Fathers believe. Because of their deception, the Jesuits completely discount the Christian God, or the fact that in His Word He states His complete knowledge of these activities and plots. Psalm 2 shows that the LORD knows all about the plots and machinations going on in Rome, and the worldwide influence they hold over world leaders. It is interesting to see that the LORD finds these plots laughable, because His power is so much greater. Unfortunately, this fact does not deter the ongoing planning and deception that occurs in the Vatican.

Helping the Survivor

A Jesuit is an individual who has been deeply steeped in the darkest levels of occultism since infancy; and they will have made direct vows to Satan and/or the antichrist to serve in their armies. In order to heal, these vows and covenants (made to the death) must be broken and the demonic entities within that represent them expelled.

Every Jesuit will have representation of the Tree of Life, The Beast, and Satan within their systems, and a large system dedicated to the New World Order. They will have been assigned a leadership role within the NWO, and may find it difficult to give this up, since this role gave meaning to their (extremely) painful childhood.

The core beliefs will be based upon Order Directives; the Jesuit survivor will believe that any transgression must be painfully punished, in order to prevent the systems from "descending into hell." These beliefs will need to be addressed again and again, since they run throughout every system, all the way to the unconscious and core level. Controllers in one system may decide to give up this belief, but at the next level in, it must be addressed again.

Until these beliefs are addressed at core level, the systems will attempt to continue contact (to prevent going to "hell"); or the survivor will be heavily punished within, and will suffer greatly. This and other topics will be addressed in more detail later in this book.

It can help to see that the Vatican, and its antichrist system, are already known to the LORD, who will overthrow it. In Revelations 17,:1-6, there is a perfect description of Rome:
Then one of the seven angels who had the seven bowls came and talked with me, saying to me,["Come, I will show you the judgment of the great harlot who sits on many waters, 2 with whom the kings of the earth committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth were made drunk with the wine of her fornication."
3 So he carried me away in the Spirit into the wilderness. And I saw a woman sitting on a scarlet beast which was full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. 4 The woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet, and adorned with gold and precious stones and pearls, having in her hand a golden cup full of abominations and the filthiness of her fornication.[b] 5 And on her forehead a name was written:
MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT,
THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS
AND OF THE ABOMINATIONS
OF THE EARTH.
6 I saw the woman, drunk with the blood of the saints and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. And when I saw her, I marveled with great amazement.
The Meaning of the Woman and the Beast
7 But the angel said to me, "Why did you marvel? I will tell you the mystery of the woman and of the beast that carries her, which has the seven heads and the ten horns. 8 The beast that you saw was, and is not, and will ascend out of the bottomless pit and go to perdition. And those who dwell on the earth will marvel, whose names are not written in the Book of Life from the foundation of the world, when they see the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.[c]
9 "Here is the mind which has wisdom: The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sits..

III. How are the Jesuits financed?

The Jesuit Order is financed through the offices of the Vatican, the wealthiest organization on earth. Most people have no idea of the vast wealth that this epicenter of the Roman Catholic Church holds. The Vatican Library alone holds books that are priceless, many of which have never been publicly catalogued for security reasons (the Vatican has private, highly secure records of their assets such as these. The assets reported publicly are only a tiny fraction of this organization's true wealth which is greater than the finances of all the world's billionaires combined).

Beneath the Vatican Library are secret vaults with treasures such as priceless art confiscated during the crusades and the World Wars (the Vatican shared the treasures confiscated from wealthy Jewish families with the Nazis, for instance). There are vaults dedicated to holding jewel-encrusted icons, gems, and priceless artifacts from the beginning of time, because the Vatican has a huge collector of ancient statuary and jewelry. Cups, jewels and golden idols from Mesopotamia and Babylon share space with treasures from the reigns of the Pharoahs (many of the earliest raids on the tombs of the pharaohs by Egyptians years before archeologists began exploration caused the empty tombs that were often found; these artifacts were often sold to wealthy Vatican representatives over the years who were highly interested in collecting them for spiritual as well as investment purposes).

Wealth and treasures from every great civilization are stored in these secret, highly secure vaults that only the privileged few are allowed to know even exist, much less to enter. The physical wealth these represent could buy the world's greatest corporations several times over, but this is not where the day-to-day income comes into the Vatican. Instead, there are other, darker sources.

Sex Trafficking

The Jesuits oversee the worldwide center for infant and child sex trafficking, which is located in South Amsterdam in the Netherlands. South Amsterdam, known as "sin city" to pedophiles and decadents in Europe, is where the largest brokers in the sex industry live. These brokers regularly send out agents throughout the world, targeting China (where female infants are often given to them free), Asia, Malaysia, the Ukraine, and Euro-Russia.

Follow •••

A common misconception is that sex slaves are mostly female. In Amsterdam, both male and female infants and children are equally bought and sold, since pedophiles unfortunately seek both. The agents bring in literal truckloads of infants they have gathered by going to poor families or orphanages. These nicely dressed, wealthy, friendly westerners promise placement in good homes and a better life through adoption for the infants, and will often give good donations to the orphanages that provide “pretty children” and infants on a regular basis.

The trucks of infants and young children cross national lines through routes that have been bought, with guards sympathetic (and well-paid). The infants are cared for by women who give them drugged bottles to keep them quiet during the journey. These women are told to never disclose what they are doing, under pain of their entire families being killed.

Once in Amsterdam, the brokers come and inspect the infants and children. They then place bids on them (based upon the infamous “broker’s list” which lists the current black market value of these children as if they were commodities). The brokers are purchasing infants and children for the large, wealthy exclusive brothels, which are often franchises that they work for, and for the private auction houses, the largest of which is located in a suburb of Paris, France.

It is a common sight for those ‘in the know’ in South Amsterdam to see the sex trade brokers gathered at their favorite (and very private) coffeehouse in the morning, discussing the ups and downs of “the trade” and their evaluation of the latest ‘shipment.’

During these coffee discussions, they will also whisper about another pet peeve: the fees that must be paid “upstream” to the representatives of the person who oversees the entire sex industry in South Amsterdam: the Jesuit Father over Amsterdam. His offices are located in a palatial private mansion with walled gardens, where he also lives. This man is kept well-informed through his various agents of exactly how much money each broker has brought in during the week, and of how much they owe him (and the Vatican) for the privilege of operating in a city that looks the other way at its most infamous income source.

Failure to pay this “tithe” once can result in a warning; twice, in the death of the broker. Few are foolish enough to even think of trying to cheat the Father over Amsterdam of his dues. This man has agents throughout Amsterdam, in sources that the brokers would never suspect, who regularly check their books and report income, and any discrepancies.

The sex trade in Amsterdam brings in billions of dollars each year. This is because of the high price placed on infants and on children with “specialized training” in sexual skills. These children are often auctioned at the highly exclusive auction houses of Europe, where they are purchased by procurateurs who work for the wealthy families of Europe.

There are auction houses in Brussels, Belgium; Berlin, Germany; Amsterdam, Geneva, Moscow, and other locations. But the largest is located in Paris. Located in a large mansion, the evening begins with members of the wealthiest families in Europe and their consorts gathering for a gourmet dinner at 10 pm. At midnight, the auctions begin, starting with preteen children who often have specialized sexual skills. Twins are especially prized. As the night goes on, the children get younger and younger, until by 4 am the infants are auctioned. The procurateurs purchase these children for use by their wealthy clients during private parties (which the children rarely survive). The clients come to oversee these purchases, and also for amusement, since many enjoy watching the auction process.

Some infants are kept in Amsterdam, which is known for the availability of children of every age. Many people are aware that in Amsterdam, the prostitutes dress up and sit in the windows to advertise their availability. What is less publicly known is that in the early morning hours, some of these window displays used to include a woman holding an infant. To the unknowing, this is a touching display of maternal care. But the residents of South Amsterdam knew that this is actually a signal that this house offers infants and small children to its customers.

Assassinations

There is a huge, ongoing worldwide market for the use of agents with specialized training in quietly and anonymously killing targets, without leaving any trace evidence (or, with skill in leaving a false trail). Premiums are paid for those who can take out political figures, and especially targets with bodyguards and those who utilize high security measures.

By far the most sought-after assassins have MI6 (military intelligence level six) training. The Jesuits have each of their agents go through MI6 training and hire them out to other organizations or individuals for fees. The contracts are actually brokered through third parties, and the contractor has no idea that the agent they have hired works for the Vatican. This often serves Vatican purposes; the agent earns them top dollar, but they also gather important intelligence at the same time about the operations and goals of other organizations, governments or individuals when their agent returns home and discloses to them.

Since the 1300s, when the Borgia family regularly poisoned their enemies in order to gain political and spiritual power in Rome, the Vatican has also conducted its own assassinations. These are never traced back to Rome, unless they want a message sent to the survivors. Many times, the assassinations are not simply conducted physically; their agents are also skilled in theta, or spiritual, assassination techniques (this will be discussed further in the spiritual programming section of this book).

Intelligence

One of the most valuable commodities in the world is information, especially about an organization's competitors and enemies. Good intel about certain organizations or individuals can be extremely difficult to obtain, and those that can provide it can ask and be paid top dollar.

The Jesuits use their vast network of worldwide operatives with specialized training to obtain this information. The term "Vatican Spy" became infamous during the middle ages, when the monarchs of Europe became aware that there were secret agents unknown to them reporting their most hidden activities to Rome. This spy network has only grown since then, and the Vatican relies on the intelligence they provide for its own protection and planning, as well as to help further their goals. If they believe that intel will help their cause, they will arrange for it to come to the attention of the individual or organization they want it to – for a hefty fee, of course.

This intel will never appear to come from Rome. Roman agents never appear to work for Rome, but instead for other organizations or causes. The purchaser may believe that they are gathering intel from a valued Arabic contact, from an Israeli sympathizer, from a Russian mercenary, or a Templar Knight in Canada. They will not suspect the Jesuits, because their agents are always programmed to have several layers of unbreakable covers

Exposing the Vatican book: Part 4

Early Splitting

The first weeks of life for an infant born to the Jesuits are very busy and extremely painful. This is when the first splits are split again, and templates for systems are created and organized. Spiritual programming is also conducted in a more methodical method.

The first organization and traumas occur with “white room” and “black room” training. The infant undergoes traumas which include: being quickly lowered while the head is supported (to make the infant feel as if they are falling and initiate the startle reflex); peeling of skin with sharp knives from the sole of the feet, the backs of the legs, the backs of the arms, and the back (infants heal very quickly, with minimal scarring, since only the very top layer of skin is peeled off); digital rape; electroshock; near-drowning in a tub of water; partial suffocation; burning with fire on digits and the soles of the feet. These are called “prime traumas” and become the foundational physical traumas for the systems being created.

Along with the physical trauma is severe spiritual trauma. Rituals are conducted, and demons are attached to the splits being created, to cause the splits to remain apart (the brain will normally try to rapidly re-attach splits during infancy unless demonic barriers are put in place). The impartation is often done through the laying on of hands of the Father or programmer on the infant’s head and/or belly.

The initial, primary programming, occurs either in a white room, where the programmers, walls, clothing and lights are all white (this would occur for the presentation or cover programming), or in an all-black room where the only light comes from a black, or ultraviolet, light, if any. This is where theta (spiritual) programming and the programming of the true deeper (back) layers occurs.

One reason that the initial theta, or spiritual, programming occurs in an all-black room is not only for mental organization, but to also decrease the amount of interaction with the physical world via sight and the senses that will occur within these parts being created. Many of these parts are created literally in darkness, and have never seen daylight throughout their lives un occurs.

Follow •••

The primary core splits, and the master controllers are always created first. These will take on the roles and names of spiritual entities, since a Jesuit system is first and primarily spiritual, designed to serve satan, the antichrist, and the beast (father, son and spirit). All three will be represented in these first splits along with other deities.

The presentations are also created, and dedicated to deities with roles of amnesia; in fact, the presentation undergoes as much or more programming than any other parts in Jesuit systems, which tends to surprise survivors. who may have believed that these systems "didn't go through bad things." They have, and their traumas are among the worst, which is why presenter programming is often the last to heal in many systems.

These traumas fuel the deep amnesia that is always present in Jesuit systems: there are always huge barriers placed between the presentations ("hosts"), the cover programming, the Vatican programming, and the New World Order programming.

Buffers

In these sophisticated systems, buffers will be created between the front and back with one sole purpose: to hide the extent of the programming, by "buffering" the feelings between front and back, and maintaining emotional and memory distance between the two. The buffers will always be very void of feeling, and extremely traumatized, since they "hide the back" and help make the programming "undetectable" to the world, and the survivor.

Brain Wave Programming, Early Theta and Spiritual Training

The Jesuits utilize the fact that when a person's brain waves are in theta state, they are the most open to the spiritual realm. This is why much of their spiritual training is conducted when the individual is in theta state.

Early Brain Wave Programming

The infant is taught to stay in theta state by attaching electrodes to their head that pick up brain waves and show them on a monitor. When the infant personality that is being trained is in theta state, the infant is heavily praised. If the personality "bounces" out of theta state, as is normal, the infant is heavily shocked. Eventually, the personalities created learn to stay permanently in theta state (this same training method is also used for the personalities in other brain wave states, to teach them to stay in the desired brain wave state).
To the left above is a graph of brain wave states (the major ones except epsilon are shown). Gamma is the highest brain wave state, and will occur when a person is in a highly excited or nervous state. This is where loyalty programming and sabotage scripts will later be programmed in, since the high anxiety in this state will trigger calling the police, accuse the helper of kidnapping, or other self-sabotage, if someone tries to help the survivor.

Beta state is a normal alert state, and this is where military systems and those that need a normal alert state will be created. Alpha is more relaxed, and accessing systems and presentations will be created in this state. Delta is the deepest brain state, and will hold semi-unconscious and even unconscious beliefs; delta programming will be discussed in more detail later in this book.

Theta Training

Once they can stay in theta state, the early spiritual training begins. The thetas are kept in a blackened room, and the people who interact with them appear shadowy. Actors dressed as demons will come into the room, and “chain” the infant to them. The actors demonstrate to the infant how demons act, growling, snarling and torturing them in various ways. At the same time, the infant is told that THEY are the demon. This is how demonic punishers and controllers are created in the first weeks of life.

The Jesuits understand that an infant must be shown an external reality in order to internalize it. The infant must internalize in order to establish the programming that the Jesuits desire for later control.

The theta state parts in the infants are left in darkened cribs and are given objects such as decapitated heads to play with; or demonic toys such as fetishes. The infant’s fingers are placed around the neck of a kitten, and when they squeeze, as babies will, they are highly praised. The infant has no idea of what they are doing at this stage, but the foundation for later assassination training is being put in place.

Demons come into the room, and talk and play with the infant’s theta parts. This is their first bonding, with these creatures that appear horrific.

Gradually, the infant is taught to call on the demonic for theta capabilities. The Jesuit Father will throw a ball at the infant to hit it, and encourage the baby to spiritually throw the ball back at them (they are too young to have the physical coordination to do so, but can easily do this demonically). Throwing a ball demonically is demonstrated, and the baby is hit again and again, until in anger and frustration, they are able to loft the ball back at the person hitting them. This is heavily praised, since the infant is using spiritual power to accomplish what it cannot physically, and using its hurt and rage at being abused and turning it to hurt another back. This is the early foundation for later theta capabilities.

The infants are taken to rituals, where they watch sacrifices performed, their infant seats propped amidst the fires. They are also taken to re-enactments of “hell” where demons dance and torture victims, and the first subconscious images of hell and the need to punish even the slightest disobedience are ingrained. The infants undergo extensive torture from demons, to teach them in these first weeks of life to fear “descending” and “going to hell” above any other punishment.

White Room Programming

In the white room, the other controllers are being created as well. Men and women dressed as members of the Greek Pantheon (for the white/Illuminati or Beast-Loyal systems), the Roman Pantheon (for the Black, or Vatican/Satan-Loyal systems), and the Ancient Pantheon (for the grey, or New World Order/Antichrist-Loyal systems) visit the infant, introduce themselves, explain who they are, and create a spiritual tie to these parts. They literally take cords (white, black, and grey) and tie themselves physically to the infant for hours; they also force the infant to undergo rituals dedicating these parts to the demons. The infant also watches videos, virtual reality programs, and holograms in which these ‘gods and goddesses’ of the Pantheons talk to them, and explain that they also are a god or goddess.

This basic programming all takes place in the first three months of life, and is continued for years afterwards.

Mentors are also bonded to the young theta splits. These are individuals with strong theta skills in place as well (otherwise, they would be maimed by the infant who has not learned to “focus” or control their developing skills). These mentors will “rescue” the young theta splits from death during setups time and again, to teach them to trust the mentor with their life. This is important for later theta spiritual programming, where the young child will travel demonically through the dimensions and must follow their mentor, or risk death.

The mentoring relationship creates a deep “mother-daughter” or “father-daughter” bond at the deepest spiritual levels, and is the only semblance of a “mother” relationship that a young child is allowed to have in the Jesuit order. All other mother figures in their life are purposely extremely abandoning and emotionally unavailable, to force the child to trust their spiritual mentor (often viewed as a “cult mother”) as their true “mother bond.” Healing for the survivor will include grieving the extremely distorted attachment bonds that were allowed, as well as remembering the terrible abandonment by maternal figures during infancy.

The survivor may also have to work through the grieving that occurs when they remember that as an older teen or adult, they mentored spiritual (and/or) biological children of their own. These love bonds are real, and very deep, and are held unconsciously. These bonds are often manipulated in attempts to “draw” the person back to the group, since the survivor may be completely unaware of their emotional and spiritual attachment to a person they mentored, until the parts that bonded choose to bring this knowledge to conscious awareness.

book part 4

Trigger Warning: Please be aware that this information was meant to help therapists understand programming by a large occultic organization, and could be very triggering for survivors.

IV. Programming Methods

In this section, I will discuss some of the methodologies that the Jesuits use to train and program the members of their order. This information not only discloses how their work is done; it is also the "master template" that the 12 secret societies that serve the Vatican also use within their organizations (with modifications). These organizations include Illuminati, Knights Templar, Knights of Malta, Opus Dei, Magnificat, Trinity, Order of the Golden Dawn, Rosicrucians and others.

This is by no means comprehensive, and instead, is simply a short overview. Also, programming methods are always being updated, and new experimental programs developed, so that any book on programming will be outdated within weeks of its writing. But the principles remain the same over time, even if some of the methods change.

Mengele

Josef Mengele is considered "the father of modern programming" due to the information and methods that he developed during his infamous end-point experiments on infants, young children and adults inside the Nazi death camps. These experiments were funded in part by the Vatican, as well as other organizations, because they were highly interested in improving their methodologies.

Before Mengele, most serious programming was begun between birth to two years old (the age at which programming was initiated varied between groups), since behaviorists believed that the infant brain was too immature to hold much programming. Mengele proved with his well-kept records based upon unutterably cruel research done on infants that the most effective programming was done prenatally; that prenatal programming automatically enters into the subconscious and deeper brain, and that the most effective time to create the core personality splits is during the first five months of life after conception. He also proved that fetuses can see, understand and respond to programming cues and images at this time in life, and can be taught to organize the splits based upon these cues.

A fetus and an infant can much more easily internalize an external object than an older child, since the fetal brain has no external world to contradict what it is told; and the infant brain is at its peak ability to absorb and process information during the first days of life.

The information that Mengele obtained was combined with data from other behaviorists, including attachment theory, to create programming that is considered “unbreakable.” After the second world war, Mengele was often flown to Europe to program Jesuit infants. He worked for the Vatican, and left his personal stamp on many infants and young children programmed by them. He was also hired out at times (for an exorbitant fee) to other organizations, but his primary post-war work was continuing his research and programming Jesuit infants.

Mengele ran an infamous (within the occultic world) research center (“the institute”) where he employed the top trainers within the 12 societies, who continued his research under his (brutal) supervision on end point trauma (trauma that takes the subject to physical or psychological death) and other traumas, and the effect on the human psyche. The volumes and volumes of carefully documented research data from that time are still held within the Vatican vaults, and have been replicated and shared throughout the world. The research that he began is still ongoing, as the search for better, “unbreakable” methods of programming continues. One of the larger research centers for experimental programming is on the West Coast of the United States; the large research facility is underground, and is combined with sophisticated milab (military laboratory) research. Another is in East Berlin; and another is in Prague in Europe, and yet another one exists in Rome.

In the following sections, I have divided up the programming methodologies used by the Jesuits into age categories, since different ages are considered “prime times” for the installation of different programs. But all foundational spiritual and other programs are created during the first few months of life in fetuses unfortunate enough to be selected by the Jesuits.

A. Infant Programming

When a Jesuit infant is born, it has already undergone significant programming within the womb. Immediately after conception and implantation of the genetically altered embryo (more on genetic research will be discussed later). Soon after conception, the occultic oracles place their hands on the womb of the expectant mother, to determine whether or not the embryo should be allowed to live. If yes, the embryo is dedicated to a demonic entity, and continues to grow.

By four months of gestation, early brain waves (delta waves) begin to appear in the fetal brain, and with it, some degree of consciousness. At this time, a primary trauma will often be intentionally engineered, to create one of the first splits (others will have been created even earlier). Often, the mother and fetus will be injected in utero with an agent that causes extreme pain, but does not cause labor. The fetus experiences extreme terror, excruciating pain, and will hear the mother screaming “Get it out!” regarding the fetus that appears to be causing her the intense pain in her womb.

This is a primary rejection trauma, and the pain and rejection combined will cause a core personality split. This split is in a deep delta (unconscious) brain state, and the programming begins in earnest immediately afterwards. Headphones are placed on the womb, and for hours, the young fetal splits are exposed to recordings regarding their identity, their wants, their beliefs, and their role in the new world order. This programming occurs during the 16th week of gestation onwards, and the information in the recordings is recorded at the deepest unconscious levels before the infant is ever born.

Secondary, tertiary and other traumas will also occur within the womb, with spiritual ceremonies that dedicate these intra-utero splits to different demonic entities. Before the infant draws his or her first breath, they will have the foundational core splits, their beliefs and identities firmly in place.

These traumas can include the use of electromagnetic waves to cause extreme pain in the fetus; fetal surgery; breaking the arm of the fetus; electroshock, flatlining the mother (to punish the fetus, who is blamed for the mother's "death" and resultant spiritual pain/anxiety) and other traumas. The mother is carefully monitored with sophisticated, high-tech medical intervention to prevent abortion or premature labor, which is the body's natural response to these types of traumas.

The demonic is used to keep the splits in the fetus separate, since in nature, the splits would try to rejoin automatically. The demonic creates a deep feeling of terror and re-experiencing of the primary traumas should the prenatal psyche attempt to join together.

To enable the fetus to survive such traumas and become dissocative (rather than give up and die), immediately after primary rejection traumas and other traumas, the programmers will offer love and care to the fetus in order to create a deep bond with the programmer (s). This is done by speaking kindly to the fetus and birthmother, soothing them and meeting their needs, with phrases such as "I love you" etc. being used to create attachments. These deep bonds must be addressed for healing.

Birth Trauma

Upon birth, an infant that is to be used by the Jesuits undergoes a very specific trauma. As soon as the infant is born, a Jesuit Father takes the infant and begins to smother it to death. The infant is asked spiritually, "Do you want to live?" Behind the Father is satan, and the infant is aware within their spirit that if they answer, "Yes" that satan will enter them. This being is hideous and terrifying, and it takes a very strong will to live to respond affirmatively. If the infant responds "No" they are smothered to death. If yes, they are allowed to breathe, and with their first cries in the physical world, satan attaches to the core.

The birth mother will be killed at the point of birth, and the newborn will be shown the body (which has been split open from the birth canal upwards) and is told "this is your fault" to create extreme guilt in the infant, and this is an underlying foundation for later guilt-based programming.

Nannies

When infants are very young, there are caretakers that perform physical care for the infant. These "nannies" or surrogate mothers take care of several infants at a time. While caretaking, they give bottles, rock the infant, and sing songs to them. These songs always contain programming embedded within them; they are songs about various spiritual (demonic) entities and praise to them, or of the joy of the coming order, or other messages. The goal is for the infant to associate caretaking and the relief of physical distress or abandoment feelings with love and loyalty to the order and the beings described. This is a terrible manipulation of an infant's need to attach to a caregiver, since these early songs are also embedded within the subconscious of the infant.

Helping the survivor

Because the prenatal and birth traumas are so emotionally and spiritually devastating, they will often only come up fairly late in therapy if ever, after the survivor has received help for other later splits. These primary traumas cause intense feelings of grief, rejection and despair, and are often the prime traumas underlying suicide programming. The demonic terror that causes fear of coming together may affect all parts of the systems, causing a prime fear of remembering or coming together for all parts, at an unconscious level.

It takes an experienced therapist to help an individual through these types of trauma. The survivor will be understanding that their entire life, even in the womb, was planned and programmed out, and feel intense anger at the betrayal and manipulation it involves. They may direct this anger at God, wondering where He was when this happened; and they may wonder if any part of them was ever not "owned" by the group.

This is where scriptures regarding God's love for individuals both before and during their creation in the womb can help; as well as praying and asking the Lord to show the survivor what He thought of them at conception. This is needed truth, to counteract a lifetime of being told and believing lies such as that the survivor was always the "Jesuit's", since they will have no memories before the prime traumas.

Because the programming and messages are implanted at such a very deep, unconscious level, it can also help to use a digital recorder, and record very specific scriptures and truths to counteract the lies (i.e. "reprogramming" with truth). It may take a significant amount of time to bring truth to these core beliefs, and is one reason that controllers at higher levels in the system may seem so "resistant" to truth: they may have buried at the unconscious, fetal level, prime traumas and programming that counteract other truths brought in.

Some helpful scriptures can include:

Ps.139:13: "For you created my inmost being; you knit me together in my mother's womb."

This verse directly counteracts the lie that the cult "owned" the person from the beginning, and shows who truly gave them life and their individual characteristics, in spite of prenatal programming.

Psalm 51:6. "Yet you desired faithfulness even in the womb; you taught me wisdom in that secret place."

How does the Lord teach wisdom in the womb? Only He truly knows the answer. But He does minister even to the fetus in the womb, as is made clear in this verse. The programming messages are NOT the only things the fetus was aware of before birth.

Isaiah 44:2. “This is what the Lord says— he who made you, who formed you in the womb, and who will help you: Do not be afraid, Jacob, my servant, Jeshurun, whom I have chosen.”

How wonderful for the survivor to know that they were loving formed in the womb by the LORD, and that He chose them before birth, regardless of what the oracles said.

Isaiah 49:1. “Listen to me, you islands; hear this, you distant nations:Before I was born the Lord called me; from my mother’s womb he has spoken my name.”

Not only did the Lord call the survivor to know and serve Him from the womb, He even spoke their (real, not cult) name. He spoke the name of their future destiny, and no amount of programming can undo this.

Exposing the Vatican: Part 5

Survival of the Fittest

Mengele was a firm believer in the "survival of the fittest" and during the 1940s,1950s and 1960s infants trained by him and the Jesuits underwent terrible trials to determine which infants would live, and which would die. This helped them determine not only which were the strongest infants, but also which ones had the strongest will to live, a requirement for the terrible programming that Jesuit children undergo.

As soon as the infants can crawl (around 3 months of age in these highly intelligent infants), the first survival trial is conducted. Dozens of infants are placed in a room, with a barrier in front of them. In the center of a large room are three bottles of milk. The babies are hungry and thirsty, since they have not been fed for a day.

The barrier is raised, and the infants literally race by crawling to the center of the room. The strongest crawl over others and push the smaller or weaker ones aside. The first ones there get the bottles, and must keep it and drink it while other infants are trying to grab it away.

The three that "win" get to drink the bottle, and then watch the systematic slaughter of the infants that did not get a bottle, because the losers were deemed "inferior." This installs a terrible survival guilt at a very early age; the infant wants to eat, and to live, but is shown that their living means that others must die in this setup.

The message that only the strong are allowed to live is ingrained very deeply through this and similar experiments. After several trials, the Jesuits have created their first classes, or groups. Jesuit children are raised in classes of twelve at a time, and these infants will become closer than any physical brothers during their childhood, in part because of their ability to survive and trauma bond with one another.

This is one reason that the survivor will fear and despise weakness in themself and others. To them, weakness has always meant death.

Early Attachment Bonding and Utter Darkness

The basis of obedience within the Jesuits is formed upon two primary forms of programming: the avoidance of pain (the pain of "descending" and thus going to "hell"), or operant conditioning; and the formation of extremely deep attachments to primary figures. Their belief is that the combination of these two create "unbreakable" programming, and the truth is that very few Jesuits every truly do leave the order. The attachment bonding described here, in earliest infancy, makes it extremely difficult to do so.

When the infant is only a few weeks old, it is placed in a completely darkened room, with no noise or stimulus of any kind, and abandoned. This abandonment, which lasts for several days, is extremely traumatizing to the infant. At first, the infant cries in a normal manner (distress), which then turns to anger as the abandonment continues. Eventually, the infant becomes exhausted, sleeps for longer and longer intervals, and stops crying; instead, it whimpers as utter despair begins to hit.

The infant is psychologically unable to cope with impending death, as its body and psyche begins shutting down in the early stages of dying. The infant comes to the realization that no one will ever come and rescue them, and they will die in complete and terrible darkness.

In complete despair, the infant is dying, when a soft light enters the room. A Jesuit Father comes in, carrying a warm bottle; behind him is Theo (their name for the "benevolent" manifestation of satan). With kind words, the Father picks the infant up, soothes him/her and gives a life-sustaining bottle. The infant is insanely grateful for this deliverance from "utter darkness" (the deepest level of "Jesuit hell" for the worst deeds, such as treachery and betrayal of the order). As the baby takes the bottle and is comforted, they bond completely to the Father, and to the being (Theo) who is superimposed upon the Father. The Father begins programming that they "owe their life" to him, that he "rescued them from utter darkness" for a "special purpose", that the infant is to "live and not die." Trauma bonding at a deep level occurs, and the Father appears like a god to the infant, and in fact, will hold the "theo" (God) position inside.

This bond will be built upon and layered upon over and over as the years go on. The infant will NOT be allowed to truly attach to ANYONE ELSE for the rest of their life. All other caretakers and friends in the early years will either be killed or appear to be killed, or terribly betray the infant/toddler/child to teach them that there is only one who can be trusted: the Father the infant formed a primary bond to, and the spirit "Theo." This is the core level of Jesuit bonding, and is by far the most difficult programming to break.

The infant will later "see' the nannies that cared for him/her killed, or will even be asked to "kill" them or agree to their being killed, by the Father they bonded to, to prevent the Father being killed (in terrible setups where the infant must choose which lives and which "dies"). These setups also test the strength of the infant's loyalty bond, which must be deep and unbreakable for successful later programming to occur. From the first days of life, the Jesuits begin installing utter and complete loyalty to them, represented by the primary Father the infant bonded with; and later, by three others they will also be allowed to attach to.

The primary mentor will always be a Jesuit Father that the infant (who is kept very young in the system) loves above any other, as described in the cruel abandonment scenario. The Father-mentee relationship is the deepest of all, as the Jesuit Father mentors others and molds them into his image. He will hold a "theo" or god place within the system, and this bond will be the hardest to break, since it represents the deepest attachment of the core to a human being.

The purpose of this mentoring is to draw the infant into a relationship with "Theo" (satan's benevolent personification) from its first days on earth. The Father will bond the infant to himself, and in doing so, bond the infant to the spiritual theo as well.

Helping the Survivor

The survivor of Jesuit programming has extremely disorganized attachment due to the fact that they have attached to satan himself (Theo) as well as their primary Father (referred to as "Father Theo"). There is a no less reliable being in creation to attach to, yet this was the infant's only choice during early childhood if they were to survive. If given another option, the infant would have rejectedbonding to satan.

The early trauma is so severe, that it can take months or even years to grieve for the manipulation and "detach" from these primary figures. It takes intense prayer, and a deep desire by the survivor, to break free of this programming that pivots upon the Jesuit's demonic use of infant attachment. The only real answer is for the survivor to choose to renounce the bonds to satan and the primary Jesuit Father, and to bond with Yeshua. During the interval, they will also need to bond at least temporarily with a caring figure who can represent the love of God to their systems, since these infants have never experienced this.

The older parts, once they become Christians, can help "reparent" the infants, helping them to understand that the Christian God truly does love them, and can keep them safe. Realizing at a deep level that Yeshua paid the full price for sins on the cross, and that their systems will not "descend" into hell and utter darkness, and realizing that the internal representations are based upon setups and manipulation, can help break the hold of this early attachment.

The survivor will experience attachment pain at the core level when these early setups and betrayals are remembered. They may feel infant terror at the thought of utter darkness. It is important to bind the demonic, and to prevent it from enhancing these memories, or the fear. They will often feel suicidal as the core despair, and the memory of the pain and betrayals comes up.

The survivor will test the love and caring of those they bond with outside of the Jesuit Order again and again. This is because they feel a huge "push pull" inside, and swing between craving love and nurturing, and wanting to distance themselves from any loving attention, which feels terrifying. Healing of this type of early wound is a process, and cannot be rushed, or the survivor will attempt to cope alone – and fall prey to reaccessing – since these infantile needs are used to push recontact programming.

Helpful Scriptures

Ps. 27:10. "When my father and my mother forsake me,Then the LORD will take care of me." This can help with the deep core attachment pain, to understand that the Lord loves the survivor, even when it seems that no one else ever has. It can be extremely difficult for the survivor to come to the terrible realization that they had NO real father or mother; only manipulative, abusive Jesuit Fathers and programmers during infancy.
The comfort that can only come from knowing that the Lord truly loves the survivor, and cares for them, can help.

Ps.71:6. "By You I have been upheld from birth; You are He who took me out of my mother's womb. My praise shall be continually of You.: This verse counteracts again the lie that the Jesuit Father and satan "let them live" and instead shows the truth that the Lord is the one who gives life at birth.
The following scripture shows the spiritual condition that the motherless and fatherless Jesuit survivor find themselves in, and how the Lord responded to them. It answers how the Lord responds to this deep abandonment pain: It also shows why the survivor was able to survive the horrors of childhood and how it is possible for the survivor of this type of abuse to come to know the Lord:
Ezekial 14:4-16
4 As for your nativity, on the day you were born your navel cord was not cut, nor were you washed in water to cleanse you; you were not rubbed with salt nor wrapped in swaddling cloths. 5 No eye pitied you, to do any of these things for you, to have compassion on you; but you were thrown out into the open field, when you yourself were loathed on the day you were born.
6 "And when I passed by you and saw you struggling in your own blood, I said to you in your blood, 'Live!' Yes, I said to you in your blood, 'Live!' 7 I made you thrive like a plant in the field; and you grew, matured, and became very beautiful. Your breasts were formed, your hair grew, but you were naked and bare.
8 "When I passed by you again and looked upon you, indeed your time was the time of love; so I spread My wing over you and covered your nakedness. Yes, I swore an oath to you and entered into a covenant with you, and you became Mine," says the Lord GOD.
9 "Then I washed you in water; yes, I thoroughly washed off your blood, and I anointed you with oil. 10 I clothed you in embroidered cloth and gave you sandals of badger skin; I clothed you with fine linen and covered you with silk. 11 I adorned you with ornaments, put bracelets on your wrists, and a chain on your neck. 12 And I put a jewel in your nose, earrings in your ears, and a beautiful crown on your head. 13 Thus you were adorned with gold and silver, and your clothing was of fine linen, silk, and embroidered cloth. You ate pastry of fine flour, honey, and oil. You were exceedingly beautiful, and succeeded to royalty. 14 Your fame went out among the nations because of your beauty, for it was perfect through My splendor which I had bestowed on you," says the Lord GOD.
This wonderful verse also shows the destiny of the survivor called out from this fatherless and motherless upbringing and training: to be wholly the Lord's and to be clothed with His splendor, and become a testimony to His goodness.

B. Early System Organization

During infancy, the master and system controllers are created, along with the parts and roles within these systems. The Jesuits program three main levels into their systems: a white, or cover layer. This will appear to be Illuminati, Templar Knight, Opus Dei, or another occultic group, and is complete, even to the "core" for this level, which is a false core meant to mislead anyone who attempts to break into the system without authorization.

This cover layer is there for a reason. The Jesuits often have their agents highly placed within the occultic organizations they oversee, and they don't want the organizations to realize that the individual is not an actual member. The system is created to look completely like the system of someone raised and programmed by the organization. The agent is actually there to review and report on the activities of the group's leadership to the Vatican.

There is another reason for this cover programming. Jesuit agents often spend time in Israel and other countries doing intelligence work; if picked up by the Mossad (Israeli intelligence) or Spetz (Russian intelligence), and interrogated (tortured), the other organization will believe that the agent works for one of these groups, and have no idea that they actually work for the Vatican.

Jesuits who leave will always remember their white, or “cover” programming first and believe this is all there is inside. The other layers are much more loyal and difficult to uncover.

Beneath the white level is the black, or Vatican level of programming. This is where controllers and parts loyal to the Vatican, the Jesuits, and to Satan reside. High priests and priestesses that were involved in Vatican ceremonies will be part of the black theta system, just as high priests and priestesses loyal to the Illuminati (or other group)) and its deities will reside in the white theta system.

Beneath the white and black levels is the silver-grey, or new world order (antichrist) level. These systems have been created to serve the antichrist, and the NWO, are given specific roles, and are controllers for the two other levels. The grey level controllers and parts have always undergone extensive death and resuscitations, since this level is composed of “ascended masters” who have overcome their fear of death, and in fact, many of these parts live in a near-death, ecstatic and numb state of being. The Phoenix is the sign of an ascended master who has overcome death and risen again.

The infant is taught to organize their system along brain wave states, and to respond to cues. The earliest cues include golden whistles that play different notes worn by the Fathers, to summon specific parts; colors (the infant is taught to crawl to a green light when a gamma controller is out; to a blue light when a beta controller is out, a white light when an alpha controller is out, etc.).

Tones are also used extensively in early master programming. The top master controllers are each assigned a tone, to correspond with a brain wave state: the highest tone represents gamma, next highest, beta; next highest, alpha, then epsilon, then theta, and finally, the lowest, delta. Hearing the tone pulls the controllers for that system forward (the infant is taught with shocks and trauma combined with rewards to respond immediately).

Master controllers for a system are programmed to respond to the entire continuum, and internally, can “sing” the tones and hear back the response tones for their systems, for vary rapid and unconscious feedback loops and triggers. Jesuits always have perfect pitch because of this extensive use of tones and harmonics combined with the early songs used in programming, and have perfect auditory recall.

Exposing the Vatican: Part 6

trigger warning: explicit discussion of programming, traumas and negative spirituality

Q'Ballah Programming

Mengele always installed the Q'Ballah in those he worked with, and he installed it into Jesuit systems as well. Althea, or the "Tree of Life" is the basis, with the three cords (white, black, grey) roots demonically entwined and going back to the systems described above. There is a primary death trauma for each of the core controllers for each of these roots.

An important part of q'ballah (black Kabbalah) programming is the creation of demonic portals. These are installed at points known as the sephiroth in the body and above it (see illustration below).
There will be death rituals, and demonic entities attached to each of these points, which become a portal or opening for demonic travel and communication. Tiferet represents the core, sits above the umblicus, and is the portal for satan himself. This is the first, or prime trauma, and this ritual involves the newborn or fetal umblicus being burned with a hot needle as the infant is put to death, then resuscitated.

Each portal (sephiroth) is installed via death trauma, and will have a portal guardian who is an ascended master from the grey (celestial)system sitting above it, who is both human and demonic. The guardians will have been heavily programmed to misrepresent their true names, due to the need for cover programming described above. These guardians supposedly "protect" the body and systems from "intrusion" by beings in the dimensions; but in reality, they are open doors to the demonic and must be closed through spiritual warfare (giving up of the demons) and by these ascended guardians accepting Yeshua and giving up their former beliefs in demonic "protection."

Helping the Survivor

Follow •••

The survivor will often initially be terrified at the thought of closing these portals when this comes up in therapy. This is because of extensive programming to believe that closing the portals will result in “death”, “insanity” or cruel punishment by internal or external masters. They will literally believe that their safety and survival depends upon keeping these portals open, and will question how to survive closing them.

There may be parts instructed to take the other parts into the dimensions and punish parts that try to close their portals, or break this programming. The survivor may even re-experience the death traumas and agony involved in the original creation of the portals. Once the portals are closed, the survivor will be amazed at the relief, and the fact that they are indeed alive and sane. The therapist will need to help counteract the programming with truth, and develop enough trust with the survivor that they are willing to give up this method of demonic interaction.

Once the portals are closed, the survivor may experience significant warfare in retaliation for doing so. This is a time for prayer and spending time with the Lord, and calling on Yeshua for protection.

The Q’Ballah will have an extensive internal reality attached to it, including magic numbers in rooms, and the white, black or silver cords from it running throughout the systems, from top to bottom, including within the rooms that the various controllers stay in. These cords represent the core traumas associated with the creation of each part of the “three rope” cord: infant death traumas and the beliefs associated with these traumas.

There will be an extensive internal reality for the systems and their controllers, with rooms, temples and other representations of the programming that they underwent when a very young child.

More About Mengele

Mengele himself, as discussed before, worked with Jesuit infants during the 1950s and early 1960s. He also bonded these infants to himself in a manner similar to that described above for attachment bonding. His bonding was nearly always installed in the white, or cover level, for Jesuit systems. This was primarily because the Fathers wanted his programming (assassin training in infancy and early childhood) installed, but wanted to reserve the core bonding for themselves, in order to maintain their secrets even from Mengele, whom they did not fully trust. Mengele also installed his own proprietary codes into areas of the systems that he wanted to reserve loyalty to himself within.

The Jesuits also wanted their top trainers trained by Mengele. This is one reason why those with top potential worked with him in his research laboratory, and continued the research after his death.

C. Toddler Training

By the time an infant is a year old, they will have several hundred personalities in place, which have already undergone extensive foundational mind control. Spiritual controllers will have already undergone extremely painful ceremonies, such as hot needles inserted into the umbilicus; or having a long sharp needle pierced through their chest, and being gripped and raised up (“satan’s claw”).

The controllers for the white spiritual systems will be in place, since the infant will have internalized these through virtual reality, holograms, and dramatic enactments of the “deities” by actors. The white spiritual systems include:

- Egyptian deities
- Babylonian deities
- Ancient (pre-Babylonian) deities
- Druidic deities

These are headed up by the white, or Greek, Pantheon of twelve deities.
Each system will have specific traumas attached to it. For instance, Bel, the head of the Babylonian system, will undergo a ritual where he is pierced through with tiny golden needles throughout his body (Babylonian sun ritual). Astarte will have sexual rituals, and Ashtoth will have death rituals associated with him.

The black (Vatican) spiritual systems are also being organized and trained from 12 to 14 months after birth. These include the theta assassin systems headed by:

- Nemesis, who controls
- Phobos (theta fear and dream attacks);
- Thantos (theta death) and
- Chaos (theta insanity programming).

Extensive training is undergone, where the young child learns to control and read thoughts (Galileo training), and to attack others using the theta skills they are developing. The foundations of early Mage training are also begun (mages are the highest level in the occultic world).

The “goddess of Death” and other demonic spirits will have temples and altars dedicated to them, where regular internal sacrifices are conducted. These re-enactments represent the external realities the toddler experienced.

The toddler will be taught to enjoy the experience of killing within certain parts, either through sexual stimulation, or direct brain stimulation (of the euphoria center) following obedience.

Controller Programming

The Jesuits use extensive setups to teach the internal controllers to do their jobs during this second year of life. Typical ones involve tying several young children with ropes (normally, six) to the waist of the toddler. She is told to “mind the children” and make them obey her. The setup will consist of having candy, or beautiful objects such as glass balls, in the middle of a room. The toddler is told that the children tied to her must NOT touch the objects in the middle of the room, or they and she will be punished.

The problem is that it is very difficult for a very young child to control others. The six children tied to her waist will try to yank her around, and grab at the objects or treats. Finally, in spite of her best efforts, she will tire, and one of the children will reach the table and grab a treat.

The child is instantly killed by a Jesuit Father waiting in the wings. The two-year old must now make the other, now quite obedient, children obey her, while dragging around the body of the dead child, a reminder to this young controller of what happens when she fails in her job.

By the end of the setup, which can last for several days, all of the children tied to the now very traumatized controller will have died (the result of disobedience and her failure to “mind the children” who in hunger will reach out and try to grab food and water, which are forbidden). The extremely traumatized controller will be very committed to exacting complete obedience to those under her, to prevent their experiencing a similar fate.

All of the controllers inside (dozens) will undergo this and other training. This creates an extremely controlled system, with the internal controllers believing that even slight disobedience will result in death or shattering. This belief is based upon numerous experiential setups when the child was less then 3 years old, and it will take time to work through the terrible grief of being unable to “save” the children in the controller’s care, and the rage that this type of manipulation creates in the survivor once they realize the truth.

Master-Slave Programming (ages 2 to 5)

There is a program to training obedience when a Jesuit child is very young. In this program, they are conditioned to be slaves, and obey their Masters, the Jesuit Fathers (who are all ascended masters). They address them as “Master” and “My Lord” and their day consists of menial labor as the Fathers order.

Typical tasks might include scrubbing the stone floors of the monastery on hands and knees while the Fathers taunt the “slave”; they may even urinate on the floor the child has just spent hours cleaning, and tell the child to clean it up again.

The acolyte will learn to cook; clean; do yard work, and will obey orders without question or thought, when asked to do tasks. This is considered an important part of the early training in obedience.

The spiritual parts (thetas) are taught to respond spiritually to summons from the Fathers – instantly. Any hesitation is immediately and terribly punished (such as being hung inside a dark well). The Fathers also have golden whistles that they wear around their necks; each child is assigned a set of notes, and must respond physically and/or spiritually immediately when their notes are played.

The child is inside the walls of the monastery these first few years of life. By age 24 months, the child goes to classes, where they learn not only languages (the Fathers speak Latin and Italian in daily life, and are all fluent in numerous other languages), but also oral history and the black arts as part of their mage training.

Internally, the survivor will have “masters” (controllers) and “slaves”; slave parts are taught to instantly obey masters.

Wolf and Sheep Training

During the second year of life (12 months to 24 months) it is important to the Jesuits that high barriers are placed between the “front” or presentations, and the “back” or loyal parts. One way this is accomplished is with “wolf” and “sheep” programming.

The back, or hidden, parts are taught that they are wolves. The Jesuit Fathers raise wolves for this purpose, and will take the young child and place them in a pen with a mother wolf and her cubs.

The child will have been sprayed with wolf scent, and the mother will normally let the child join her cubs. The child is told that he or she is a wolf, and is treated exactly like one: the child nurses on the mother wolf; is fed with the cubs, and is taught to crawl on all fours, and even to growl like a wolf. They are taught that wolves are strong, cruel, fierce and protective, and that they must guard the "weaker" systems by doing the tasks that "sheep" cannot do.

Once this program is in place, the front systems undergo "sheep" training. They are placed with sheep, and eventually believe that they are lambs or sheep; eating with the sheep, sleeping curled up with the other lambs, and in every way being treated as if they are a sheep.

To place a barrier between the systems, the Fathers then cause the two systems to traumatize one another. The "wolves" are told to "attack" the sheep and to try to kill them. This causes the front to become angry and to distrust them. The wolves are also taught to hate "sheep" and believe they "stink" by having a slain lamb tied to their back for several days. The carcass becomes ridden with flies and stinks terribly; the body itches and the child becomes violently ill, and they are taught that this is the result of being close to a sheep. These parts cannot come close to front parts, that they believe are sheep, without smelling the rotten carcass that made them so ill as a very young child. This makes the back very unwilling to come near the front.

Other barriers between front and back are also installed during this second year. This includes a wall with gargoyles and demonic guardians that is erected between the front and back, which is overseen by Janus (the Roman deity with two faces). One face observes the "front" or presenting systems; the other, the back, or hidden systems. Certain parts can pass through the doors, but those without authorization are immediately torn by the demonic guardians placed between front and back. The demonic is allowed to pass freely between front and back.

In addition to these barriers, others are placed. One is an extensive "buffer" system. These have entrained neurolinguistic programming in place, and their role is to be emotionless and to stand between the front and the back, " buffering" the front from any knowledge of what the back is doing, and vice-versa. Their role is to prevent the two sides from actually meeting or communicating, and to keep the amnesia in place through constant ingrained "wipeout" programming.

This wipeout programming can consist of a combination of traumas that are re-experienced, such as internal shocks to the head, EHF and/or microwave bursts to the frontal lobes, or other similar traumas that were used to originally wipe out memories of assignments. If the survivor attempts to cross the barrier, they may experience flashing lights, blizzard, extreme headaches, eye pain, nausea, dark bursts within the deep brain, or other trauma that occurred when the barrier was originally put in.

Good Gaud. What you say resonates so strongly with me. I am reading It is Not Impossible right now.

And of course, I am not sure you know this, but my sister acted out the kill program in one of the earliest times for such things in our era, the early 80's. Piecing my personal story together is different because we were with our natal family the whole time. We didn't have host families and we are our parents' children. But I have evidence that my father was programmed by mengele in '49. In Quebec city in a catholic hospital run by nuns (Saint-Michel-Archange) after his "nervous breakdown" after attending 2 weeks in seminary school at St. Peter's seminary in London, ON.

I speculate that mengele tried to transfer or install his own consciousness into my father at that time. Reading one of Mengele's bogus biographies was like reading about my father. The same obsessions, likes and belief that university professors are the top of the professional heap. I believe Marshall McCluhan had something to do with my father's and maybe our training. We met him in our presentations a few times. One was in the back seat of our family sedan with Marshall McCluhan in 74 or 75 ish. I was doing a project on famous people and I picked him because my father was always talking about him. My father arranged the interview. MM was sitting beside me in the backseat btwn me and my brother and sister. My first question was, "Why are you famous?". He turned stone cold, a dark evil came over me. He said nothing. He stared straight ahead. I asked my dad for help and he just kinda laughed. That was the end of the interview. MM taught at St. Michael's college at U of Toronto, a Jesuit college. He was an awful person from what I remember.

Another odd thing about my dad was one of his pet projects- Laughter Centres. He used the Alfred E. Newman face from Mad Magazine to promote them. I now believe that Alfred E. Newman was modeled after my father. This is just another way they could exploit frequencies to enrich themselves through media and popular culture. (for me it is many of the celebs in our time and of course, EL from Stranger THings). This function of the cult is huge and all that popular culture ever was/is, IMO. Let no good psych patient go to waste. Mad Magazine (started in the auspicious year of '53).

My mother actually said she knew that Canada harboured nazis. And she NEVER said anything political or beyond the duties of wife and mother (programmed at the Allan in ’58) to completely rid her of her highly skilled ability as a clothes designer and seamstress.

I do take some opposition with the manner of salvation you speak of through the protestant evangelical church but that is not important. We are both good with the one true God in our hearts.

Additionally, I have had a hell of a time with people I have trusted and shared with who started out as friends turning on me in the worst way. I am sure you understand, but even me sharing this little bit with you makes me wary. Some of the things I have stated here I have not stated publicly yet.

My father stayed in contact with priests his entire life and was obsessed with the Catholic church. He often spoke of the Jesuits. I believe that this happened to me and my sister and probably my brother. He drowned in a canoeing accident (and it was – I checked it out thoroughly) when he was 19. I believe one does not need more than the ill wind of these curses in our systems to blame for these tragedies. Which was to silence all of us. Especially me, since I am the only one left who has the ability to get to the bottom of this.

My mother’s family in London ON are silent on all matters, so are the remnants of my dad’s family in Windsor ON, but some distant older relatives on my dad’s side have given me more information than both immediate sides combined. Suggestion is strong that both families are deeply occulted.

Thanks for your work. Without revealing the methods, I don’t think the bottom or the top way out can truly be reached. Thanks for doing that. You were born to do that and that is a great great thing for all us vics of the jesuits.

Hello, do you know how Jesuits were programmed before Mengele ? And do you think the 13 orders have always programmed their members since the ages ?
Also, do you think Illuminati children are systematically made by IVF ?
Have you seen other testimonies from Jesuit survivors ?

I also wonder if some of top members of the orders are not programmed like some survivors told us about the Queen Elizabeth, they tell she can live hundred years by replacing her body getting spiritually inside a children body, and putting away children's soul.
Also have you heard about a grey pope ?

Book Part 7

Trigger warning: this post contains graphic descriptions of programming and methods

Assassin Training (ages 2-4)

The early assassin training is continued during the second year of life. The parts that will do physical assassinations are taught to wring the necks of kittens and other small animals.

During the second half of this year the toddler will undergo the extremely cruel training to kill that Mengele developed. The child will be placed in a cage with other children the same age (there are thirteen cages in all, with six on the bottom, four in the middle, two above and one at the very top.

The children in the bottom six cages undergo terrible abuse. The children above urinate and defecate on them, since they are at the bottom. They are also painfully raped frequently, and are not given any food or water. It is a type of "hell" for a small child. Once a day the toddler is taken out, and a kitten is placed in front of them. Mengele then would give the order, "Papa says 'Kill'". They are expected to instantly snap the neck. If there is the slightest hesitation, or the child refuses, they are placed back in the bottom row of cages, where the terrible deprivation and abuse occur.

The next day, the child is given another chance. The children that survive learn to instantly and without thinking obey the order. If they do, then Mengele would hold the child in his lap; tell them what a good job they did, and give them a treat.

After two weeks, the child will be either on the top two rows, or dead. By then, Mengele would spend significant time praising the child, bonding with them, for doing such a "good job." The animals to be killed were placed in the center of a red circle, and they become bigger. Finally, a small infant is placed in the center of the red circle, the child is given a knife, and the command is given. If the child refuses, they are placed back in the bottom row of cages, and the t[illegible] begins all over again until they obey or die.

This is a primary assassin code: “Papa says kill” and is used by all Jesuit Fathers and top trainers as well.

Traveling the Dimensions

As part of their mage training, the toddler is taught to begin to travel in the spiritual realm. Before age 24 months, they will have learned to travel to the First Dimension. Dimensional travel usually involves theta parts which have never had contact with the outside world other than during their first creation in a black room. These parts are taught to leave the body through the application of intense torture (electroshock, burning, skin peeling, cutting with razors, beating, flagellation, smothering, heart stoppage, freezing, burning or other types of trauma).

The First Dimension

Once the part can leave the body, they are accompanied by an older spiritual mentor, who travels with them to the first dimension. This dimension is described in the Alice in Wonderland books (Lewis Carroll was an infamous occultist, and his books actually describe the demonic realms). In the first dimension, plants and flowers talk, and the young child is fascinated by the seeming beauty of the landscape at first glance. They are initially unaware of the dangers, but quickly learn: the flowers will try and grab the child and hold the child against their will; or will beat upon or even try to bite the child. Oversized bees and insects also come, and can cause great pain.

The child traveling will cry out for help, and will be “rescued” by their spiritual mentor, who will take them back to Gaia (the physical world we inhabit here; that is the name for this dimension).

The controllers for the First dimension are a large cat (the “Cheshire cat” in the Alice books);a large, demonic caterpillar that can sting with ferocity, and the white rabbit. These beings are actually demons that have been trapped in the dimension; they cannot leave it, but try to entice humans to visit them in order to ensnare their souls.

The Second Dimension

The second dimension is fire, and is inhabited by Vulcan. It is very hot, and the dimension is much like entering into an underworld with hot lava streams and fires. The child and their mentor travels, enduring being chased by fire lizards and other creatures, until they meet up with Vulcan.

Other Dimensions

The other dimensions include:

- a dimension of extreme cold and ice, overseen by a demonic “ice queen”
- a “reverse world” where everything is reversed, causing extreme disorientation
- an underwater dimension overseen by neptune
- a dimension of extreme dark and nightmares, overseen by Charymedes (god of insanity and chaos) with harpies that chase the child and attempt to kill them:
- a dimension (the 12th) of electricity charges, overseen by Electra

Each being that rules a dimension will always ask for a sacrifice of some kind from the child, in order for the child to be allowed to return to Gaia. At first, the sacrifices might be “the screams of someone being tortured” or for the child to undergo torture themselves. As the child goes to the higher dimensions, with worlds inhabited by beings such as Charymedes, the sacrifices become much more difficult, and can include betraying the person the child loves most, or killing someone the child cares for, including their spiritual mentor(s).

Traveling the dimensions is considered a primary part of mage training; a mage does not become an ascended master until they have traveled to the 12th dimension, or the 13th (travel to these dimensions involves being put to death for several minutes).

Helping the survivor

The early childhood traumas will be very difficult for the presentation to accept, especially because of the deep denial and guilt that will be programmed in. If the survivor does begin to recover these memories, their punishment programming will immediately begin kicking in (see following section for further details).

Jesuits are always international, highly trained assassins and information gatherers, and the grieving will be tremendous. This is when they will need outside support, to vent the anger and grieving over the abuse and manipulations, and to hear that the Lord can forgive what they were forced to do from a very young age.

The survivor may cry out as Jeremiah did, “Why did I come forth from the womb to see labor and sorrow, That my days should be consumed with shame?:(Jer.20:18). It can help them to understand that the Lord really does understand their grieving and pain, that He took that on the cross for them, and paid the price for every death they were forced to participate in.

It can help the presentation to remind them that when they came to Jesus, while THEY were unaware of the back parts and their deeds, Jesus knew all along – and forgave them, too; that this information doesn’t surprise Him. His love doesn’t change just because the survivor remembers what they formerly didn’t.

As they attempt to break bonds with their early abusers, they will run headlong into feelings of abandonment and being alone, which are meant to prevent their fully leaving. Leaving will mean giving up all of their deepest unconscious relationships, the ones formed during these earliest (amnesic) years that have been wiped out from conscious memory.

It can help the survivor to understand that the Lord can fill their attachment pain, and stand in the place of father and mother to these young parts:

Ps.68:5. “A father of the fatherless, a defender of widows, is God in His holy habitation.”

Isaiah 66:13. “As one whom his mother comforts, So I will comfort you; And you shall be comforted in Jerusalem.”

It can be difficult for the presentation that came into therapy to realize that THEY are not the true “host” (which is placed behind an amnesic barrier). The real “host” the first three years of life will be Jesuit, will have a Jesuit name, and will carry the memories of the first three years that are wiped out when the child undergoes amnesia programming at age three prior to being placed within their host families.

The child at that age will have agreed willingly to forget the Fathers that they love in order to protect them; the presentation must be able to grieve this loss of their early childhood memories, and supported in dealing with the very painful betrayals and loyalty programming that will come up if the true host does ever present in therapy.

D. Punisher Training

An important part of a Jesuit system is the punishers. These punishers are modeled after people and spiritual beings the infant and child have seen portrayed by actors and in VR from earliest infancy. The beings (actirs) come to the infant's crib, talk to him or her, and tie themselves to the infant with a slender cord, as they teach the infant how the being talks and acts. This becomes internalized, along with the demonic spirit they impart.

The head of the punishment systems for Jesuits are in several layers. In the false Christian layer, these will include a false Jesus (head punisher), a false God, and a false Holy spirit. These parts, who are actually sabotagers and punishers, explain why the presentation can be very "Christian" and yet not be actually listening to the Christian God; instead, their conscience, which is Jesuit-trained, will believe that they must obey "God" and they may be completely misled into actually obeying the group and its directives and feel extremely guilty and even think they will "go to hell" if they disobey.

They will not know that these are Jesuit directives, however; they will believe that "God" is "telling them to stay with their husband (handler)" or that they must "honor their Father and Mother (cult parents)", etc. They will feel very "Christian" and "peaceful" when they obey these directives, and feel guilt, confusion and anxiety when they disobey, until the programming is broken and they can differentiate between the Lord and the false god placed within.

Core Level punishers will include Vulcan and Prometheus, and the main reprogramming system will be named Saturn (due to the numerous rings and levels of the punishments).

Internal Hell Punishment

The foundation of a Jesuit punishment system will be the deeply ingrained belief, from the core outwards, that the systems must not be allowed to descend and thus enter into the punishments of "hell." Since earliest infancy, and deep into the subconscious and unconscious, this fear of descending (through disobedience to the order's directives, or to the pantheon) is inculcated. All core controllers for all systems will unconsciously believe that the punishments are "good" since they are keeping the systems and core from "going to hell" or descending into a mortal state. The pain of the programming (re-experiencing) is seen as "proof" that the systems are descending, since ascended systems "do not feel pain" in the programming scripts.

This will be translated in the presentation into a deep fear of angering God, and an unusual ability to "hear from the Lord" and "hear His direction" which is actually listening to the false god planted inside in order to prevent experiencing the excruciating pain that will result if they disobey. The presentation may experience severe guilt at the thought of the smallest infraction, or fear going to hell for even slight errors, due to the unconscious pain of this programming.

Vulcan

Vulcan is the primary core level punisher, and has an anvil that is used to literally pound the primary system core splits with (ensuring that the resulting pain and trauma go throughout the system being punished). If he fails in his duty, a large black bird swoops down on him, tearing out his liver and entrails and eats them. This is based upon primary infant traumas that involve the Jesuit Fathers bringing a bird into the infant's crib, and allowing its talons to tear at the infant. The traumatized infant retains this memory, which is built upon over the years.

Often this is reinforced with virtual reality, with a highly realistic predatory bird swooping down and piercing the bowels. Physical needles and knives are used for the initial traumatic pain, which is accessed and re-experienced over the years.

Vulcan is taught to punish the systems, and even the core, for severe disobedience and/or betrayal. The worst type of disobedience includes failure to maintain contact with the Fathers or their representatives, and trying to leave the Order. To the Jesuits, an individual attempting to leave is considered a traitor of the highest degree. They are actually considered "insane" since only insanity, to their thinking, could cause a person to take the path to descension, feeling the body and mortality, and giving up what they consider "godhood" and choosing to "go to hell." The members of the Order literally believe that the person choosing to leave is straight on the path to hell, and they will do anything to try and "save" them from this path.

This "salvation" can and will include extreme torture and reprogramming, in order to put the person "back on the right path." They believe that these measures are needed to bring the person to their "senses."

Helping the Survivor

The internal punishers and master controllers will also hold these beliefs, unless they can be reached and worked with. They will torture the person into literal insanity and/or death, believing that they are "helping" to "redeem" the "errant" person.

The hell punishers and system punishers themselves will be in agreement with the tortures, since as a child, they were taught to punish severely "traitors" and those who "disobeyed" with these same tortures. They internalized the beliefs of the Jesuit Fathers, and so were in agreement with inflicting this type of pain upon others, first externally, and then internally. They believe they are doing a "good" thing.

As the survivor remembers doing these things, they will feel immense guilt, and believe that they "deserve" these punishments because of what an "evil" person they are. They must be shown that Yeshua paid the full price for their sins, and that they and their systems can never do restitution for their deeds. This can help to break the cycle of guilt, penance and pain that has been set up since infancy.

Meditation on scriptures regarding forgiveness, the love of God, and listening to worship music that underscores the forgiving heart of God can be helpful in understanding this, since music can reach the "right brain" and bypass the faulty logic the Jesuits installed.

This is so hard for me to wrap my head around. I can't imagine any therapist that has had training in order to help people with programming like this? And also, how many people if you could guess I've had this sort of programming? I would think this sort of programming would be reserved for people that are going to be placed in political power or high corporate power?

There are very few therapists that I know of who try to help with this type of thing; and most of the journey is often the survivor's. I can only speak about those in the order I was born in; most in this order go through this. In the 12 occultic societies, the programming is a bit different.

Book Part 8

Prometheus

Under Vulcan is Prometheus, the main white system (presentations) controller punisher. His punishments include fire, burning, and intense pain, depending upon the traumas the person has undergone. During the early years, the Jesuits will incorporate primary punishment traumas that include:

- Flagellation with a whip that has attached sharp rocks and razors
- Burning at a stake
- Having feet and legs chewed on by rats
- Being stung by a swarm of angry bees (the child is given anti-venom before and after to prevent death)
- Infants being dropped, and startled into a mechanical panic reaction
- Being attacked by birds and wolves
- Demonic attacks
- Rapes with steel instruments
- Shocks throughout the body
- Death and near-death experiences
- Paralysis and being tortured while unable to move
- Drowning and smothering

There are others; these are just a few representative traumas. The death experience accessed and used to make the individual believe that they are dying as a result of disobedience, the heart may even stop beating for intervals that range from skipped beats to no beat for up to a minute. Breathing may also stop when the individual attempts to break core level punishment programming, since the ultimate punishment is physical death, and this is deliberately installed by the Jesuit Fathers as a "fail safe" if all other protocols fail.

Saturn

Saturn will be the primary reprogramming system, and is responsible for reprogramming the systems nightly with the traumas described above. Horrific reprogramming traumas will be instilled, first physically and later using virtual reality. Small core-level infants will be dropped, pounded, shocked, raped, burned, cut, eaten on by rats, blinded by needles, suffocated and otherwise traumatized during the reprogramming.

Jesuit systems reprogram constantly, with the reprogramming sequences changing every two hours throughout the day. This ensures that all systems are reprogrammed daily.

E. Jesuit Master Controllers

The primary master controllers for a Jesuit system will reflect the primary spiritual relationships in the child's life.

Althea (the Tree of Life)

These will include the "unholy trinity" of the Father (Satan), the Son (the antichrist and the beast) and the Spirit (Althea, the tree of life). The Fathers worship all three. In fact, the Arbor de Vitae monastery just north of Rome (the primary Jesuit monastery) is believed to be the dwelling place of Althea, the tree of life. This wicked creature lives in the basement of the monastery, and the young children (and adults) will often hear her moaning at night to be fed. And they do feed her, at regular intervals, with sacrifices of every human variety.

The Jesuit children are taught from infancy to participate in these rituals; as infants, the Fathers place their hands over a baby's, and teach them to make the sacrifice. As the child gets older, they must take a more active role, or suffer severe punishment by Althea (which appears at times like a huge willow whose branches "whip" the child terribly).

No Jesuit child ever wants to be called down for a spiritual whipping of this manner, and so they quickly learn how to feed the tree very efficiently. After a ritual, the tree will be quiet for days or weeks, but will always begin moaning again to be fed. The child grows up knowing that in order for there to be peace, they must give this entity what it asks for. The child will have been dedicated to Althea, will have a representation of her in their system, and must dismantle it, kick out the spiritual entity, and heal the human part.

Helping the Survivor

When the tree of life is pulled out, the three roots (white, black and silver gray) must also be rooted out, since these represent early infant demonic traumas used in installing the roots of the tree of life and the q'ballah internally. This takes extensive prayer, seeking the Lord, and asking the Holy Spirit to help the survivor overcome the fear of uprooting these demonic strongholds.

The tree of life will often have grown to a large tree with 1,000 points of life, each representing a life taken (including those of infants), and the demonic that entered as a result, during the installation of the tree. These lives must be grieved for; the murders repented of, and forgiveness received, to break the hold of the tree of life on the survivvor's mind.

Some survivors will also have a mirror images of the tree of life, or a "tree of death" internally, that again is based upon the ritual murder of young infants, with the roots attached to the heart of the survivor (they are wrapped around the heart, and the survivor may believe that they will die if the tree is taken out).

The survivor will need to realize that the Lord is able to undo even this type of programming; can overcome the fear of uprooting the demonic. It can help the survivor if they are reminded that the fear they feel is the fear that the demonic feels at losing its "home" inside, and that they will actually feel more peace once the tree is rooted out. They can pray and ask the Lord to uproot it for them; this may be seen visually inside as Jesus reaching in and pulling it out, or as an increased peace as the rituals are repented of, and the person exercises authority.

The relief may be dramatic, or occur over several weeks. But the survivor will have more internal peace and healing once they choose to get rid of this voracious entity, and allow the Holy Spirit to fill them instead.

The Beast

The Beast has a room and a lair in the Vatican dedicated to him. This room supposedly dates from early Roman times, when sacrifices were conducted in the original cave located there that the Vatican was built over. This angry and vindictive spirit makes its presence known, and is eagerly sought out by the Fathers, since they believe he gives great power over enemies. The young child will be placed during the second year of life in a dark, cave-like lair underneath the altar in the Beast's room. They will spend 24 hours in this lair, where the Beast visits with the child, makes suggestions, and eventually has the child give in to its requests (to kill another child put in with them).

This is extremely traumatizing to the young child, who feels intense guilt. The child will have internalized the Beast (see the above discussion on programming methods used). This internal Beast only knows and understands killing and destroying, and spiritual warfare and deliverance must be done to free the human part trapped by the spiritual part. The Beast also gives energy to the punishment systems described previously, and will demand absolute obedience to it and the Pantheon, until the individual learns their authority in Yeshua, and is able to break free.

Satan

Many times, it can take years of dedicated work to go beneath the tree and beast layers, and reach the true system master controller: Satan. From pre-birth and birth dedication, this is the being the Jesuits truly serve, in both his incarnations: as satan (cruel, vicious, demanding, destructive and lying) and Theo (kind, benevolent, manipulative, charming). The child will have been bonded to both, as described previously.

Satan's Throne

During the toddler years, at times the child will be physically placed on satan's throne. When supplicants crawl up the hall on ground glass, or nails, or hot rocks, satan will be sitting on the throne next to the child. He will ask the child what kind of judgment should be made; or what price should be paid for a request, and the child will answer. If satan is pleased with the answer, he and the child will simultaneously make the pronouncement. If the child is too kind-hearted, they will be punished severely until they learn the types of judgment that are acceptable.

This internalizes the satan identity for the core master controller, since the adults treat the child on satan's throne as if he/she were satan himself, in every way. The child is actually temporarily possessed, in that part, by satan during the ceremonies and judgments. The evil behavior convinces the survivor that he/she is evil and anchors the belief in the part that they are actually satan.

Helping the survivor

In later years, the adult will have to overcome very difficult memories of the lives taken or asked for when in that role, and the cruel decisions made. They will need to repent of these deeds, and ask the Lord for forgiveness (which He offers freely). It can help to remind the survivor that the Lord knew all about their past, even when they didn't; that He is not surprised or repulsed by them or their past. When they came to Jesus, He knew all about each act they committed, and forgave them.

They will also need emotional support to process the pain of these memories, and to be treated as loveable, in spite of the horrific acts that they committed. This is a challenge, since many Christians want to "turn away" from those with a past such as this. But the survivor is looking to their therapist or support person to demonstrate the love of Christ to systems that may have no idea of what true Christianity is.

Once they "get it" and realize they are forgiven, these parts will quickly give up their old jobs and choose freedom, if they believe they have the physical safety to support healing.

Demonic Chess

The Jesuit Fathers are accomplished "chess masters." The term comes from the original, demonic origin of chess, which was first used by the ancient Babylonians, then the Egyptians, then passed down through the centuries. The original form of chess is considered an important part of mage training.

During the game, the young child is taught to first control the easier, white pieces, which are made of stone. During the game, the pieces come demonically alive, and they will try to turn on and attack the child. At first, the toddler needs the help of their spiritual mentor (the Father) to control the pieces and to prevent being bitten and wounded terribly. As the child gets older, and stronger in the occult, they are eventually able to demonically control and move the pieces on the board. They also learn to move and control the much more difficult black pieces in the same manner.

The winner of the game is allowed to ask the board for the answer to a question. If white wins, the answer will be written in black on the king's square; if black wins, the answer is written in shining silver on the black king's square. The monarchs of Europe often played this form of chess in order to get answers as to which battle strategy would be best to use, or to get "inside" information on their enemies. A true "chess master" is actually an ascended master who is able to win frequently at this form of chess.

The occultic form of chess is one reason why there is a chessboard in the Alice in Wonderland books; the game is actually based on a demonic game being played.

Torture Training

The Jesuits are considered the “best” (or, worst would be a better adjective) torturers in the world. They were the ones who conducted the Inquisition (Torquemada was an infamous “interrogator”) and they refined the art of torture throughout the centuries. All Jesuits undergo training from infancy on in how to torture and interrogate others.

The lower levels of all Jesuit monasteries, and the Vatican, contain rooms that are literal dungeons, with torture instruments that range from medieval (such as racks, water wheels – a favorite of the Fathers), pincers, and iron maidens, as well as every variety of whip (including those with small stones and razors attached), to more modern equipment.

The Jesuits are infamous for their ability to keep individuals they wish to make examples of alive for weeks while undergoing torture such as having the skin peeled off and reattached; having digits removed, blinding the victim with hot pokers, needles or other instruments; doing “dental work” without anesthesia; electroshock, paralysis and suffocation, burning digits and working inwards, and other methods. They have very sophisticated medical equipment on hand, and will insert I.V.s and use other methods to prevent dehydration; and will give a variety of medications to either enhance and prolong pain, or to resuscitate the victim.

The toddler is forced to learn to do all of these things, and others. If they hesitate or refuse, the toddler is tortured in the same way they were asked to torture another, until under great pain, they finally agree. The victims they learn on are often homeless adults at first, or traitors; the child is taught that these tortures are what happen to those who betray the Order, or try to leave it.

A favorite form of torture at the monasteries is actual crucifixions; the “traitors” are nailed to crosses, and slowly suffocate and dehydrate over a period of three to four days. The Jesuit classes are marched by at intervals to watch the result; the individuals always lose their bodily control during the first day, and their minds by the second. It is a terrible sight to see the incoherent screams and begging for mercy by the last day or two, and it makes an unforgettable impression on the young Jesuits in training. They rapidly decide that being a “traitor” is something that they never want to experience.

The toddler is at first awkward with knives, but during early childhood, with instruction by the Jesuit Fathers, they become quite skilled at using a knife for torture and/or slaughter. Important rituals are “practiced” ahead of time to ensure that the children are all able to fulfill their roles without hesitation and perform perfectly. The slightest error is not tolerated in these settings.

F. Anti-Christian Programming

The Jesuit Fathers create innumerable setups to ensure that the young child will learn to hate and fear the real Jesus of Christianity. These setups can include the following:

- The child runs away when very young, because the gates to the monastery are “miraculously” left open. Eager to escape their torture and abuse, they run down the road. There is a house to the right, and in front is a kindly, smiling figure in a white robe who introduces himself as “Jesus.” He invites the child in for a meal and "safety" from the "bad Fathers." The child accepts the invitation and once inside the house, is locked in and terribly sexually abused and tortured for several days. The child finally "finds" an opportunity to escape and is found by a Father as they run back to the monastery, which is better than what they experienced in the "Mansion with many rooms" that the false "Jesus" lives in.

- When a bit older, the child may be taken to a monastery near the coast of Ireland, where there are numerous caves. While there, they meet a shepherd in a white robe with a flock of sheep; the shepherd has a staff, and introduces himself to the child as Jesus. Others with him are the disciples. "Jesus" ties the child to himself with a rope, and takes the child into different caves, where sexual abuse occurs. The false Jesus and disciples also practice bestiality, torture the child, hit the child with the shepherd's staff, all the while reciting scriptures about the "Good shepherd and His sheep," "Let the little children come unto me" (when sexual abuse occurs), "My sheep hear my voice," (the child is beaten), and other shepherd scriptures, from the "rod and staff comfort me," to "entering the gate."

- Theta, or dark spiritual parts, are taught that "Jesus smells." At some point, the child is taken to the shore of the ocean, where there is a boat filled with very rotten fish. A false "Jesus" who smells like the fish, and his "disciples" grab the child and take them retching out onto the water in the boat, declaring that they are "fishers of men" and will make the child one as well. In the ocean is a rotting corpse which they "fish out." The memory of the smell will make these parts of the child feel ill for days, and they come to equate Jesus and Christians with this smell. When they come out, they cannot come near the Christian presenters without smelling this foul smell, until the memory is worked through.

- Numerous "Witch Trials" are set up starting during the toddler years, when spiritual parts are brought before a jury of "Christians" who condemn them for witchcraft, and consign them to death by burning at the stake. A Jesuit Father "rescues" the young witch or mage from "death" and the part is left with a deep hatred for Christians.

- Spiritual parts go before a false representation of "God" on his "throne" where they are judged and sent to "hell". Again, this reinforces hatred for the Christian God in the darker spiritual parts. In these scenarios, "satan" will come and rescue the child from "hell."

Working with internal pantheons August 28, 2018 In "healing"	Why Getting Memories Back Can Be Difficult August 19, 2018 In "healing"	Book Part 7 November 18, 2021 In "healing"

Amie Martineau 4:09 am on December 27, 2021

Since you yourself were a Jesuit for a time then you probably have seen Althea the tree? And when talking about the beast on the throne, isn't satan a spirit only? you talk as if anyone could just walk into this room and see Satan sitting on the throne… Are these illusions that the children are seeing? this is pretty insane for me to believe… Can we not have a first hand account from you yourself who was in fact a Jesuit? And every jesuit who is an actual Jesuit has undergone this kind of programming/training? I'm trying to understand and I'm trying to not disbelieve you but a tree in some old churches basement that gets daily sacrifices to eat… Who people have heard moaning… Yet has never been talked about or discovered is very hard to believe… And I guess I don't understand the need for all this graphic detail in programming when 99% of the population has never even and will never even undergo something such as this… What is the point in all this over the top detail when you've never even detailed your own childhood abuse and when I say detail I mean extreme detail you have not gone into any of that in anything that you have ever written… Brice Taylor a.k.a. Susan Ford has Cathy Phillips went into great detail about her abuse when she was a child… I just feel like you've written about this for so long and you say you are a born-again Christian so why wouldn't you start writing about Jesus and the love he has and the promise he has because I feel like writing these things about the illuminati just distracts, confuses and takes away from the real reason mankind is on this earth.. I just feel like you have a written and rewritten the same things over and over again and I also feel like you don't have a lot of time left on this earth so what difference does it make? why not spread the gospel instead of spreading things that a lot of people will never believe anyway? I feel like you don't want to back(or have been silent by your choice) other survivors who have written books.. you may have mentioned survivors in articles that you've written but I feel you never back any of them or give a so-called "shout out' in believing anything these other survivors have said… Now maybe your training and your programming was different but when I wrote you an email a year or so ago telling you that I discovered this "svali is a fraud" website(with quite an abundance of information) you didn't want to defend anything or prove anything and you may not think you need to but some people might and you have put yourself out there for so long some of us may think you owe a little bit of that defending to us… And every time you write something new on your blog it's never never never about the goodness and the truth and the love of Jesus Christ I mean I would think you would WANT to give him a little bit more credit because of where you are today because if it wasn't for him you wouldn't be where you are today according to you? Yet you never speak of him and we are not to be ashamed not that I'm saying you are ashamed but we're to talk of him encourage one another through the gospel and be the salt of the earth which I feel like you have not been doing at all… You have expressed your faith but that's it and I'm becoming profoundly disillusioned and heartbroken from you because every now and then when I go to your blog I would just like to see something positive and uplifting about the Lord who saved your life but it’s nothing but torture and programming and bullshit and some stupid tree that’s alive in some old town Rome church basement I’m sorry and please forgive me for my harsh criticism but I just think in this day and age we are to be witnessing to the lost souls of this world not rehashing accounts of torture and mind control constantly because that I feel takes away from the importance of who God is and the importance of what our job is as born-again Christian to witness to the lost souls because in the end it’s not gonna matter about some tree in the basement that’s evil

Svali dearest. Please know that you are much loved. With all my heart I know you are much loved. I know this because I know I am much loved too. I know I did nothing to earn or deserve that love. It is the mercy and grace of almighty God that brings us out of darkness and into the light. THANK YOU for sharing what you share. It will help people like me, help others. The battle is for the soul. Truth and light are our shield and buckler. THANK YOU for sharing your truth. God loves when we share the truth– He blesses this. Stay safe my beloved sister. ~Rita

Anti-Semitic Training

The Vatican hates the Jewish race, and trains its agents to hate it as well. The earliest anti-semitic training includes the young toddler being beaten or raped by “Jews” (these are setups to create a deep unconscious hatred). Later, prisoner and guard scenarios, and re-enactment of nazi death camps are done. Throughout these portrayals, being a guard is “good” and comes with privileges and lack of abuse (but the guards must be abusers), while being a prisoner, or “Jew” is considered “bad” and the signal to abuse the prisoner ferociously. Those who show mercy in any form are tortured themselves, and forced to play the role of Jew.

Anti-Israeli Intelligence

The Vatican also plays a very active role in anti-Israeli intelligence, which will be discussed later. During infancy, a cover identity for these agents must be created, and they are placed for a period of time in a kibbutz, as an “orphan.” The orphan will always have a distant family member who at some point takes responsibility for the child (such as an aunt). But there will be a record of the child being placed in the kibbutz for official purposes.

The child’s “aunt” or “relative” will be a programmer who helps the child learn Israeli culture and to assimilate. They will travel frequently out of the country during the child’s early years, due to the relative’s role as a “consultant” on business travels. In reality, the child will be taken back to the monastery between these visits to Israel which are for the sole purpose of creating their later cover identity as a Sabra.

Sexual Training

The infant raised by the Jesuits never knows life without sexual abuse. The Fathers are pedophiles of the worst kind, and they continuously abuse the infants in their care, in part to create spiritual ties, but other times simply to fulfill their lusts.

Follow

During toddlerhood, the child will undergo specific sexual training, by specialists in this area, to help them "work" the parties of the wealthy and depraved. These very wealthy individuals have specialized sexual preferences, and prefer toddlers and young child who can perform them, including ménage a trois or quatre, and other acts. Because infants and young children are often "snuffed out" at these parties, the child is given a large, easily recognizable tattoo to save their life (the sign basically is a "do not kill" one, that lets the wealthy partiers know that the child belongs to a powerful patron who is simply lending him or her out for the night).

During these drunken orgies, the child is also quietly gathering information that the wealthy and powerful in Europe or other countries carelessly let drop during the party. Few members of the wealthiest families in the world realize that the children serving their sexual needs at these parties are actually trained agents whose real goal is to discover weaknesses that can be used by the Vatican to gain control of them; or to discover the real thoughts and motives of those who already serve them.

Helping the Survivor

Early in therapy, the survivor will appear to have no problem with prayer, talking to the Lord, and quickly hearing His voice; they may even appear to have strong prophetic gifts since these were heavily utilized by the cult (in divination and oracle roles). But as they begin to realize and undo the punisher and anti-Christian programming, they will begin to understand the amount of deception and listening to false spirits that they did, all the while believing they were praying to the Lord.

This can cause deep spiritual anguish, and the survivor may even fear praying for a period, seeking to address their prayers only to the "correct" deity and fearing they are instead talking to the "wrong one." They may address this problem by using a pre-defined prayer, or a different name than they have for "God" and "Jesus" internally (the prayer in the Prayer Warrior book by CARE is a good one to help with this).

Eventually, as they recover the memories and undo the programming, they will understand that the LORD hears their heart's cry to address only Him. They may for a period be less able to "hear" from Him than formerly, since they are choosing to give up all demonic and false feeds into their mind, and to only hear from the LORD. This is where discipleship by a mature Christian can help enormously. The more experienced Christian can help the survivor learn to discern what is truly the Lord's voice, and what is programming or demonic.

This is why it is so important for the survivor to be well-grounded in scripture, and to be willing to search the scriptures for the truth, as well as discuss what falsehoods they were taught. Internal parts may come out initially very hostile towards God or Jesus, but this is simply because their last experience with who they believe they are was very traumatic, or they felt abandoned by God. Part of healing is working through the setups, and understanding that the God of the Bible is not at all like the actors and false representations the survivor was shown.

The survivor's back parts will all have undergone extensive setups and "proofs" that God is "weaker" than Satan, so asking them initially to put their full trust in the LORD may seem foolish (or suicidal) to them. Gradually, with trust and the survivor watching the authority of true Christianity (and often testing it spiritually themselves through warfare), these parts will come to acknowledge that the LORD truly is the one true God, and will be willing to give up their demonic attachments and "helpers" (which are actually demonic parasites).

Once the survivor’s parts stop calling on the demonic, the LORD can actually allow them to experience the blessings of obedience as outlined in Deuteronomy 28:1-11.

“Now it shall come to pass, if you diligently obey the voice of the Lord your God, to observe carefully all His commandments which I command you today, that the Lord your God will set you high above all nations of the earth. [2] And all these blessings shall come upon you and overtake you, because you obey the voice of the Lord your God:

[3] “Blessed shall you be in the city, and blessed shall you be in the country.

[4] “Blessed shall be the fruit of your body, the produce of your ground and the increase of your herds, the increase of your cattle and the offspring of your flocks.

[5] “Blessed shall be your basket and your kneading bowl.

[6] “Blessed shall you be when you come in, and blessed shall you be when you go out.

[7] “The Lord will cause your enemies who rise against you to be defeated before your face; they shall come out against you one way and flee before you seven ways.

[8] “The Lord will command the blessing on you in your storehouses and in all to which you set your hand, and He will bless you in the land which the Lord your God is giving you.

[9] “The Lord will establish you as a holy people to Himself, just as He has sworn to you, if you keep the commandments of the Lord your God and walk in His ways. [10] Then all peoples of the earth shall see that you are called by the name of the Lord, and they shall be afraid of you. [11] And the Lord will grant you plenty of goods, in the fruit of your body, in the increase of your livestock, and in the produce of your ground, in the land of which the Lord swore to your fathers to give you.”

These are wonderful blessings indeed, and as the survivor chooses to stop calling on the demonic, and breaks the rights given away to such beings in early childhood, they will begin to experience them to an increasing degree. Often, at first, the survivor will feel upset: they have given up everything to break free, they have left family, friends, loved ones, and are undergoing great suffering. They will wonder why; what they may not be aware of is that there may be spiritual parts that they are not yet co-conscious with who may be actually cursing or sabotaging the survivor and their helpers.

As time passes, if the survivor does not recontact and stays safe, these parts will stop doing their old jobs once they realize that they have a better option: to put their faith in Yeshua, and come under His protection and blessing.

G. Early Childhood Training (Ages 3 to 6)

Theta Training

By age three, a child raised by the Jesuits will have significant theta skills. The Jesuit Fathers will often “spiritually rape” the children by demonic help, causing the child to feel raped even though they were not physically touched (and the Father will feel great lust or pleasure in the practice).

In order to defend themselves, the child will also learn these skills and to “rape” others spiritually.

The children also learn to influence the thoughts of others, and it is not unusual to have a group of older children cause younger children to blurt out inappropriate remarks at meal times, using these skills (causing great laughter at the expense of the victimized child).

The children must also learn to defend themselves from the attacks of their peers; this is encouraged, since it causes the children to utilize their theta capabilities and strengthen them.

Leadership Training

By this time, certain children will also be placed as “class leaders” over their class of 12. This leadership is a difficult position to hold, since the other children, who will have been taught to be very competitive, will attempt to take over leadership by harming or even attempting to kill the class leader. Class leaders spend many wakeful nights due to their knowledge of the disgruntled feelings of the others they lead.

Presentation Training

At age three, the child will also be placed within several host families around the world, since the Jesuits are an international society. The child may grow up with anywhere from four to seven families in different countries, and will spend several weeks, or even a month or two each year, with each family during the next 20 years. School photos are taken, and a cover identity created in the countries which they anticipate the child will be working for them as they grow older into adulthood. The families will be given photos of the child (or a look-alike) in infancy for photo albums.

These host families will have programming to prevent the child and the host parents from bonding with each other, since the child must always maintain their primary bond with the Jesuit fathers. The true host and core will always only be allowed to bond with the Jesuits.

An example of host families could be one in Germany, one in France, one in Amsterdam, one in the United States, and even one in Israel. Since the Jesuits hate Israel, and a focus of their intelligence efforts is infiltration of Israeli national security, they will attempt as often as possible to place a child within Israel with a trainer who acts as their “aunt” or “uncle.” The child rotates between these host families and thus learns to rotate between presentations based upon their current living situation. The child has already learned to never speak any language but that of the host family (on pain of severe punishment), and has already undergone numerous experiences prior to going to a host family to teach them to not bond with anyone except the fathers.

Detachment Training

For example, at age two, the child will be allowed to interact with and bond with a loving woman, who acts as a mother surrogate to the child who is hungry for nurturing by a woman. After several weeks of loving interactions, at some point, the woman will turn around and begin severely abusing the child, such as by pushing them down stairs, sexually abusing them, or other abuse, laughing at the child’s display of pain at the emotional betrayal. The child must learn the lesson to never trust anyone, or to bond with anyone other than the fathers, or they will be killed.

The host families will also be programmed to reject the child, and/or abuse the child, to ensure that the child does not create a bond that is too strong. The primary Jesuit bond will always be an unconscious one, that the Christian and cult cover presentations are completely amnesic to: a primary Jesuit Father whom they love greatly, since this is the only person they were allowed to love during their early childhood.

MI6 Training

Once the host presentations are in place, the child (by age 3 ½) will undergo training at MI6. MI6 has a special area (known as "Colonel Green's House" after Colonel Green, the founder of MI6) where young children undergo specialized assassin and military training. Again, the child goes there with their class, and is assigned a number. Instead of being called by name, they will be called "42" or a similar number during training and learn to respond to this.

MI6 reserves the Green House for the Jesuits at specific times, and the trainers during this time are all Jesuit trainers that work for MI6. The child will perfect previous skills in using a gun; their delta computer system will be put into place, and their ability to classify intelligence, and store it based upon its classification will be perfected during this time. The ability to use a photographic visual and auditory memory, and download to handlers information obtained while on a mission, is also perfected.

They will perfect basic skills of all operatives, such as following a target, dropping a tail, and blending in inconsicuously in a group.

The terrible punishments used at MI6 (such as the room with walls that move inwards, or the multi-faceted crystal ball in a room with mirrors used when the child is drugged, or the specialized computer system that is used for delta installation) are all used on the child. By the time the child has completed the 3-month training course (which is updated as they grow older), they will have a firm base in military special operations. By age 12, the child will have developed enough skillsets that they will be classified as a military weapon.

Delta Computer Training

Delta training is extensive enough to give it special mention. During delta training, the child will be hooked up to a computer, which it will be taught to emulate while in delta state. The computer speaks with a synthetic, very robotic voice, and the child will do the same. The delta training will encompass high and low delta states, and the child will be taught to classify all cognitive thoughts and experiences according to security levels. Low security levels can be retained as conscious thought; any information classified as mid to high security will be "access denied" to conscious presentation thought, and stored within the deeper delta states of the brain.

The delta computer system will have a ground zero state, with delta controllers and introjected trainers "manning" the computer systems. At ground zero, primary traumas and death state programming are installed, to prevent dismantling of the computer system and to keep the child invested in protecting high-security information.

Theta Controller Training

As the child reaches late preschool and early school age, they will undergo Galileo training (training in remote viewing, mind reading and thought influencing), in order to provide the Jesuits with access to buildings and conversations they would otherwise be unable to reach. During a mission, a child will be asked, for example, to go into an office building, and "read" classified or private documents during the night hours and then share what they have read with their handlers.

The child will also have the ability to introject themselves and images or thoughts into other people's dream states. In fact, part of theta assassin training is learning to have the subject dream of their own death. The head theta controller (such as Nemesis) will oversee the others, including Phobos (fear); Thantos (death) and Chaos (insanity). Theta training is aimed at teaching the child to induce each of these states in others using demonic powers developed.

Theta Assassin Training

Jesuits very frequently induce death in those that cross them. If a child is sent on a mission, they will have sexual relations with the "mark." At a later time (often days later), the child will be sent bac spiritually with a mentor back to the mark, to cause their death while sleeping. This will often begin with a terrifying dream of the individual's death, and many have literally died of fright due to these terrible dreams.

When the Black Pope is "retired" he is actually surrounded by a group of Jesuits, trained in this way, who kill him using theta powers. The new Black Pope always participates in this. Jesuit Fathers who are removed from a position due to betrayal (such as embezzling funds) will also be "retired" in this way.

The Black Pope in Rome has a theta guard composed of Jesuits who have completed their theta training (these guards can range in age from 12 years old to 32). The three guards sit in front of his office, as a warning to any intruders. They and other theta guards stationed throughout the Vatican give immediate notice if an outsider without authorization has entered the Vatican. This includes occultic practitioners who "fly" past the Vatican; these individuals are hunted down in the spirit by the theta guards, and first warned, and later even killed, for trespassing. In the occultic realm, the Vatican is considered a true "no fly" zone for those who travel spiritually.

The Swiss Guard is composed of young Jesuits who have completed their military and theta training, and act as an additional layer of protection.

The newer generations of thetas have highly developed "kill" training in the spiritual realm developed from the first weeks of life in the womb on, and are often mentored by groups of very skilled theta trainers to prevent the children from turning on the trainers and killing them. These newer thetas have poorly developed presentations, and must often live very protected lives away from the public eye.

Secrecy/Amnesia Training

Some of the most important training the preschooler undergoes is secrecy training. The child has bonded heavily to and wants to protect the Jesuit fathers, and so they are told: "If you betray us, we could be killed. The only way to not betray us is to not remember." The child willingly agrees to amnesia, in order to protect the people they love most.

In other secrecy setups, a child will complete a setup "mission" and later is asked if they remembered what happened. If the child answers "Yes" a gun is placed to their head, and they are told that if they remember, the Father must kill them. They are asked again if they remember (presenters are asked); until the child is either completely amnesic, or is killed (the Jesuits do not allow children who have any memory traces to live; the gun threat is very real).

Another setup is "remember the flowers": the child is taken to a garden at the monastery where he/she has spent times chatting with their favorite Father in the past. There is a water pool in the middle of the garden, and during this setup, it is filled with corpses of children the same age as the young child (ages 2 or 3). The Father cuts a flower, gives it to the child and tells the child to "remember the flowers" (i.e. the dead children who remembered and told others).

There are many, many examples of such secrecy setups, from being buried alive for a day, and the child being told that they will be buried forever if they ever tell (the child is also forced to watch the burial of a child who "told" and several days later help exhume the corpse, as a visual reminder of what can happen); to being buried in a casket filled with bugs, a rotten corpse, or other objects.

The child may be placed in a box with bees that sting them (after going through several weeks of anti-venom therapy previously) as a reminder that "memories hurt."

They are also forced to view the deaths of "traitors" who betrayed the fathers, including crucifixions (the class is marched every three hours past the three crosses for three days to watch the effect on the dying men); and the torture of others who remembered and "told."

Vatican book part 10

There are many, many examples of such secrecy setups, from being buried alive for a day, and the child being told that they will be buried forever if they ever tell (the child is also forced to watch the burial of a child who “told” and several days later help exhume the corpse, as a visual reminder of what can happen); to being buried in a casket filled with bugs, a rotten corpse, or other objects.

The child may be placed in a box with bees that sting them (after going through several weeks of anti-venom therapy previously) as a reminder that “memories hurt.”

They are also forced to view the deaths of “traitors” who betrayed the fathers, including crucifixions (the class is marched every three hours past the three crosses for three days to watch the effect on the dying men); and the torture of others who remembered and “told.”

Alice in Wonderland Programming

By age five, the child will be taken to a large estate in France for Alice in Wonderland programming. This is an elaborate setup, and occurs over the period of a week. The child enters through rooms that reinforce previous training (“control the children: is recorded and replayed, with pictures of dead children displayed on the walls of the room; mirrors, “remember the flowers” and other triggers). They then enter a “backward world” where everything is backwards (much like the third dimension; this prepares the child for this travel). Alice (representing the presentation main controller who is heavily demonized) guides the child through backwards houses, where people walk and talk backwards (a common cause of childhood dyslexia is the confusion this creates).

They are then taken to a setup street where things are not backwards, but “crooked” or off slightly, which is even more disorienting. The child must walk with Alice through houses where things are insanely wrong, where people talk nonsense, and the floors and roofs may be upside down, to teach the child not to trust reality.

Alice then brings the child at last to a place where they see the white rabbit, and follow him "down the hole" (representing amnesia) to a room where the presentation stays behind, watching a movie (screen memories); the back parts then take the child's body through the rest of the setup. They enter a garden with animated/demonic flowers that at first talk kindly to the child, but later turn on the child and attack them. Wasps come and sting the child, and the large caterpillar (the guardian of the garden) tells the child what to do, and how to escape.

The child then enters a huge maze created from hedges. Soon, they are pursued by the "Jabberwocky" (a demonic presence), and must rely upon their theta skills to run and escape, and even leave the body and fly away. The white rabbit and Alice lead the child to safety, but at times will try to "trick" the child until the child learns to rely on themself instead of these capricious demonic "helpers."

The child sleeps outdoors, trying to get out of the hedge, and runs across the queen of hearts and her court playing croquet (with the severed heads of human children used as the balls). The queen becomes very interested in using the child's head (the child is constantly called "Alice" throughout the setup, to represent the presentations, since Alice in Wonderland is ultimately presentation programming to remain amnesic and rely on demonic help to do so).

The demonic "Alice" and cheshire cat help "rescue" the child, who then goes through the "valley of the shadow of death." In the middle is a cottage; it is now nightime, and the weary child knocks at the door, to be greeted by a kindly woman. The child is fed, sleeps, and is warned to avoid the Jabberwocky, which seeks to kill the child.

During the night, the kindly woman gets up. The child is awake, vomiting from the effects of a mild poison they were given in the food. The woman calls in her familiars (wolves) and tries to kill the child, who cries out for help to "Alice" and the "Cheshire Cat" to rescue her. A mage also comes and helps rescue the child, who continues the journey, meeting other characters. Finally, the child ends up at the palace of the Queen of Hearts, who demands a sacrifice (the child was already told that the last child to complete the Alice scenarios will be her sacrifice). The children who live watch the final child come in and be sacrificed in a ritual. This reminds them to never be slow or tardy when coming to a "party" (ritual). The "parties" in the Alice in Wonderland books are always referring to rituals.

Crazy Alice Programming

A subset of the Alice in Wonderland (presenter) programming is the "Crazy Alice" programming, which is meant to warn the Alice controller over the presentation to never allow memories to come up, or they will be labled "insane" and extreme abuse will occur. This is often the root of insanity fears when a person first starts remembering their past.

In this setup (also in France), the child (now called "Alice") is taken to a mental institution where the inmates are chained, and who rant, rave and curse at her. She is left there for days, with her only food being rancid water and rotten cabbage. The inmates hurl feces at her, verbally abuse her, and the custodians sexually abuse her while she is chained to the wall because of her "insanity" (remembering).

Because she is "sick", and "mentally ill" Alice is taken regularly down to the basement for "treatment" which consists of electroshocks, drowning, and being held over a rat pit filled with hungry rats that are allowed to bite her feet and ankles. The child is told repeatedly that "remembering" or "telling" will have her labeled "crazy" and that she will be taken to the institution, or one similar, for "treatment." This is part of developing the presenter amnesia and vows to never remember (or seek treatment).

Wizard of Oz Programming

This programming is also often done first during the preschool years, when the child can most easily internalize the program. The dark core ("Dorothy") is taken to another dimension, with her goal always to return to the Emerald City (representing ascension and the celestial paradise). The programming represents travel through the dimensions, the dangers involved, and the rewards for "ascending."

The goal of Wizard of Oz programming is to remind the child that they must always contact, or return home; and to create great fear of remembering (or, they will be placed in a coma and never wake up, unlike Dorothy in Oz, who woke up from "death" only after "returning home."

Fantasia Programming

Walt Disney was an avowed Illuminist, and his goal when creating Disney productions was to introduce the general public to the occult, especially young children, and to reinforce programming in those raised in the occult.

For instance, animals often "talk" in Disney films, and people can turn into animals, which are actually mage spells. The images are often dark and demonic in the animated movies, and have become increasingly so in recent years.

Disney's favorite film was Fantasia, in which he took classical music that was used to program young children with, and developed highly occultic themes in the cartoons that accompany it. To the untrained eye, Fantasia seems a bit odd; but the individual in the occult understands that the themes of a mage in training ("the sorceror's assistant) who must turn to his more powerful mentor for help, and the Greek pantheon (in the famous rain sequence), mythology and even the depiction of an occultic ritual and then the famous strains of ave maria (a Jesuit programming tune) end the film.

Fantasia is blatant occultic imagery throughout, and was used extensively in the 1950s through 1970s to program individuals with. It was superseded in recent years by movies such as the Matrix, which depicts high-level programming, Labyrinth, and others.

Helping the Survivor

Because of the early and repeated childhood betrayals, and the fact that the true host and core and core splits will not present early in therapy, the survivor will be very untrusting, and unable to bond normally with, anyone who tries to help them. The most common presentation is "detached", since the parts that can attach are hidden very deeply within and are reserved for the Jesuit Fathers only.

While the survivor will not at first present as "needy", the attachment needs are still there, and will drive recontact programming unless the survivor can learn to form healthy, safe attachments. This will be the challenge for both the survivor, and their helpers, since the wounded, angry parts within will often test those they do bond with again and again, once they feel safe within the relationship.

Theta and spiritual attacks are difficult to bear for helpers, but the survivor will be completely unaware that they are occurring. Gently asking, or even confronting, the survivor with what is happening can help. They will need to learn to pray, and ask inside, to find out what is happening with the parts that they are not co-conscious with yet.

Once co-consciousness is established, and the parts come to Christ and the demonic is renounced, the warfare will usually diminish, much to the relief of the survivor and their helpers.

It will take all of the emotional resources the survivor has, as well as outside support, and a strong walk with Yeshua, to face the original attachment pains, that will go throughout early childhood, infancy and prenatally. This is when praying in the spirit, scripture study, journaling and talking with safe support can help tremendously as the survivor grieves the past, and begins to build a life based upon a new foundation.

Often, Jesuit survivors have never known, or have had very limited contact with, anyone outside of the cult setting until they make the choice to break free. They are literally surrounded from conception on by members of the Order, with their life's work, friendships, host families and marriages all mapped out early on. Their close friends will all be members; their spouses are always members, since they arrange the marriages; and their families are also Jesuits or members of one of the 12 societies.

The jobs they have held will often be at "cult" corporations, with bosses and peers all members. Nothing in the survivor's environment was "left to chance" which is why breaking free is truly a miracle. The person who helps the survivor will often be their first non-Jesuit friend, and it will take time for them to learn to interact in "normal" or non-cult ways.

They will grieve tremendously at giving up their relationships with friends, family, mentors and the Fathers, in spite of the abuse, since this is the only "love" they have ever experienced, and this "love" (trauma bonding) allowed them to psychologically survive childhood. As terrible as the Jesuit Fathers were, they were the only consistent emotional bonds the child was allowed, and so the bonding is strong indeed, as well as the desire to "protect" these loved ones through either loyalty, or amnesia, or both.

The survivor who fears facing their past is one who fears betraying those they love; they are often "held hostage" through the group's control of or threatening to harm someone they love, whether a child, a mentee, a cult twin, or another relationship. To break free, the survivor must be shown, and truly believe, that only the LORD can rescue and keep safe these loved ones.

They must also be willing to count the cost of getting out, which is very high: no contact at all with former family, friends or loved ones, since they will all have been programmed to access the survivor. Few are willing to pay this price for freedom, and it is often the unconscious (unknown) love bonds that draw the survivor back in.

It can help the survivor to understand the true cost of discipleship:

Luke 14:26
"If anyone comes to Me and does not hate his father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters, yes, and his own life also, he cannot be My disciple.

Even more helpful is the LORD’s promise of blessing to those that do choose to pay this price:
Matt. 19:29
And everyone who has left houses or brothers or sisters or father or mother or wife or children or lands, for My name’s sake, shall receive a hundredfold, and inherit eternal life
It can help the survivor who grieves the loss of every love relationship they have ever known, to understand that by coming into God’s kingdom, they have actually gained a whole new, safe family:
Mark 3:34, 35
And He looked around in a circle at those who sat about Him, and said, “Here are My mother and My brothers. For whoever does the will of God is My brother and My sister and mother.”
It is a blessing to know that Yeshua calls the survivor who gets out His brother or sister; and to know that they inherit eternal life.

Mage Training

All Jesuits undergo mage training. Mages are considered the “top” of the occultic hierarchy, over witches, wizards and other levels of occultism. They are adept scholars, and study the ancient Babylonian manuscripts (which describe the first contacts between man and the “gods” or “ascended masters” which are actually demonic entities), as well as the Egyptian, Roman and druidic writings.

The oldest manuscripts are considered the most reliable. A young mage is forced to memorize the oral histories and spells contained in these texts. They learn to use books that demonically “come alive” and show scenes when certain spells are cast (much more entertaining than a normal picture book to a 5-year-old). With the help of a mentor, they learn the original names of the animals, in order to call them to themselves, practicing standing in the woods and calling rabbits, deer, birds and other normally shy creatures.

They learn to take the form of an animal, often a bird, or a predator such as a wolf. While this sounds impossible, mages do these things demonically. The focus of mage craft is power and control. The young mage learns to battle in power battles, with the help of demonic forces. While young, their spiritual shielding appears red; then they progress to green, then blue, and the most powerful mages have a bright blue-white emanation, signifyiing extreme demonic ‘protection.” The child travels to the fourth dimension, which is filled with ziggurats, and engages in power battles at first beside their mentor (who protects them from being killed by malicious older mages), and then, as they grow in power, they learn to battle alone.

Mages often “pick battles” with other mages upon meeting them, to determine who is “stronger.” There is a constant positioning for power among these occultists, who have extreme pride.

The mages also learn spells for creating a light; and later, spells and curses to cause illness, death, and the cloak of invisibility, among others. Early in their training, the Fathers help the young (3-year-old) mage conduct rituals and sacrifices; later in their training, the mage does their own, or orders others to conduct them, in order to gain power. The greater the sacrifice,the greater the power, according to mage thinking.

The highest level of mage is the ascended master. This is a mage who has undergone death themselves many times, willingly, in order to ascend to the highest dimension and “learn” from the other ascended masters. This is considered the highest level attainable in the occult world.

Coming of Age Ceremony

When a Jesuit is 12 years old, they undergo their coming of age ceremony, at which time they become a full Jesuit. This ceremony is held at the Vatican for the top classes, and is done every year, as new classes “graduate.” The inner courts of the Vatican are cleared, and golden poles are erected throughout it. The public is not allowed near the Vatican for the week before or after this ceremony, and since there is always a “no fly” rule for aircraft at all times, the ceremony is highly secretive.

The first part involves going to Satan’s Throne at the heart of the Vatican, giving a sacrifice on the black alter there, descending to Satan’s throne in the spiritual realm, and being given a name by Satan himself.

A few days later, the other, more horrific ceremony occurs. Top leadership from all 12 occultic societies that serve the Vatican travel to Rome, and sit in the small coliseum in a designated area under their banner. There are banners representing the Order of the Knights Templar, The Order of the Knights of Malta, Opus Dei, Magnificat, The Order of the Rosy Cross, Trinity, the Illuminati, and the other occultic societies that are actually arms of the Vatican around the world. It is considered a great honor to be invited to this ceremony.

The Jesuit class comes out. On 1000 golden poles in the arena are tied infants, toddlers and young children, and one by one, the Jesuit trainees must slaughter them. Around the arena are golden bowls which they use to catch the blood from each victim, which is then offered to Satan. There are also golden bowls filled with wine, which the Jesuit trainees drink from when they are thirsty or emotionally overcome by the horror of what they are doing.

At the end of this ritual (called “the slaughter of the innocents”) the trainee is considered an ascended master and a full Jesuit father. From then on, they are referred to as “Father” by others, and they take off the brown robe of the acolyte and don the black robe of the full Jesuit. Due to the terrible nature of the ritual, some falter and cannot continue; they are killed by the other trainees as instructed. Most of these new Fathers undergo a period of collapse after the ceremony; they are never the same again.

This ritual is the culmination of a lifetime of training in how to slaughter others. By this time, the new Jesuit Father has slaughtered literally thousands over the course of their childhood, including assassinations and rituals participated in. The design of this type of bloodguiltiness is to create a type of insanity and the desire to never remember, which feeds the dissociation. The individual will experience a huge amount of guilt, and believe that God can never forgive them for the innocent lives they took.

Helping the Survivor

The ritual described above creates a demonic stronghold; the new Jesuit truly believes they are unforgiveable by the Christian God (after all, they took the lives of innocents), and so they embrace Satan himself, who welcomes them in this deed and even gives them honor and a high position in his army for doing it.

It takes considerable time, prayer and replacing these lies with scripture and truth to overcome the lifelong effects of participating in this ceremony. The Jesuit leaving the Order will need to hear, and believe, again and again that the Lord can forgive them for this bloodshed.

This is when sharing scriptures about forgiveness can be a lifeline, since the survivor may initially feel deep shame, and even suicidal, when the memory first comes. They may fear they are going insane (from the weight of the guilt), and will need significant emotional support to process this trauma.

This is not the time to emotionally abandon the survivor. If the therapist is going out of town, there needs to be accountability and prayer support present, and reassurance that they are forgiven (they will ask over and over again, “Can God really forgive THIS?” They will need to seek this answer from the Lord, and hear it from Him to truly believe the truth, but initially may need to hear that they are forgiven from a Christian who can represent the love of Jesus to them in the midst of their guilt and pain.

Over time, they will come to an understanding that they are forgiven, and will feel immense gratitude. It takes patience, but the Lord is faithful to show His mercy for those that have survived this type of trauma – the trauma of inflicting death upon thousands.

Computer Training

The Vatican has trained its operatives since the early 1960s in the use of computers, and the equipment they have available is 50 years more advanced than that used by the general public. They have classrooms within the Vatican that the children go to for training in the different areas that they will be active in. This includes extensive training in all computer languages, and “hacker” training in order to get past firewalls and access information.

They are also trainined in bookkeeping, accounting, and business systems, since the Vatican especially likes to keep itself informed about the financial operations of the organizations it works with, and who work for it. The child will spend many hours on a computer, and will learn every method of downloading and sending on information that is requested.

Political Training

By age 8, the child will undergo political and diplomacy training. The child will accompany their mentor to dinners hosted by powerful political figures, and they will later be asked information, such as “who was the most important person at the dinner? How do you tell? What was the most important information shared during the dinner? Why?”

The child is taught to be charming, and to engage in conversation individuals from any walk of life; and how to gather information without the person they are conversing with being aware of this fact. They are also taught how to “listen in” on other conversations while engaged in coversation themselves.

They may undergo specialized training for placement in a politically prominent position; or they may learn how to engage politically prominent individuals, get close to them, and fulfill their mission regarding them.

How many are in a typical graduating class of Mages? How long does the graduation ritual/ceremony typically take to complete?

Thanks for all that you share. Everywhere I go on the internet (in search of how to help survivors) EVERYONE is SO grateful that you share what you know. You are a wonderful, faithful servant of the Lamb of God. Also, I'm always relieved when you post something new, something that sounds like it's authentically you.

Regarding the issues of clones, and twinning, have you written anything about that? If not, would you consider it? I see influencers every day that no longer look like they did in the past, sound like the did in the past, or speak the same lines of reasoning and truth that they did in the past. I understand that all opposition is controlled but at the same time it seems like some people go off script, or off programming. Jordan Peterson is an example. He was a brilliant speaker, teaching independent critical thinking, and individual responsibility vs the hive mind. I don't think that was helping the New Age higher ups bring all people into submission. Peterson was truly helping millions of people, especially young people. Something has happened to him. I know he had a breakdown– but did he? Or did he go in and get cloned/ or tuned up? Perhaps this issue is unrelated to helping survivors, and is more oriented towards helping the general population that is so- so- so deceived. Perhaps I shouldn't be bring it up, but if anyone would know– you would.

I understand if you edit out any of this, or delete it completely. I appreciate you no matter your response, or non-response.

Thanks again for all you do. Much Love always.

Hi, the mage training is only one of several subjects that children in the group I was in studied; they also studied many other things as well over the years. The training takes years. The graduation ceremony is over several days, since it also includes the other areas studied being celebrated within the group. A typical cohort is 12 in a class, with several classes graduating each year.
I have discussed clones and twins under the genetic labs, where they create clones and twins (same thing, basically, since it creates an infant with identical DNA). In the group I was in, we actually had triplet sets of one girl and two boys, or two girls and one boy. This allows the triplets to “fill in” for one another in their various presentations, and the bonds are very intense between them.

Vatican Book Part 11 (final section)

Note: please be aware that this post mentions programming methods, and Christianity

Recontact Programming

The Jesuit Order has difficult recontact programming to break. This is why very few members of this organization attempt to leave. The recontact programming is based upon two main bases:

The use of infant attachment bonds, and the use of extreme (severe) pain and punishment methods should recontact fail. This is in addition to internal and external reprogramming if these first two fail.

Attachment and Loyalty Bonds

As mentioned previously, the Fathers bond the infant very early on, beginning in the womb when the birthmother rejects the fetus and the fetus comes to believe that the Fathers are the only source of love. This contines in infancy, with the infant being left in a completely dark room, and then "rescued" by the primary Father who gives the infant a bottle, among many other scenarios. The infant, over the course of the first year of life, bonds very heavily to their primary Father, and to Satan himself.

The child becomes extremely loyal to the Fathers, and it literally breaks their heart to think of being taken away. Numerous setups are done during early childhood, of the child being "kidnapped" and later "rescued" by the Fathers, and also of the child being taken away by "traitors" who torture and punish the child, who later escapes to the Fathers. These and dozens of other scenarios are used to reinforce the belief that the child can only be loved, and have their emotional needs met, by the Jesuit Fathers.

The Fathers are the only source of love and bonding the child is allowed to have, since throughout early childhood, all other bonds end up in either betrayal or death. The child literally learns to trust no one other than the Fathers.

Hell Programming

As the child grows older, the recontact program is tied to the internal hell. Recontacting the Fathers is considered a Prime Directive for the system, and failure to comply results in the belief that the system will descend into hell.

The presentation will have no idea that this is occurring. They will feel restless, driven, or even hyperactive when the program is runnning, or may battle tremendous guilt and depression, without knowing why. The programs run unconsciously, and therefore are difficult to identify until enough healing has occurred that the survivor can work with different brain states inside.

Hell programming has nine levels (much like Dante’s inferno). The first three levels will be on one level, the second three on a lower level, with three more at the lowest level, and beneath them all is the abyss (utter darkness). Each level of hell is tied to a prime trauma, as described above.

The first level of hell has individuals chained to poles; demons come and flagellate the victims with whips that have sharp rocks or points attached to them. Since infancy, the young child was taken to “hell” at night to “punish” them for “sins”, and so they have extensively internalized this punishment system. The controllers/guardians for this level originally were punished, then learned to punish others, in this same way, including flogging children and adults to death. They will hold the belief that what they are doing is “right” and that sinners “deserve” punishment, until healing comes and the demonic attachments and rights are broken internally.

The second level of hell involves individuals being chained to stakes and burned alive. Charon is the controller/guardian over this level, and as described above, believe that what he is doing is “right” and that sinners “deserve death,” until this part comes to Jesus and has healing. The presentation will undergo great grieving as these brutal punishers share their experiences, both as an infant, undergoing punishment, and later, as a punisher.

The third level of hell involves a chamber filled with bees that swarm upon individuals and sting them to death. Karydis is the controller for this level, and will have learned to take small children and adults to “hell” where they are swarmed and stung. The controller will have undergone this experience in infancy, first with painful bee stings; then in early childhood, being given anti-venom before being placed where bees would swarm and sting them. The child will have seen traitors tied to poles and stung to death, and will remember these traumatic memories. These memories are reinforced with virtual reality, which recreates the buzzing and the swarming and stinging.

The fourth level of hell involves rats that come and eat at the parts that are trapped there, tied to poles; or the rats will swarm around the parts and chew.

The fifth level of hell involves bugs that bite those within the chamber.

The other levels of hell include crushing, dropping and being torn apart demonically. The deepest level (just above the core) is the abyss, where utter darkness (the primal fear of abandonment described in infant programming) sits.

In addition to “hell,” leadership in the Jesuit Order is often also chained with what is known as :9 by 9″ programming, or one of its variations, which is layered on top of the hell programming.

7 By 7 Programming

7 by 7 involves seven different types of internal pain being placed in through the use of tesla wave and microbursts, as well as ELF and EHF waves. The child is placed within a machine that reads their brainwave activity, creates a specific brain map, and begins entrainment of the brain (over several sessions lasting from 6 to 10 hours, normally, over a period of months with regular reinforcement over the years).

The machine plays harmonic tones that the child has been taught since infancy to “follow” and enter into different brain wave states. As it does so, in one sequence, the brain is taught to rapidly drop brain wave states from high gamma to low delta/death state in less than a second. This causes extreme pain, and even seizure activity. The drops are entrained in over a period of time, with intervals between drops that can last from 4 to 10 seconds, depending upon the person’s recovery rate and pain tolerance. The individual’s infants are put through this sequence, which creates a “startle” reaction and the resulting infant terror.

Another sequence entrained in is a constant oscillating wave form with high-frequency waves that causes headache, extreme heat, and alternating bursts of pain at the limbic level.

Another sequence uses tesla waves, which cause extreme pain throughout the entire nervous system, in synchronized bursts (the sensation is similar to being stung by bees in every nerve at one time).

Another sequence causes a crescendo and decrescendo pounding within the brain, caused by increased intracranial pressure and heating, due to entrainment where microwave bursts hit the brain stem (through the auditory canal).

Another causes the sensation of a hammer pounding within the brain, at 4 to 6 -second intervals (“Vulcan’s Hammer”).

Another sequence is intermittent death: the heart stops and restarts.

When the individual attempts to leave, and stops first physical and then spiritual contact with the Fathers, these sequences are meant to cause the system to “implode” and cause either death or shattering of all systems. The longer the individual goes without contact, the higher the level of pain: there are seven different sequences, each with levels one through seven of pain (hence, the name, “seven by seven”). At peak, all seven programs are running at level seven, which normally results in the heart stopping, and/or core shattering.

The Jesuits consider this program completely unbreakable, since the suicide and psychosis rate for those who try to break it is extremely high. It takes a lengthy amount of time, safety, and significant support to break this, as well as extensive prayer, since the gradual buildup to core shatter level is meant to force the systems to recontact in order to avoid system death.

Experimental Programming

The Jesuits also engage in extensive experimental programming (Protocol I – V programs), which are used for expendable individuals. Protocol V is the classification for endpoint (physical or neurological death as the ultimate result) of the programs. They involve different forms of torture, and the use of new technologies to see the effects on individuals.

The West Coast of the United States has one of the largest experimental theta programming labs in the world; the other four are in Beijing,China (where infants are brought to the center by local contacts), in Russia, in the Ukraine and in East Berlin, Germany. There are other smaller centers that also perform experiments and collect data, including many universities and institutes around the world.

Helping the Survivor

Because of the high level of occultic training that Jesuits undergo, they will experience significant resistance at first from inside parts who feel that they underwent large amounts of pain and death in order to receive high status. These parts will resist giving up this identity, which gave meaning to their pain at the time they were programmed during early childhood, since this was the meaning assigned by their abusers to justify the abuse.

Other parts will resist change, or continue to contact, because they truly believe that by doing so, they are preventing the systems from being shattered, or from going to hell (descension) eternally. These beliefs will be held deep within, at the root of all system controllers, and unconsciously and subconsciously. The parts that hold these beliefs must be willing to come out, and examine the truth, and question what they were taught and programmed to believe. Unfortunately, doing so can cause the survivor to experience tremendous pain and internal pressure, not only from internal conflict and demonic, but from the terrible body memories programmed in to occur if the survivor tries to question old beliefs.

7 by 7 is one of the cruelest forms of programming ever invented. Those who undergo it experience intense, continuous pain until their unconscious mind and parts are able to give up all of the beliefs that drive the program, as well as giving up all spiritual attachments to the program. The top system and master controllers will all be tied to it, along with their infants, and all core splits. Parts are taught to beleive that noone can survive trying to heal from this program.

Breaking it is miserable; and the best helps include prayer, emotional support, the use of medications or herbs that slow brain wave activity (since the pain comes from jumps in brainwave activity that are programmed in, or mini-seizures within the pain centers of the brain). The survivor will always battle suicide programming along with the pain, since core despair is also programmed in; they need to be told, and to believe, time and time again that they can break the program and survive.

V. The Goals of the Vatican: Alexis Paves the Way

The ultimate goal of the Vatican is to prepare the world for the advent of the antichrist, and to usher in the New World Order, which is greatly anticipated. To do so, they have created several mass mind control technologies, under the umbrella of Project Alexis.

Project Alexis

Project Alexis was conceived of in the 1940s, and the earliest forms of implementation in the 1950s were very experimental. It has three arms:

- Security;
- Finances,
- Behavior Modification.

Alexis actually means "without law" and the demonic principality which gave the information to the Jesuits on how to create this project is called Alexis (the spirit of lawlessness).

Security

The security branch of Alexis is involved in the identification of and tracking of every individual in the world. This has already been accomplished today by assigning a numerical code (government ID number or social security number) to individuals, and forbidding them to work for money without this identification number linked to a photo ID and fingerprints.

This branch also involves the development of technologies used to track individuals who might try to "disappear" or not participate in the NWO agenda. This includes the ability to identify and track all individuals through their use of phone (GPS), car (GPS) and online technologies (one reason all laptops today have a camera that can actually show images of the person on the computer and an internal GPS).

Collection and collation software has become extremely sophisticated, and can track within seconds the entering in of data associated with an individual. ATM card use is also used for tracking purposes. The monitoring of phone conversations, emails and all electronic/digital communications of individuals considered "security risks" or antithetic to the agenda of the NWO is routine at this point.

There is no privacy in today's high-tech age, and this is on purpose. Microsoft Windows has background software that automatically collects data on users, integrates with Google and other search engines, and red flags any users with a "high risk" profile. All modern browsers and operating systems (including freeware) do the same. Encryption software does not work for a simple reason: any offered publicly has already had the master key bought by those who ultimately work for the Vatican.

HD television has collation software that also works in the background, and that can record conversations for individuals considered "high risk" and send it forward.

Financial

The financial branch of Alexis has been in effect since the early 1970s, and involves the digitalization of currency, and the campaign to encourage acceptance of first ATM and microcards, and soon, identification chips, for all monetary transactions. This is already nearly in place in Europe (the EEU), and the United States is expected to follow suit soon.

The Vatican founded the World Bank, and it will be the center for finances throughout the world in the future. It already controls currency exchange rates, and helps to determine the rate of inflation in many countries at this time.

Another aim of Alexis is to cause worldwide financial panic, due to severe monetary devaluation, governmental and bank bankruptcy, and extreme inflation. The World Bank will then "step in" to gain control of this financial crisis. It will appear to offer a "solution" to governments and their populations, when in reality, they will gain control of the worldwide currencies.

Mass Behavioral Modification

Another goal of Alexis is mass behavioral modification, in order to prepare the general public to accept the New World Order and its leader. This mass modification was originally conceived of in the 1940s, and crude forms were implemented in the 1950s with the advent of television watching by the general population. Basically, it consists of subliminal images that are displayed at a rate of .03 microseconds, at a rate of 1200 per minute.

The images contain graphics of sexual acts, violence, bestiality, demonic rituals, as well as acts of hatred and brutality directed towards Jews and Christians. Other graphics espouse the coming world leader, and tell people to look forward to his coming. The main image in the graphics is that of Alexis, a composite woman formed by a team of behavioural scientists who studied what images are most pleasing to the most races. Alexis also has a voice, which is slowly being introduced in the background of many television and video shows. When she is finally openly revealed, she will be the "voice of the New World Order" and will appear to be familiar and loved by most, since she has been subliminally fed to the masses for years.

A hologram of Alexis will be used on television to calm people down, and tell them what to do when the NWO is revealed. Her voice tones were again developed by a team of behaviourists, who studied what type of voice appealed to the greatest number of people in all races and ages. Tapes (computerized) of the results have been made over the years. Alexis has already been giving subliminal and background commands to people for many years; they are just not consciously aware of this fact.

Alexis has been fed to the public via television, movies, video games, computer games and the Internet. If an individual watches any of these for more than a second, they will be automatically fed the subliminals. The subliminals tell people that "watching TV is relaxing," "I need to go online, I enjoy it" and other messages to encourage time in these modes, and thus increase the programming. Even early childhood learning games, used in schools, have these subliminals embedded.

Themes of anarchy, rebellion, and violence are embedded in the Alexis modification. A feeling of impending doom and destruction (unless the world turns to the leader who will come and "save" them) is also embedded.

The Hollywood industry was created in order to also fulfill this agenda, and all major studios are funded by members of occultist groups. The top stars are all mind controlled, and the industry has the directive to encourage through the movies made, the acceptance of the NWO/occultist agenda.

VI. The Current State of the World (2017)

At this time, the New World Order is in place; it is simply not open. The detention camps and military are already in place, with detailed plans for each section of the world for the coming takeover. The New World Order is not a "future" event, but instead a present reality that is simply waiting for the signal to move into place.

Each country of the world, and continent, has Jesuit military commanders and generals assigned, who will give orders to their well-trained and disciplined armies (these armies train at night at most large military installations and in desert and remote regions throughout the world). The major occultic societies of the eastern and western world all have troops and generals ready to command their area of the nations the individuals are located in.

Crowd control technologies (based on tesla and EHF waves) are already in place. If resistance occurs, these will be used; they can cause extreme pain, unconsciousness, or death within minutes.

Once the takeover is complete, resisters are to be placed inside designated detention camps for either "rehabilitation" or death if resistance is final. Leaders within the Vatican and other occultic armies will assume teaching positions, to help implement the NWO directives within the different nations, and to explain the policies and what they mean.

These liasion ambassadors are fluent in every language, and thus are well-equipped to gain the cooperation of the governments (which are already heavily infiltrated and expected to give in without any resistance). Paramilitary and other groups that might provide resistance have been carefully profiled and infiltrated for years.

The one nation that has tried to resist this infiltration is Israel which is why they engender special hostility. To say that the Vatican and its arms have tried to infiltrate the Mossad and Israeli government over the past 50 years would be an understatement; yet to date, the success rate has only been moderate compared to other nations.

The Vatican has entered into numerous highly secret agreements with the Arab nations over the years, in its desire to destroy Israel. For instance, the U.S. financial families were instructed by the Vatican to pour money into engineering and other resources years ago into developing the oil reserves of the Arab nations. Why? Because the Arabs, like the Vatican, hate Israel, and the Vatican wanted them to modernize and be able to fight the Israelis; plus, oil gives them a method of blackmailing governments which have become highly dependent upon petroleum prices as an index for inflation rates.

Oil really is "black gold" and currencies that are no longer backed by gold standards often float based upon current oil prices. Governments now measure their wealth in large part on their current petroleum reserves, needed to fuel industry, transportation and heating, among other uses. The country that cannot purchase oil will lose its industry; and alternative energy forms (especially renewable ones) have been blackballed for years, since the Vatican WANTS the world dependent upon Arabian oil supplies; this allows them to control policies and encourage anti-Israeli initiatives.

Oil funds have also purchased large amounts of arms for the Arab nations over the years. This was one reason for the influx of foreign geologists into the Sudan region years ago: to quickly develop the oil reserves in order to fund anti-Israeli wars. The Vatican secretly despises the Arabian nations, but they work with them because of their deep hatred for the Jewish race.

The Vatican is also extremely anti-Christian, regardless of the pronouncements of the newest (Jesuit) pope. At its heart, the Vatican is satanic, serves Satan, and wishes to destroy Christianity. While the presenters in its armies may be Christian, the programmed parts will all be loyal to Satan and the antichrist until healing occurs. The anti-christian agenda of the Vatican has been seeded worldwide, with increasing numbers of laws designed to make biblical, authentic Christianity illegal. Within the next 15 years, it will be illegal (a "hate crime") to be a Christian, and many believers will be faced with possible imprisonment for their faith.

The best possible preparation for the unveiling of the new world order is a strong faith in and obedience to the Lord. The Lord has promised that He, not satan, is in control of world history. While the Vatican can attempt to implement its strategies, it will not win. Revelations makes it clear who the true “winner” in the battle for the minds and wills of mankind is: the Lord of Hosts, who will usher in His millenial kingdom.

There is no mind control technology on earth, that can erase the deep down knowledge of the truth. People can be lied to from conception on, but once the truth is known, most will embrace that truth. This is the basis of healing: replacing the lies with truth, and choosing to walk away from lies.

It is important that the Christian Church “wakes up” to the late hour that we are in. As mentioned previously, the NWO is not a theory, but is nearly ready to come forward publicly. This is a time for Christians to be on their knees, and ask the Lord for HIS strategy for dealing with these things, and for the Christian Churches and their members to be willing to help the flood of survivors who will be leaving occultic societies such as the Jesuits during this time of repentance before judgment.

If you help survivors, pray that others will be raised who have a similar heart; that eyes will be opened to the truth and the need. Pray that the Church will no longer turn away from or disbelieve/discredit survivors, but instead will war with them to break the power of the kingdom of darkness. This is one of the best possible ways of putting into practical action the heart of Yeshua for mankind: to deliver those who are oppressed, and set free those who are captive.

Currrently, the Church is slumbering, and mainstream Christianity seems woefully unaware of the actual spiritual condition of our world today. We truly seem to be acting out the prediction of Yeshua, that in the last days, people will be “eating and drinking and giving away in marriage” and completely unaware that the forces of darkness are at work to draw mankind away from our only hope: Yeshua. My prayer is that the church will awaken to the truth, and take an active part in fighting against satan and his forces. This is intercession of the highest form, to work actively for the Kingdom of God and watch the enemy and his strongholds overthrown in the lives of individuals formerly chained to the occult.

Is every Jesuit programmer? And how many children can one programmer have? It was very revealing what you said about the top Hollywood stars being mind controlled that's crazy to me… Just goes to show you how important idols are to people… I was wondering your thoughts on the Queen's passing today just out of curiosity?

Amie:
All Jesuits have the ability to program others, as in any other large, organized international occult group. Programmers will often work with groups of children of various ages; this will vary with the programmer and their abilities, and the perceived needs of the order. A programmer may simultaneously be working with several infants, several toddlers, and a dozen young children of various ages, as well as several teens and adults. On the Queen: she was part of the British Illuminati, and I pray that it is true that she became a believer at some point. I knew her when I was younger, and she did things that were part of her role in the occult then, so I have mixed feelings on hearing about her passing

How do we pray to stop this? Do we pray against lawlessness? What can we do to stop this control over us? Get rid of all electronics? Unfortunately we can't do that now. Everything is electronic mostly to accomplish anything. Please advise.

I believe we need to pray for worldwide revival and that God will change men's hearts. Ultimately history is in God's hands not Satan's and we can pray that God will raise up fearless overcomes and awaken the sleeping church to take authority

Can you elaborate at all about your time with Queen Elizabeth? And from what I've read all members of Royal families mind controlled? And also when it came out in the MSN about Queen Elizabeth being very acquainted with Jeffrey Epstein we certainly can't think that she did not know what was going on especially since her son was in the middle of it… Do you think the Maxwell/Epstein story goes a lot deeper? I'm surprised that the MSN would expose something like that… But maybe it's just the games that they play within the firm?

Hi,

Do you know why every women in show business, celebrities, politics and models are transgenders and if they are under MK Ultra too ?

And if a fake female agent programmed marry to a normal politic, will their children be programmed too ?

For instance Marine Le Pen in France : she is a trans like her mother while her father is a Resistant against new world order and free massonery, he has been candidate 4 or 5 times for presidency. So I wonder if his daughter has been created in an occult centre, since her mother cannot have baby because she is a male

I guess you know about this subject, that every female stars have a male skull, so it means they have been transformed by an organisation

Thank you very much

Do the occult orders make transgenders programmed too ? Like models, singers, actresses

This is a topic that takes time to address and I plan to do so in a future post. The quick response is that there can be numerous causes of transgenderism ranging from genetic engineering for some to social pressure for others, to other causes.

AWESOME, I can’t wait to read you, this subject is so much important.
I also want to know if you have ever heard about such a CUBE computer that these groups could use for their technology, if yes, where is it ?
This is central and their weak point. Indeed their NWO will be essentially based on 5G, 6G, and crypto-currency, such as it’s already done in China.
The Antichrist will rule the world through this technology.
That’s why we are looking for their damned CUBE.

OPERATION MIND CONTROL

Walter H. Bowart

David, Young Air Force Sergeant: He Was One Of The Victims.

"Ever since I got out of the service I haven't been able to give a day-by-day account of what happened to me during those four years. The scary thing is that I still have a horrible fear of talking. I have a tendency to speed up my speech when I'm being pressed on something; and I get very tense when anyone asks me about my service duties.

"Something has happened to my mind. . ."

This expensive gold pin, in which is set a rare white jade, diamonds, and emeralds, was worn on special occasions by a "Presidential Model". Each of the stones as well as the symbol of the butterfly were used in programming the woman who wore it. The pin also served as a signal to handlers. It told them that the beauty who wore it had received the "Monarch Programming" and would fall under the spell of anyone who possessed the codes, cues and triggers. Operation Mind Control was largely a male chauvinist's game.

About The Author

W.H. Bowart was awarded the McMahon Scholarship in journalism to the University of Oklahoma. In 1965 he founded the New York Weekly The East Village Other. That same year he founded The Underground Press Syndicate which quickly grew to include 200 papers around the world. Since that time he has edited The Aspen Daily News, The Port Townsend Daily News and Palm Springs Life. He has written numerous articles and several novels under a variety of noms de plume. He is on the Advisory Board of The Freedom of Thought Foundation and, at present is making a documentary based on this book.

"I know of no safe depository of the ultimate powers of society but the people themselves, and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with a wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them, but to inform their discretion by education."

--- Thomas Jefferson

"In the technotronic society the trend would seem to be towards the aggregation of the individual support of millions of uncoordinated citizens, easily within the reach of magnetic and attractive personalities effectively exploiting the latest communication techniques to manipulate emotions and control reason."

--- Zbigniew Brzezinski, National Security Advisor

"I don't believe the Constitution of the United States gives you the right to commit a crime if you want to; therefore, the Constitution does not guarantee you the right *to maintain inviolable the personality forced on you in the first place -- if and when the personality manifests strongly antisocial behavior. Note for the second edition

A WARNING TO SURVIVORS!

This book contains information that will trigger you. Give it to your deprogrammer, rather than try to read it yourself unless you have a thoroughly reintegrated personality. Some of this information is wrong and can be harmful to you. Inevitably it is impossible to weed out the triggers, since programming varies from person to person, from handler to handler. Thus, know that if you have ever been programmed you may be triggered by information in this book

At the end of the book is an information sheet about the Freedom of Thought Foundation which, as of this writing, is an ad hoc committee of survivors, researchers, therapists, deprogrammers, counselors, lawyers, doctors and civil rights activists. We hope that this will, in the short term, evolve into a reliable referral service so that more survivors can be directed to qualified deprogrammers and that more therapists, doctors and counselors can learn the efficient technologies to help victims of classical trauma- based programming. In the long term we hope that it will also become an effective political organization to curb human experimentation and attacks on the human mind on both an individual and collective basis.

In order to protect us all from cross-pollination or contamination, certain specific, but trivial information is deliberately false and has been planted as a sort of "tag". Thus if suvivors start coming up with the planted information we will know that there's a probability that they have been corrupted by this book.

The author, editors or publisher take no responsibility for any triggering that may occur.

Author's Note

This book is an exercise in citizens intelligence. The editorial "we" is used herein literally. This book is the result of a collaboration of many. The author and the majority of those who have contributed to it are private citizens working on their own in a synergistic effort, without major funding or corporate support, without government privilege or "need to know," other than that need cited by Jefferson -- the need for informed discretion in a democracy. Without the help of these many people who, like the author, were motivated by shock and outrage that citizens have been so victimized by their own government this book would not have been undertaken.

Thanks first to the survivors of mind control who had the courage to come forward and tell their stories. Since this book first came out I have interviewed countless more mind control survivors. Alas, while adding much to the content of my files, few have shed new light on the processes involved. The network which produced this book will continue to look for the codes, cues and triggers by which to unlock the multi-personalities -- appropriate states from the past which are moved forward to this inappropriate present -- so that they can join in the life of the whole human being within whom they have been locked.

A number of professional people gave valuable technical assistance and patient explanations. My thanks to Harry Arons, Robert Brauers, David Bruce, Dr. and Mrs. Sidney M. Cohen, Drs. Gary and Gwen Dean, Robert Dunn, Dr. Remo Dicenso, Betty Dumaine, Dr. Milton E. Erickson, Morris Ernst, Bernard Fensterwald, George Griffin, Col. Sheflin, Dr. Edgar Schein, David Wise, Mrs. E.D. Yeomans, and Col. Joseph H. Ziglinski.

I received a great deal of assistance from a number of researchers and writers around the world. Thanks to David Bareglass, Chip Berlet, Martin Cannon, Steve Bratcher, Nancy Bressler, Jeff Cohen, Loren Coleman, Richard Crowe, David Emory, Edward J. Epstein, William Grimstad, Paul Hoch, L. Mae Brussell kept in contact with me from the time this book was originally released until her untimely death. She illuminated my understanding on Project Paperclip, the cryptocracy's illegal importation of Nazis into the U.S. intelligence systems after WWII, and called my attention to the circumstances of the probable programming of the assassin of John Lennon and the attempted assassins of Gerald Ford and Ronald Reagan.

Other valuable assistance was given by the following institutions and organizations: The Rare Books and Special Collections Division of Princeton University Library, Brain Mind Bulletin, Zodiac News Service, Freedom News Service, Pacific News Service, The Fifth Estate, Network Against Psychiatric Assault, The Assassination Information Bureau, American Society of Clinical Hypnosis, Sanity Now, Society for Clinical and Experimental Hypnosis, Center for National Security Studies, Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry, World Wide Photos/ United Press, Library of Congress and the National Technical Information Service.

Anthony Robbins and the staff of Robbins Research Institute trained me in Neuro-linguistics Programming and stuck with me through all sorts of adventures until I earned my certification, finally assimilating what Milton Erickson had been trying to get me to understand in 1976. So-called NLP, was a big Eureka. I saw it as (if applied for the highest purposes) a great tool of liberation, discovery and human achievement. Even though NLP has been a valuable tool of the cryptocrats, there are always many more good guys than bad guys.

My understanding of the intelligence community was molded by exchanges with a number of intelligence and military people. Most of them wish to remain nameless.

Special overt thanks to Colonel L. Fletcher Prouty for his patient accounts and interpretations of the Cold War history which he witnessed from within the fledgling cryptocracy. Thanks also go to Michael Kradz and Alan Bell of Dektor Counter-intelligence and Security who trained me in the use of the Psychological Stress Evaluator, and Carl F. Boode of Desert Security who made his equipment available to me to examine the stress patterns of those I interviewed..

Tom Miller gave me much of his time and expertise, as citizens counter-intelligence agent extraordinare. His interest in the subject never waned, and research for his own book "The Assassination Please Almanac" (1977, Contemporary Books) uncovered leads for this one.

Kudos to Johanna Moore Gruneck, Martha Sowerwine and my mother, for their patience and support.

Between the first edition and this one, seventeen years have passed. My thanks go to all those who kept demanding that this book be brought back into print. It was their demand which drove the price of the original paperback to a remarkable $250 per fine copy and finally created the market demand for this Researchers Edition.

I owe a special thanks to a number who insist on anonymity. Thank you all for providing the additional research for this expanded edition and, as always, to Richard Condon who gave me early encouragement and offered his valued commentary in the mid 70's, at the beginning of my quest for the truth. Last and foremost I am indebted to my Enid High School journalism teacher, Miss Ruth Scott, who started me on the path of citizens intelligence so long ago.

Foreword

by Richard Condon

Author of The Manchurian Candidate

The father of Grock the clown, having had his legs broken in eight places by his father for professional reasons broke Grock's legs in eight places to be certain that the child would grow up walking grotesquely so as to ensure his eminence as a clown. The act brought much pain and indignity forever but, Grock's father reasoned, was there not a wholly justifiable element involved? Was not the clowning tradition immortally enhanced by those unnatural legs?

As demonstrated inescapably by W.H. Bowart in this book, our Father who art in the American secret police has endowed hundreds of scientists at American universities to unravel methods for fracturing American minds. That this research in so many great halls of learning has exceeded a cost of untold secret millions of dollars (the only yardstick remaining by which we are willing to measure anything) indicates that this Grockian entertainment being produced by our secret police is a matter of ambitious policy rather than the happenstance of cloak-and-dagger adventure.

In this book W.H. Bowart has proven each step of this official, terminal, government anarchy, even though that appears to be a contradiction in terms. To alter and control human minds is the ultimate anarchy. What is offered by official apologists as a tribute to the deeds of daring-do by romantic spies are acts of hatred and sadism against all people in an insane and degraded determination to extirpate conscience from society.

W.H. Bowart underwent a long and expensive process to assemble the hard facts which comprise this book. Each document attesting to secret police intent had to be ferreted out of government archives by badgering persistence until, page by page, the information was released to him by his right under the Freedom of Information Act. The essence of that law seems to be that one need only write away to a federal agency for information about the general areas in which the citizen is interested. Not so. W.H. Bowart needed to expend large sums of money to employ researchers in Washington and elsewhere in order to discover the precise name, number, and description of the contents of each document toward which he was groping through black streams of informational darkness. Without this it would have been impossible to apply for the transfer of copies of these documents to himself for this book. He had to comb the United States for people from many walks of life who knew, vaguely remembered, or suspected that they had been under the mind control of secret police and military agencies, then had to backtrack again with information gleaned from them to labyrinthine research among thousands of federal archives.

Please keep fearfully in mind that the astonishing information published in this seminal work of investigative reporting, concerning avenues taken to decision and execution by our secret police to fracture or dissolve human minds, then to operate a Yo-Yo, for purposes of counter-intelligence military "efficiency," and the destruction of democratic institutions, was drawn directly from federal records and from official laboratory archives of the highest educational purpose -- as well as from the reviving memories of those who had already undergone the dehumanizing process.

The prostitution of the mind by our secret police preceded the murder of the mind. To attain the advanced techniques now available to "magnetic and attractive" political personalities, it was necessary to turn out the laboratories of science as a pimp turns out his heartless whores upon the winter streets; our hallowed educators, army and navy and air force commanders and personnel, the beloved medical profession, august and inspiring temples of the law, our esteemed statesmen, and all Americans living and dead. Each one of those groups is involved in this dismembering of the mind.

Taxes and the collective conscience make the urination of the secret police upon the human mind possible. "Brainwashing" per se is no news to any of us. Controlled assassins are not known to us only through fiction. Advertising assaults on behalf of poisonous materials to induce us successfully to buy and consume are early on bastions of mind control.

No one -- not anyone -- needs theologians to answer the question: "Where does the soul live?" We know the soul lives in the mind because the soul is the mind in all of its unfathomably intricate individual conditioning. It is the mind of intent, of hope, of purpose, of achievement by the spirit beyond achievement by physical action.

When Grock's father broke his son's legs in eight places there may have been alarm, on the one hand, that a man could do such a calamitous thing to his son but, on the other, the same people responded to Grock's genius to which those hopelessly deformed legs had contributed, and roared with laughter. That was the normal reaction when we were the audience and crazy-legs Grock was the clown. But W.H. Bowart demonstrates to us in this book that we have become Grock. We are the spinning, hobbling, waddling clowns in the eyes of our vividly delineated secret police.

"Oh, no!" (Can you hear the outcry?) Oh, yes, writes W.H. Bowart in this fearful record you now hold in your hands.

Apologists rush in, hired for all such occasions from everywhere, by the secret government crying out, "you are, as usual, like all of your exaggerating kind, making a mountain out of a molehill. While it may (or may not) be true that our secret police occasionally swing the sledgehammer on little minds, it is (or is not) being done as a patriotic act to protect our beloved people." They reel backward, hands clutching chests as the full realization seems to hit them. "My God! Bowart cannot believe that our government of the people, by the people, and for the people would use such loathsome forces against citizens. If such research was done (or was not done) then it would be for purely abstract research reasons -- for the expansion of human knowledge."

W.H. Bowart's book is also a freezing vision of the mutations of the aspirations of science. Scientists, educators, and their leaders, The Great Men, Having stumbled upon the possibility of controlling the human mind, might well have withheld this knowledge from the secret police and brought it forward for all to share, would you not say? If the means are at hand actually to enter and control the mind -- not through the far-off smoke signals of psychiatry and psychoanalysis -- can we conceive of what might be found in terms of medical triumphs, the conquest of pain and of group hatreds, and mental energy released by unraveling the Garden knots of mental perplexity to make one straight laser line that might then pierce the doubts and fears which beset each one of us? In terms of education light-years ahead of the educational means we presently employ, in basic and advanced of cultures, languages, and skills; in short, understanding each other across the face of the world, this development of Mind Control makes the invention of movable type seem like a primordial grunt from the shadows of a rain forest lost in time.

What has been achieved by the secret police in relation to mind control is scrupulously set down in W.H. Bowart's extraordinary book. The question the book puts is this: do you wish this immeasurably important technique to remain as a weapon to be used against you and your children by what Bowart calls the Cryptocracy, or do you wish to use it as a universal key to unlock a thousand new chances that your children will not be murdered in future wars?

In an epigraph to this book, Zbigniew Brzezinski measures the political probabilities of mind control use when he says, "exploiting the latest communications techniques to manipulate emotion and control reason." To day our secret police and our military establishment have demonstrated in Vietnam and elsewhere (examined by Bowart herein), the powers to create assassins out of our children. The expansion of these powers, which are able to turn young men and women into murderous criminals at will, goes on unchecked by the oft-called "investigative" press, by "moral" leaders at the bar, in the pulpits, in high government, and on campuses. Yet the people they call the public have long suspected that it has become government policy to control minds. If there is general information abroad on this subject, then consider that which must be at the disposal of the congressional investigating committees as they bugle their determination to control the powers of darkness within our secret police.

Zombie is a quaint, old-fashioned folklore word which, by its meaning, becomes obscene when our children's minds are being controlled by any one of dozens of federal secret police agencies. Have government agencies perfected methods sustained by the taxpayers to control the minds of the people who shot the Kennedy's, Martin Luther King, and Orlando Letelier, the former Chilean economist and diplomat. Were the assassins programmed to forget they did it or were they programmed to do it? We may never know for they stand bewildered, idiotically grinning for the cameras. Have the technicians developed a model Giant, Economy-Size Government Assassin which can easily be turned out by the thousands?

The murders of a few hundred humans by a few hundred other humans is commonplace enough but, for the flavor of horror and terror, of endless nightmare rampant upon a landscape of what was once American democracy, consider this expansion of the Brzezinski epigraph which cannot repeated often enough: "In the technotronic society the trend would seem to be toward the aggregation of the individual support of millions of uncoordinated citizens, easily within the reach of magnetic and attractive personalities, effectively exploiting the latest communications techniques to manipulate emotion and control reason."

The threatening state of American political leadership over the last fifteen years may seem to murmur that the "magnetic and attractive personalities" might rather not resist the destruction of democratic institutions by "effectively exploiting" these shocking gains into the control of minds. It might even be wise to consider W.H. Bowart's real evidence herein, then do what we can to protect ourselves if that proud right, with the love of freedom, has not been atrophied by "the latest communications techniques."

There is an alternative. We can all forever more be transformed into the image of Grock the clown.

THE CRYPTORIAN CANDIDATE

It may have been the biggest story since the atom bomb. The headline, however, was small and ignored the larger issue. "Drug Tests by CIA Held More Extensive Than Reported in '75," said the New York Times on July 16, 1977. What it should have said is "U.S. Develops Invisible Weapons to Enslave Mankind."

The testing of drugs by the CIA was just a part of the United States government's top-secret mind-control project, a project which had spanned thirty-five years and had involved tens of thousands of individuals. It involved techniques of hypnosis, narco-hypnosis, electronic brain stimulation, behavioral effects of ultrasonic, microwave, and low-frequency sound, aversive and other behavior modification therapies. In fact, there was virtually no aspect of human behavioral control that was not explored in their search for the means to control the memory and will of both individuals and whole masses of people.

The CIA (and the Pentagon) succeeded in developing a whole range of psycho-weapons to expand its already ominous psychological warfare arsenal. With these capabilities, it was now possible to wage a new kind of war -- a war which would take place invisibly, upon the battlefield of the human mind.

"Literature always anticipates life," Oscar Wilde said. "It does not copy it, but molds it to its purpose." By Wilde's definition, then Richard Condon's The Manchurian Candidate would appear to be literature.

Condon published his tour de force in 1958. It was the story of an American Army sergeant who was captured by the enemy during the Korean conflict and, in an improbable nine days, was hypno-programmed to murder on cue. The sergeant returned to the United States and was post-hypnotically triggered to kill by the sight of the queen of diamonds in a deck of cards. The sergeant automatically killed several people, among them a candidate for President of the United Stated. After he killed, his memory of the event was forever sealed by amnesia.

At the time The Manchurian Candidate was published few people in the world, Richard Condon included, knew that total control of the mind was possible. Condon was writing fiction; he had merely read up on popular Pavlovian conditioning manuals and imagined the rest. He had no way of knowing then that mind control had already been the subject of years of secret research within the clandestine agencies of the U.S. government. The tricks of mind control he described were employed (right down to the queen of diamonds cue) by the programmers of real political assassins who developed foolproof techniques for the control of thought, memory, emotions, and behavior.

The Manchurian Candidate brought the idea of "brainwashing" to public consciousness. Brainwashing is the use of isolation, deprivation, torture, and indoctrination to break the human will. But what the book actually described was something more than brainwashing. It was mind control: a total takeover of an individual's mind by someone else. The someone else in Condon's version was a mad Chinese psycho-scientist.

Always the satirist, Condon brought the Fu Manchu myth up to date. But, ironically, the techniques he described were first perfected and used not by the Chinese or the Communists, but by the United States.

Condon's portrait of POWs during the Korean conflict went against the accepted scientific and medical opinion of the time, which held that a man could not be made to commit a criminal act against his own will or inner moral code by any known means. Although Condon's book was not completely on target about the details of GI mind control, he did accurately describe some of the motives, coercive methodology, and psychological results of real-life mind control.

The psychological techniques described in The Manchurian Candidate had secretly become a reality a decade before Condon saw his story set in type. A decade later it appeared was as if Condon's fiction had been used as the blueprint for the creation of an army of hypno-programmed "zombies". Some were assassins prepared to kill on cue. Others were informers, made to remember minute details under hypnosis. Couriers carried illegal messages outside the chain of command, their secrets secured behind posthypnotic blocks. Knowledge of secret information was removed from the minds of those who no longer had the "need to know" -- they were given posthypnotic amnesia.

The fact is, induced amnesia had been used at least since World War Two. In the Journal of Traumatic Stress[1] we find the story of a World War two veteran who had been discharged from the service in 1947. According to Karen L. Cassiday and Judith A. Lyonns, the veteran had been treated at a V.A. hospital for Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) since the war and had enjoyed good health and a lasting relationship until he had his first cardio-vascular accident (CVA), known in layman's terms as a stroke. Then he began to recall all the memories of his intelligence service in the Pacific theater during the Second World War. In 1988 he suffered two CVA's that resulted in right side weakness, speech difficulties, loss of motor control, and disorientation to situation, time, and place. These symptoms gradually resolved and he was able to resume psychotherapy in 1989. During therapy he began to recall combat memories and details of his service as an intelligence officer for which he had previously been amnestic.

According to the journal he particularly recalled "being captured and tortured by administration of intravenous hallucinogens. He also recalled being bayoneted in the right side during hand-to-hand combat, thus explaining the scar previously noted. Newly recalled memories depicted the content of many of his nightmares and dissociative episodes... He recalled his escape and military debriefing in which he underwent hypnotic procedures to help him forget his combat experiences. Although his recall of these procedures is sketchy, he remembers that these hypnotic sessions occurred almost daily for several weeks during which time he was also given medications. These procedures focused upon helping him develop an identity and personal history that excluded intelligence service and traumatic evens... Additionally while hospitalized, (he) had a flashback in which he mistook IV (intravenous) apparatus for being bayoneted. An Asian physician observed him speaking an Asian dialect during this flashback. Collectively, these data led us to conclude that military events occurred as reported and cannot be dismissed as delusions or fabrications."

The authors noted that in this man's case, "it appears that amnesia for traumatic memories was disinhibited... His case indicates that cognitive impairment, such as that due to declining health and aging, may also impair previously successful defenses and lead to delayed PTSD (post traumatic stress disorder)."

Those who led us to believe that the intelligence agencies were searching for a "Manchurian Candidate" have to go back and rewrite their false assumptions. The fact came well before the fiction.

Most of the ordinary foot soldiers who fought in the dirty, televised Vietnam conflict were released to civilian life without debriefing. For them there was no "decompression" from the rage of war. They were released with all the reflexes of trained assassins intact. Those who had been conditioned in the black science of the war of torture, terror, and technology were debriefed with special attention. Their memories like those of the World War Two veteran mentioned in the Journal of Traumatic Stress were completely erased before they were turned out of the military that they returned to civilian life with only the minimum, fragmented knowledge of who they were or what they had done. Their memories had been smudged or removed by drugs, hypnosis, behavior modification, conditioned reflex therapy, or some other evil wonder of mind control.

During my 1978 tour promoting this book , a call came to the KPIX-TV Good Morning San Francisco Show while we were on the air. It was a retired Navy

Commander who spoke of losing his memory after being admitted to a Navy hospital after a lengthy tour of duty in which he and his "black pajama team" had assassinated "charismatic" local political leaders behind a "fixed border in Southeast Asia". In a private phone conversation later, the Commander told me that the "fixed border" was indeed that of China. "I got the flu. Almost everybody on the returning team got this heavy flu. We went to the hospital and came out with cardboard memories," he said. "It's taken me 13 years to remember what we had been doing. I'm not proud of it, and I'm afraid to talk."

I had encountered my first case of mind control in the midst of the Watergate scandal. A young man I'd known since childhood had returned from a tour of duty in the U.S. Air Force, with amnesia, remembering nothing of his service, except having had a good time. He subsequently learned, through intensive private psychotherapy, that he'd been hypnotized and conditioned. His mind had been unmade, then remade: his mind had been controlled.

I was completely fascinated by his story, but naturally, in 1973, I thought it was an isolated, single event. Then, quite by accident, a few months later, I overheard another man in my hometown telling what was essentially the same story: how he figured he'd been hypnotized and had his memory erased at a "debriefing" prior to his separation from military service.

After hearing the second story I began to wonder how many more men had their memories erased. I decided to run the following classified ad: "Researcher/writer interested in contacting anyone with knowledge of the use of hypnosis by the military, including ex-servicemen who have reason to believe they were hypnotized (or drugged) while in the service and subsequently exhibited signs of amnesia or hypermnesia (improved memory). All info held in strictest confidence..."

I placed the ad in Soldier of Fortune (a magazine which reports on the activities of mercenaries), a number of small publications aimed at hypnotists, behaviorists, neurologists and other professionals, and popular magazines such as Rolling Stone. To my amazement, I received more than a hundred replies to the ad. Many stated that they had amnesia.

Ignoring the obvious crank letters, I followed up on the others and discovered that too many were unable to say just what had caused their loss of memory. In some cases, it was obviously a result of the trauma of war -- what came to be called "the post- Vietnam syndrome." So I concentrated on those who had not seen combat but who either had high security clearances or were employed at the periphery of the intelligence services.

Letter and telephone exchanges narrowed the field down to eighteen persons who fit the pattern of the first two men who had reported their amnesia to me. All eighteen had security clearances -- and could only recall isolated events from their GI experience. I narrowed the field still further to those who remembered enough to have at least some idea, however fragmentary and incomplete, of what had happened to them.

Their stories were believable, but they shed little light on how amnesia had been induced and what behavior had been controlled. To answer those deeper questions I went to the libraries, and after two years of research I was able to find enough scientific reports and government documents to tell the whole story of what I call Operation Mind Control.

Though the documented trail of mind control extends back many decades, it was not always called by that name. The church and the state have always engaged in psycho-theology and psycho-politics, the psychological manipulation of belief, opinion, and actions for political and/or religious ends. But the complete control of the human mind was only managed in the late 1940s by the U.S. government. It had to have existed in a variety of sub-cultures throughout human history.

My research concentrated on the period from 1938 to the late sixties, the period during which I found there was an effort made by the agencies of the U.S. government to develop sophisticated techniques of psycho-politics and mind control in the modern sense (I thought).

The objective of Operation Mind Control[2] during this period has been to take human beings, both citizens of the United States and citizens of friendly and unfriendly nations and transform them into unthinking, subconsciously programmed "zombies," motivated without their knowledge and against their wills to perform in a variety of ways in which they would not otherwise willingly perform. I learn that this is accomplished through the use of a number of various techniques most of which amount to pain and trauma-based classical conditioning.

Mind control is the most terrible imaginable crime because it is committed not against the body, but against the mind and the soul. Dr. Joost A.M. Meerloo expresses the attitude of the majority of psychologists in calling it "mind rape," and warns that it poses a great "danger of total physical destruction..."

[2] Various meditation groups use the words "mind control" to describe meditation, contemplation, and self-hypnosis; all these are usually harmless if not beneficial practices. These techniques might more properly be called "mind self-control," for the individuals who use them seek control over their own minds and bodies to obtain desired effects. The mind control examined in this book is the control of one individual's mind by another, against the target's will and without their conscious knowledge.

Development of mind control was accomplished largely through the efforts of individual psychologists, psychiatrists, and chemists, working in isolated conditions under government contract. Each researcher or research team was allowed to know only what he or she needed to know to accomplish his or her fragment of the research or testing. The contracts were let through a number of government and private agencies and foundations so that the researchers were, by and large, ignorant as to the intended use of their research.

While the CIA was a major funder of the mind-control research, virtually every major government agency became in some way knowingly or unwittingly involved. While I began my research believing that a "cult of intelligence" was behind the mind-control program, I found that there is, in fact, no single originating force, but several. The operation is too widespread and complex for it to be created by a "cult." If a cult there must be, then it is a cult within a cult, in an interlocking chain of invisible mini-govermnents with unwritten rules, unwritten plans, and unwritten loyalties. It is the plan of a secret bureaucracy -- what I call a cryptocracy -- which conspires against our laws and our freedoms.

"Cryptocracy" is a compound of crypto, meaning "secret", and - cracy, meaning "rule, government, governing body." The cryptocracy, then, is the secret government whose identity and whereabouts have slowly and reluctantly been hinted at by the Congress through its investigations into Watergate, the CIA, and the rest of the intelligence community.

(The word cryptocracy is conspicuously absent from all dictionaries, even to this day. I was told by one source within the cryptocracy that this word alone was reason enough to keep this book off the market, for if, whenever the word democracy is used, the word cryptocracy is placed against it, a powerful propaganda effect takes place. As if one word alone could awaken the U.S. citizenry to the fact that their democracy was overthrown by the National Security Act of 1947.)

While the CIA, near the top of the intelligence pyramid has been drawing most of the fire, the evidence of a cryptocracy clearly implicates the National Security Agency, the National Programs Office, the Defense Intelligence Agency and its subsidiaries in military intelligence, The Federal Bureau of Investigation as well as the Civil Service. The crypto-alliance has extended in an ever expanding network among private contractors and institutions and religious organizations. With the Central Intelligence in the vanguard, the cryptocracy is composed of persons operating within the office of Naval Intelligence, Army Intelligence, Air Force Intelligence, Department of Justice, Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Bureau of Prisons, Bureau of Narcotics, Atomic Energy Commission (Department of Energy), Veteran's Administration, General Services Administration, National Science Foundation, and even major American corporations, especially certain airlines, oil companies, and aerospace contractors.

The cryptocracy invades the privacy of citizens and corporations. It meddles, often violently, in the internal politics of foreign nations, and has hired, trained, and equipped mind-controlled assassins for the murder of heads of state. The cryptocracy may have been involved in attempts to control U.S. elections. It controls key figures in the U.S. and world press.

When CIA Director Robert M. Gates publicly promised "a greater openness and sense of public responsibility" at the intelligence agency in April of 1992, he was acting on the recommendations of a special task force that had studied ways to make the agency more visible, credible and responsive to the outside world. But when "Task Force Report on Greater CIA Openness" was submitted to Gates, it was stamped "Secret." CIA officials refused to disclose any of the report.

After receiving a public scolding at a House hearing, Gates approved the declassification of almost the entire report. Significantly, the report touted the accomplishments of the agency's existing "media program:"

> PAO (the Public Affairs Office of the CIA) now has relationships with reporters from every major wire service, newspaper, news weekly and television network in the nation. This has helped us turn some 'intelligence failure' stories into 'intelligence success' stories, and it has contributed to the accuracy of countless others.
> In many instances, we have persuaded reporters to postpone, change, hold or even scrap stories that could have adversely affected national security interests or jeopardized sources and methods.[3]

The story within the story, I discovered, is an astonishing one of a psychological war waged by this U.S. cryptocracy against the American people. The scientific reports and histories place the story in time, and at the government's door. However, the literature of the cryptocracy ignores the very real human factor. There is no written record of the mental anguish, the torture to the soul that comes from loss of memory and the resulting identity crisis. That mental anguish is the story of mind control.

The stories that follow are told by the failures of Operation Mind Control -- failures because the victims remember something; for where mind control is successful there is no memory left.

(Due to editorial considerations, many of the stories I uncovered have been left on the editing room floor. Each individual in this book stands for and tells the story of many victims of mind control. In many cases the individuals I interviewed believed their lives or sanity would be in danger if their names were made public. Others wanted their names mentioned. I have, for a variety of reasons, chosen to withhold real names and places whether requested or not. Except in these details, the first-person stories in this book are completely true, and in this edition I have risked committing the literary crime of redundancy so that the researcher can get a more well-rounded sense of the varieties of the mind control experience as described by several individuals. A video documentary is now in progress which shows many heartbreaking moments of abreaction from victims of mind control which could not be included in this book.)

[3] Washington Post National Weekly, May 3, 1992.

One of the characters in The Manchurian Candidate described his recurring dream that resulted from the suppression of memory. "It's not so much that I can't sleep. It's more that I'd rather not sleep. I'm walking around punchy because I'm scared. I keep having the same nightmare..." The nightmare Condon's hero described was actually the memory of having killed on cue. On stage, before an audience of Communist mind controllers, he strangled one of his fellow soldiers with a scarf, and blew out another's brains with a high-powered pistol at point blank range. Several of the men I interviewed had dreams which could have been written by Condon.

Tex was an army sergeant stationed in the Mediterranean area. He came back from service with amnesia. But in his dreams a vivid scene was replayed again and again: "In the dream my buddy -- I know him real well, We've shared things together -- my buddy is taken with his hands behind his back. I'm standing in rank in a line of other soldiers and we are like a firing-squad. I keep thinking I won't shoot my friend, I'll turn the rifle on the commander. But we don't have rifles.

"My buddy is marched into an open area in front of us with his hands tied behind his back. He is blindfolded and some Ay-rab is talking to him or reading to him. Another Ay-rab comes up and hits him behind the knees with a rifle butt and he falls to a kneeling position. "Then, while he's on his knees, one of the Ay-rabs takes a big sword and cuts his head off. His neck squirts blood, but surprisingly little... his head rolls on the ground. His face has a peaceful expression. His body twitches and squirms like a chicken. That's when I always wake up..."

In their sleep, the memories of atrocities surface to vivid awareness among the victims of mind control. Night after night terrible images, suppressed by deeply conditioned responses, emerge as terrifying nightmares. Are they mythological? The stuff of dreams? Or are they recovered memories? Tex's dream is a mere fragment of many thousands of pages of such testimony.

ONLY ONE MIND FOR MY COUNTRY

Through the gray waters of amnesia he drifted, coming back from blind coma. First the echoes, like electronically amplified voices speaking from a deep, deep well... then, far off, the dim pink molecules of light...

David's body lay still in the military hospital bed. Only his eyes rolled beneath the lids. For several hours he lay that way, perfectly still -- just eyes fluttering. The fluttering became more intense. Then his eyes opened.

"When I woke up," David said, "I couldn't remember anything. I couldn't remember how I'd gotten there or why I was in the hospital."

He asked nurses and aides why he was there. They told him he'd have to ask his doctor. When David finally saw him, the doctor said, "You tried to commit suicide."

That came as a great surprise to David. He didn't think he was the suicidal type. He asked the doctor how he'd tried to commit suicide.

"You took an overdose of Sleep-eze," the doctor told him.

David knew that Sleep-eze was a patent medicine, that it was related chemically to an antihistamine, and that it could produce drowsiness; but David also knew it was not nearly as dangerous as a prescription sleeping pill. Although he began to sense that something was fishy, he did not challenge the doctor, nor did he let on that he suspected the story to be untrue. For the next several days he simply lay in the hospital bed puzzling over the odd chain of events that had landed him there.

I interviewed David several times over a period of two years. Each interview produced additional information as David's memory returned in fragmented, isolated bursts. The following is taken from thousands of pages of transcript and has been edited so that the tedious process which uncovered David's memories is absent. It is slightly misleading only in that David did not remember his story in one continuous sequence. Nor did the other victims quoted in this book.

David had joined the U.S. Air Force in 1969. During his high school years the draft had still been in effect, and after graduating on the honor roll, David decided to attend a small community college to get as much education as he could before his name was inevitably called by selective service.

As his induction date approached David realized he could obtain a deferral from the draft because of his high scholastic standing, but he decided instead to take a break from education and fulfill his military obligation as profitably as he could. Although he questioned America's reasons for fighting, he did feel that military service was his duty.

David had not been a part of the sixties "revolution." He had never smoked marijuana nor taken LSD, nor had he demonstrated against the war in Vietnam like so many of his friends. He was a studious, intelligent young man who was not inclined to rebellion. He was described by friends and family as one possessed of unusual common sense. In keeping with his cautious and practical nature he negotiated a "contract" for medical corps service with his local air force recruiter and enlisted for a four year tour of duty, thinking this would help him fulfill his ambition to become a doctor.

After an uneventful in-processing, David was sent to Lackland Air Force Base for the usual six weeks basic training, and then on to a technical school for another six weeks of special training. But when the time came for his job assignment, to his great disappointment, he was assigned to the supply corps rather than the medical corps.

He felt betrayed by the air force, and immediately after receiving his AFSC job assignment number, he retired to his barracks to rehearse a protest to his commanding officer. Moments later, a nonuniformed man entered the empty barracks and asked him to step outside and take a walk. David was puzzled but went along without comment.

When the two had reached a quiet spot on the base, the man told David that he guessed he was disappointed about receiving the AFSC of a "box pusher" in a supply warehouse. David was surprised by the man's knowledge of his situation. Before he could reply, the man told David that the AFSC was just a cover, that he had actually been chosen to work in a sensitive area of intelligence.

The assignment sounded glamorous to David, and lifted his sagging spirits. He immediately decided to go along with the change of plans and accept the special assignment without protest. The unidentified man told David to be patient, and to learn well the special techniques of computer programming he would be trained in while waiting for his security investigation to be completed.

Within a few weeks David was issued a top-secret crypto-security clearance and assigned to the air base at Minot, North Dakota. At Minot, he continued to feed supply numbers into a computer, developing his already excellent memory. He did his job well and soon he received a letter of commendation and was promoted to sergeant.

But for all his accomplishments, he had begun to grow restless. Although he knew his computer programming was just a cover for intelligence work, he was still not satisfied with air force life.

"I was beginning to not like the extreme regimentation and, I suppose, inside myself I was beginning to build up a resentment about being there.

"But after I woke up in the Hospital I was not resentful. I was passive. I lay there thinking, trying to recall the last memories I had before I woke up in that bed. I didn't remember anything. It was like I'd been asleep for my entire life up to that point. Like I was Rip Van Winkle.

"The memories of what had happened I did recover over a period of time. But they were fuzzy at first. It seemed like somebody was violating me -- raping my mind.

"I was strapped down in the bed. I was yelling and screaming about something. I'm not the type of person that cusses that much. I hardly ever use foul language, but I know that I said some pretty foul things to those men who were with me. They were officers, and in the service you can't call a superior officer an obscene name without getting punished. Yet I don't think I was ever reprimanded.

"One guy would ask me questions in an accusatory manner. Another guy would come over and say comforting things. The first guy would come back and accuse me again. Then the second guy would come and pat my arm and be friendly. I could remember their faces and their tone of voice, but I couldn't remember the content of what they were talking about."

David thought about his situation; suppose he had tried to commit suicide. He probably would be kicked out of the service. At best he might be given a medical discharge, so he began to prepare himself for that eventuality. He thought he wouldn't mind getting out of the service under any circumstances, even with a psychological discharge.

It didn't happen. Instead, David was visited by men in civilian clothes who told him that he'd been chosen for a special intelligence assignment. They said the details of his assignment could not be revealed until the proper time, and then he would not be allowed to talk to anyone about it. They said he would be receiving his orders soon.

"I had expected at least to have some stripes taken away for the suicide attempt," David said. "Instead, five different sets of orders came down. They were all typed military orders, regular orders, but they had me going to five different places at once. It was impossible.

"I took the orders to headquarters and told them that somebody had goofed. It was plain to see that somebody had screwed up. The way the military runs, it was not unusual. No one got excited about it. The guys in the office said that they would straighten it out.

"Then I was told that I had two weeks leave coming. They ordered me home to wait while they got my orders straightened out."

Happy to get a break after eighteen continuous months of military life without leave, David went home.

"I was hoping they'd forget all about me, I was praying that this time the computer would completely lose me."

The first evening at home something compelled David to break security. Alone with his mother, he told her that he knew he had not really attempted suicide.

"I suppose that my first duty was to my family, and my second duty was to my country. After I'd discharged my moral duty to my mother, I was free to obey my government's wish and not remember anything about it. That's probably how it worked, in spite of their programming."

After David had been at home for the full two weeks, and was just beginning to think that maybe the computer had lost him after all, a telegram came. There were no written orders, no official seals, just a Western Union telegram ordering him to report to a base in northern California and from there to embark to the Far East on overseas duty. There were numbers on the face of the telegram, but at the time David gave them no special notice. These numbers may have been an assignment authorization, for seldom are servicemen sent overseas on the strength of a telegram alone.

"When I got to the base in California, I showed them the telegram and the air police hustled me to another airplane and flew me to Guam."

On the plane to Guam, David ran into an airman he'd known at Minot. The airman's name was Max. Like David, Max had been attached to the supply wing at Minot, but he had been in a different type of supply operation.

In all the time they were together on Guam, David never learned the details of Max's assignment. Both of them were supposed to be supply men, but David thought Max had some pretty unusual qualifications for a supply man: for instance, he held a fifth- degree black belt in karate.

"Max and I had checked into the barracks when we got there, but after preliminaries we were put on a bus and taken to an isolated place eight miles outside the base. There were six L-shaped barracks set up inside a high electrified fence with barbed wire at the top. Inside the compound there was a movie theater, a store, a barbershop, a chow hall, and a recreation center. There were several hundred guys living in that compound.

"We could leave anytime we wanted. All we had to do was show the proper credentials to the air police at the gate. The compound seemed to be regular air force. The place was called Marbo, and as far as I could tell, there were guys there who had all sorts of different functions in the air force, but nobody really discussed their jobs.

"Several of the guys at Marbo had been in the supply wing in North Dakota. But at Marbo they were working in other areas... In other words, guys who'd been in the supply wing in North Dakota were in the civil engineers or the air police. One air policeman on Guam, I remember, had been shoving around boxes just like other supply men when he was at Minot. Suddenly now he was an air policeman. I couldn't figure it out, and I wasn't about to ask questions.

"I guess we all assumed that we were all on special assignment, and I'm pretty sure that if I'd asked any one about it, they would have avoided an answer. I certainly would have, if somebody had asked me."

David made rank fast in the air force. He was a good airman, a good supply man. Yet anybody he talked to about supply duties didn't know what he was talking about. His duties weren't like the others.

"My air force file shows that the first three digits of my AFSC are 647. A 647 is some kind of a box pusher. Yet, I never pushed a box all the time I was in the air force."

After their tour of duty, Max and David returned home together on the same plane. At the airport Max was called over the intercom and went off to answer the page. Two air police returned for his luggage and David did not see Max until after he was separated from the service for some months. Then it was a strange meeting.

David was walking down the streets of Disneyland and his eye fell on Max walking toward him in the crowd. David was delighted to see his old buddy again, but Max was strangely distant. "He didn't seem very interested in our reunion." David said, "He shook hands with me, and I began to talk, but he seemed kind of passive. I wanted to sit down and tell all the things that had happened to me since we last saw each other, but Max didn't want to talk. He cut me short, said good-bye and left.

"That's something that's always puzzled me. How can a guy who was your constant companion for so many months, a guy who has fought for you and gotten to know you inside and out, not want to talk to you? How could he have just brushed me off like that?

"When I first got out of the service, all I could remember about my four years was that I'd had a lot of fun. I mean, all the pictures I have, and all the recollections I had, were of Max and Pat and I having fun, skin diving, laying on the beach, collecting shells, walking in the jungle. It never dawned on me until later that I must have done something while I was in the service."

Pat was a young woman from the Midwest who was assigned to serve as David's secretary. Almost instantly, when they met on Guam, they fell in love.

"Pat was something special. She was everything I would have ever dreamed of in a woman. I suppose she felt that I was everything that she wanted in a man. It didn't take long for us to go to bed after we met, and from then on, throughout my tour of duty Max, Pat, and I were inseparable."

David was not talking about a menage a trois. Max was not attracted to Pat nor she to him. They all held each other to be good friends, but David and Pat's feelings for each other were the strongest.

David now thinks it odd that the three of them got along so perfectly from the first moment they met. Max was David's kind of man, and Pat was David's kind of woman. In the years that have passed since he got out of the air force, David has come to believe that Max and Pat and he were matched up by a computer. "We hit it off from the start. We had the same interests, we were nervous about the same things, and we would laugh at the same kind of jokes. We were three individuals who were very close and where one lacked a quality another had something that filled that lack.

"The air force takes your psychological tests -- your cumes -- the cumulative progress reports which have been kept on just about every individual in the United States from the first grade through high school. These records have your IQ, your aptitude tests, and all the things they accumulate on you through your school years... they give them a complete examination to determine your psychological profile and everything about your likes and dislikes. They feed selected information, any information they are looking to match up, into a computer and run yours with other people's until they have a psychological match.

"In spy books I've read, undercover agents sent to foreign countries are usually teamed with a spy of the opposite sex. Even if two people are both married and have left families at home, the directors of intelligence usually send along someone who can take care of the natural human sexual needs of the other without risking a breach of security. That way, no horny agent is going to have to associate with a prostitute or someone who might turn out to be a double agent or counterspy.

"I'd talk with the other guys in the service and they'd talk about getting laid in Hong Kong or Japan or Korea. I didn't have to talk about anything. I didn't have to brag, I'd just smile at them, secure in my love for Pat."

David said that there were several other women in the barracks who, like Pat, were secretaries but had security clearance. And, as was the case with Pat, many of them also had close relationships with the men to whom they had been assigned.

Two months before their tour of duty was to expire David and Max were sent home. Pat stayed behind on Guam. But David and Pat arranged to meet once they were both out of the service. They exchanged home addresses, but somehow David lost hers and he is strangely unable to remember her last name or even the town from which she'd come. David never saw Pat again.

"Looking back on it, it looks like it was awfully convenient. Pat was a liberated woman, she knew exactly who she was. And that's just the kind of woman I like to have around. She fulfilled every need that I ever had, to such a degree that it's a problem now. I can't meet a girl that's as good as she was. When you've been in paradise, it's hard to find paradise again. You always want to go back.

"I think of her all the time, but I just can't remember her last name. It's a total blank. I just can't remember."

During the entire thirteen-hour flight home David had to debrief himself into a tape recorder while sitting between two air policemen. He doesn't remember what he talked about. No one was "questioning" him; he just talked.

Upon his return, he was assigned to a base in California. Immediately upon reporting for duty, he found that he no longer had a security clearance. His job was to answer telephones on the base and to listen to complaints. He'd take calls from the wives of air force personnel and relay their complaints to the proper channels. That's all he did during his entire last year of service.

"When it came time to get processed out, I wanted to get the medals I earned when I was stationed in Guam. They were actually theater ribbons. I had so many ribbons when I left Guam that the officer I reported to told me not to wear them because I would attract attention to myself.

"During the out-processing they brought out my file. They do that regularly every year anyway. They show you your records and have you go over them and make sure that they're correct. Then you sign a paper that states the records have been approved by you. The last time I was shown my records, they'd been changed. Instead of all the typed, dog-eared reports that were in my file before, there was this clean computer print-out.

"I asked the officer in charge what had happened to the notices of my being awarded those theater ribbons. He told me that since I had such a high security clearance some of the things that were in my files made it necessary to expunge a lot of the information from the record. He said that there was a top-secret file on me which was available to people who had the right clearances. The file he had me approve was the one which would be shown to anyone who did not have the highest clearances. He said that because this was more or less a public record, it could not have anything on it of a sensitive nature. It was very misleading, that report. It looked like I had been a supply man, a box pusher, and I'd done nothing else, except try to attempt suicide. The phony hospital story was in the report -- so deniability was built in.

"Then I went through the normal out-processing and went home. All I can say is that everybody, my folks, my friends, everyone who'd known me before, noticed how changed I was. I was fearful and under tight control."

David decided that he would first reorient himself to the civilian pace of life and then look for a job. But when he began to look for employment, he suddenly realized that he had some deep psychological problems.

At his first job interview, he was routinely asked to fill out the company's job application form. He sat down at a desk and started writing. He wrote his name and noticed that his hands were sweating. As he began to enter his address his heart began pounding so loudly it was audible. He became short of breath and felt like the walls were closing in. He fought to remain calm, but within a few moments he snatched up the form and bolted out the door.

That evening he discussed the strange physical effects that had come over him with his parents. They assured him he was probably just very anxious about getting the job.

The next day he went on another interview. Again he was asked to fill out a job application. This time he got further in filling out the form: he put down his name... address... date of birth... Social Security number... health information... but when he came to the place in the form which required work information about the past four years, the pounding in his ears, the shortness of breath and the terrifying feeling of being confined in a small space came over him again, and he left the building with the form wadded up in his hand.

Over the next few months David applied for many jobs. The results were always the same. He could not overcome the terror that gripped him whenever anyone asked him for information about how he had spent the last four years.

David's parents suggested that he try to get a job working with computers and take advantage of the training that the air force had given him. The mere mention of computers made him fly into a rage. "I still couldn't face whatever it was that was blocking me. To this day, I can't stand the thought of a computer. I'd like to smash them all up. I realize, of course, that is irrational."

David remained hopeful that whatever was causing his anxiety would pass with time. Meanwhile, he decided to go back to college. He had no trouble getting into a major university since his high school and community college grades were high, and no one asked him for details of his service years. But during his first semester he encountered the same blocks that had kept him from getting a job.

"In my psychology course you had to get up in front of a circle of people and talk. You had to bare your soul. I just couldn't do it. I couldn't stand up and be calm and let people question me. They were all harmless questions, but I'd get the pounding heart, the sweaty palms, the shortness of breath and the feeling of claustrophobia again. I'd just clam up and leave the room."

It was then that David understood that he could no longer face the problem by himself. He sought out a psychiatrist who'd been recommended by a friend.

"The first psychiatrist I went to was male. He had used hypnotherapy with me, and he found me to be a very easy subject. I'd go into a trance at the drop of a hat. But whenever he tried to regress me -- saying, 'I want you to go back' -- I'd just bring myself out of the trance, even if it was a deep trance. My heart would be pounding, my palms would be sweating, and I'd feel the same claustrophobia I'd felt whenever I'd confronted those application forms."

David found that he was much more relaxed with his second psychiatrist, a woman named Alice. Alice was also more successful with hypnotherapy. David would go into a trance quickly and deeply, yet whenever Alice tried to regress him to his air force period, he would bring himself out of the trance as he had done previously. But she found that by regressing David to his childhood and approaching the air force period from earlier years, remembering was less difficult for him.

"At first she tried to have me relax. She talked in a very soothing voice, telling me to close my eyes. I felt like I was surrendering to her. It was easy to get me into a light trance. I laid down my defenses and was going deeper and deeper, but as soon as she said, 'Now we're going to go back,' I sat straight up and was wide awake.

"Alice couldn't get over how fast I went under. One time, she said, she was just talking to me and her voice put me completely under when she wasn't even trying. I was highly suggestible.

"But whenever she'd say, 'Let's go back,' all the muscles in my neck would strain, and I would grip the arms of the chair until my knuckles turned white. Once I was holding a piece of paper in my hand, and when I came out of hypnosis, the paper was completely soaked with sweat. Only a minute after she'd said, 'We're going to go back,' I was wide awake.

"Alice never did succeed completely with hypnosis, but something must have been released because of her attempts. As soon as we were able to go back to the usual talking technique of psychotherapy, I started talking about my childhood. I'd never thought that much about it, I guess, but I couldn't remember much of my childhood. For instance, my grandfather had died when I was fourteen and he had lived with us. Everyone says he and I were very close, But I had no mental picture of him at all. That's when Alice started trying to get me to remember my childhood. I don't know if I remembered my childhood before I went into the service or not. It seems like I did, because it wasn't a problem, but to this day, still, I can't remember much, and everything before the age of ten is completely blank.

"Alice and I kept working. At first, the memories we recovered were all painful memories. Alice thought that this was most unusual. Usually people remember the pleasurable things first. Then she tried to get me to remember only painful experiences. And once I'd remembered a lot she started trying to get me to remember the pleasurable ones."

David and Alice continued to work with standard psychiatric techniques and with hypnosis. Finally, after sixteen months of three sessions a week, Alice asked David to make a choice.

"We probably can penetrate the blocks around your air force years and find out how they were planted and why, but it may take a long time. On the other hand, we can work on every other area and get you to function normally without anxiety reactions whenever anyone asks you about those years," Alice said. "Now you have to decide if you just want to function normally, or if you want to unravel the whole mystery and find out who did it, why it was done, and what they have hidden from your own mind."

Since the therapy had nearly depleted his family's savings, David knew what the answer must be. He told Alice he would be content to just function normally. After two more months of treatment, Alice and David had their last session.

"After two hundred and six therapy sessions, Alice and I had one eight-hour session which more or less recapped all the information we had collected. She told me that when I first came in I'd talked in a monotone. I was very, very, controlled, I showed no emotions and had no inflection in my speech. I'd talked to her for the first three months that way. She said there was a wall that she couldn't break down... Alice recommended that I continue working on my own by going to group therapy.

"I went to a couple of sessions, but when I got in front of a group I became fearful again. It was more than just stage fright, it was a horrible feeling. I still have it when I get up in front of a group to be asked questions.

"Alice did not figure out what this was about. I am now beginning to, but figuring something out is one thing, and actually overcoming it is another."

Alice's expert guidance and her deft use of hypnotherapy were helpful. While he did not recover his memory at once, in time David began to remember isolated events. He is now able to reconstruct a picture of at least some of the things he did while in hypno-service to his country.

"One day I had a vivid dream. Then it was like, little by little, memory cells exploding in my brain. I began to remember certain incidents. At first I didn't know if these were real memories or just dreams. Today, I still don't know if they are accurate or not, but they are so real in all their details that I believe they are the truth. Naturally when you've had amnesia you're not really going to trust your memories at first, but if the memories settle in -- if you can recall more and more detail about an event -- you know that you are recalling a true event.

"The most vivid memory I have is about Vietnam. I was standing at a long table on a beach. There were North Vietnamese soldiers sitting on one side and American officers sitting on the other. Everyone was in uniform. Our men were from the air force, navy, and marines. The marines had sidearms , and no one else had a weapon.

"What horrified me was that out in the harbor, off shore at some distance from the beach, was one of our battleships, and another battleship or gunboat. I guess that it was Vietnamese or Russian, but I'm not expert at naval craft identification. All I know is I was terrified because the big guns on the ships were trained, not on each other, but on us... I guess they were prepared to blow us all up should anything go wrong on the beach, or should there be a double cross.

"We had our interpreters, who were air force men. They did the translating and our officers waited for the translations. The discussion was very heated, but for some reason I remember vividly, nothing was being written down. That may have been the reason that I was standing there at one end of the table. I remember that they had been trying somewhere along the line, to get me to have total recall. I can't remember the details, or the progression of events.

"I know that I had memory training. At Marbo, for some reason, I'd get up three hours earlier than anyone else and report to somewhere I can't remember and then go to work at eight-thirty. I remember riding the bus from Marbo to the base on Guam, and I was the only one on the bus. But I can't remember where I went before I reported for regular duty.

"I suspect that the computer work was part of the memory training, but I can't say that's exactly what it was. There must have been more to it. I just don't remember the details. But I have the impression that I was used as a human tape recorder.

"I do know one thing about that beach scene. When I came back from overseas, only three days after I came back it was announced that the North Vietnamese were going to give our prisoners of war back in an exchange. The meeting on the beach might have been an early parley about ending the war and exchanging prisoners. At least that's what strikes me as the best answer to the question of what that meeting was about.

"I might have been a witness. I really don't understand why -- or why the gunboats were pointing at us. I can't remember the date, or anything that places that memory in time.

"The thing that really bothers me about this whole thing is that I can sit here and talk to you, but I still can't sit down and say, 'Okay, I joined the service on such and such a day and this is what happened to me during a four-year period in chronologic ' ~~der~~ ' Ever since I got out of the service I haven't been able to give a day-by-

"I never thought about laying down my life, but maybe I laid down a lot more than my life in service to my country. My soul?"

[Sixteen years later David is still sleeping only two hours a night. He is still having nightmares, hearing voices and seeing shadows. Otherwise he functions normally. Yet, many of his symptoms are identical with the symptoms of those psychiatrists call people with Dissociative Identity Disorder.

I hadn't talked to David in, what, ten years? And now that I'd learned so much more about the survivors of Operation Mind Control, I thought I'd check in to see how he was doing. I found him fascinated with tattoos.

"Every time I see a tattoo anywhere, on anyone, I'm drawn to it," David said. "I've got to look at it. I want to find out if it's a butterfly, a rose or a..." and in 1994 we said the word together "...bluebird."

An early U. S. Army test of hypnosis circa 1940. The enlisted man is being guided in a "test" of his trance state. From the physiology of the enlisted man, it would appear that a deeply dissociated state has been achieved. Some experts who have viewed this photo suggest the subject is under the influence of "narco-hypnosis" which was the focus of a lot of the experimentation in the early mind control experiments.

THE MIND LAUNDRY MYTH

David's own assessment of his mental confusion after his air force experience was that he had not been "brainwashed." By the time David had his mind controlled, "brainwashing" had become a catchall phrase, but what David had suffered was a much more subtle and hideous form of tyranny.

George E. Smith was a POW during the early days of the Vietnam War. Unlike David, George did not have a good education. It can even be said that he was a little naive, and therefore a good candidate for brainwashing of both the American and the NLF (Viet Cong) varieties. He was one of the first of the Green Berets captured in the Vietnam conflict in 1963.

It was the practice of the U.S. Army in those days to indoctrinate its men with poorly constructed lies, which, it was hoped, motivated them to fight a war in which the U.S. had only dubious legal business and little moral argument. The "credibility gap" existed not only within the confines of the U.S. borders, but also in the far-flung fields of battle, all the way to Southeast Asia.

If brainwashing is making a person believe in lies, then our troops were already brainwashed by their own government. It was a simple job for the Viet Cong to gain the POWs' cooperation by telling them the truth -- truth which was easily documented.

Smith described the attitude which was instilled in the American soldiers by their military indoctrination: "We were arrogant... the army is a separate society; it has its own hierarchy, and I could rise to a stratum in the army that I couldn't attain in the outside world. They'd driven arrogance into us in the Airborne, which is a high level in the army, but Special Forces was the highest level you could reach, the elite of the elite. Elitism was the philosophy they taught at Bragg: 'You are professors of warfare, you shouldn't fight unless attacked. It costs thousands of dollars to train one of you and you're too valuable to send into battle.'

"I believed it. I believed every thing the army said. I never questioned anything they told me until I got to Vietnam, and then things didn't quite fit anymore."

Smith and three other men were captured in a midnight raid which followed a heavy mortar bombardment of their location. The Viet Cong took them deep into the jungles. When they reached the VC compound they were forced to build their own prison out of bamboo. Then, after the primitive compound was completed and the POWs had settled in, the interrogations began.

These were nothing like Smith had been led to expect. They were "friendly chats" with an interpreter Smith called the "Man with Glasses." Every day he would tell his prisoners about the history of Vietnam and the U.S. role in that country. "It was right out of the movies," Smith said. "The prisoner was confronted by his interrogators, who were sitting on a higher level and making him look up to them.

"Look at you," Man with Glasses began. "You are pitiful." It was a typical brainwashing tactic, designed to make the prisoner think poorly of himself, to undermine his self-image. Sergeant Smith, like many others, already had a poor self-image long before he was captured, even before he enlisted in the army. That image wasn't enhanced any by finding that the authorities to whom he had been so obedient had misinformed him.

"We had known interrogation was inevitable and had feared it for so long, but it didn't go the way it was supposed to," Smith said. "The guards were off somewhere out of sight. No one shone lights in our eyes. In fact, I sat in the shade while prevaricator (one of the interrogators) served me tea and candy and cigarettes.

"Man with Glasses did most of the talking, though he encouraged me to say anything I wanted to. He insisted on giving me their side of the story -- why they were there in the jungle and why the NLF had gotten together and was fighting the U.S. and the Saigon regime. 'We are fighting for Vietnam. We do not try to take over your country. This is not in our plans. We are worried about our country. We love it very much. We are proud people, and we want to keep our country.' Didn't I know I was wrong to be part of the United States effort in Vietnam? And if I did, would I write a statement saying so? He talked to me for about an hour, and at the end of the session he gave me a pack of the Cambodian cigarettes. 'For your enjoyment. Take them with you. When you are resting and smoking, I would like you to think deeply of what we have discussed.'

"If sitting in the shade drinking tea while I listened to this old guy talk was brainwashing, then it didn't fit any description I had ever heard. I recalled the stories I'd heard about Korea -- the scene where they hypnotize you, or drop water on your head, or put you in complete stillness -- something that will drive you out of your mind. Then once they've taken everything from your mind they start over again. When somebody says 'brainwashing,' this is what I consider they're talking about -- the classic Korean example. Or the stories that came out of there anyway."[4]

The word "brainwashing" summoned a terrifying image, but like so many other words it became corrupt in usage. It was applied to describe situations in which mere propaganda or influence were used. Indeed, the word may have been corrupt from the very beginning when it was coined by a CIA propaganda specialist, Edward Hunter. In his book Brainwashing in Red China he claimed that "Brainwashing, with the even more sinister brain changing in reverse, is the terrifying new Communist strategy to conquer the free world by destroying its mind."[5]

In the words of the noted Yale psychiatry professor Robert J. Lifton, brainwashing was popularly held to be an "all-powerful, irresistible, unfathomable, and magical method of achieving total control over the human mind."[6] It was in fact none of these things. Techniques which seemed to change the beliefs of American POWs and others behind the Iron Curtain employed no hypnosis, no drugs, no new methods for the control of the mind and certainly nothing magical.

Hunter revised Brainwashing in Red China and reissued it in 1971. In the introduction of the updated edition he continued his attack on the Communists, much as he did in his psychological-warfare journal Tactics.

"Change the word China to Cuba, and this book is a description of communist warfare against the mind -- brainwashing -- in Cuba, as well as in China. This is the world pattern the Communists employ; what might, in military parlance, be called mind attack. It is the new dimension in warfare, added to artillery attack, naval attack, rear and frontal attack, air attack. Brainwashing's dual processes of softening up and indoctrination have been added to the arsenal of warfare, girding the Trojan Horse in twentieth century accoutrements." Though Hunter may have been correct about the Communist use of coercive psychological techniques on its own populations, he never once hinted that the U.S. government might just be establishing practices employing similar techniques of its own.

In 1958, in his testimony before the House Committee on Un- American Activities (HUAC) he continued to present brainwashing as a communist weapon: "Since man began, he has tried to influence other men or women to his way of thinking. There have always been these forms of pressure to change attitudes. We discovered in the past thirty years, a technique to influence, by clinical, hospital procedures, the thinking processes of human beings... Brainwashing is formed out of a set of different elements... hunger, fatigue, tenseness, threats, violence, and in more intense cases where the Reds have specialists available on their brainwashing panels, drugs and hypnotism. No one of these elements alone can be regarded as brainwashing, any more than an apple can be called apple pie. Other ingredients have to be added, and a cooking process gone through. So it is in brainwashing with indoctrination or atrocities, or any other single ingredient.

Given the anti-Communist climate of the Cold War years, Hunter's zeal did not seem excessive, even though few of his conclusions were supported by the eyewitness accounts given by the repatriated POWs. According to them, no drugs or hypnosis were used overseas; they told only of persuasion techniques.

Hunter's Brainwashing in Red China was widely quoted. Through front page news stories, the American public became aware, for the first time, that governments (though only Communist ones were mentioned) could control people's thoughts and motivate them against their will and without their knowledge.

Two years later, in May of 1960, Francis Gary Powers was shot down over the Soviet Union and cries of brainwashing again made U.S. headlines. At his public trial in Moscow, Powers apologized to the Russian people for doing them wrong. Even though the CIA had told him that if caught, he could admit everything, the voices of the "soldiers" within the U.S. were quick to brand him a traitor, and those who were inclined to be more sympathetic said he had simply been "brainwashed."

One psychiatrist, William Jennings Bryan, who had been the head of an air force medical survival training program which employed hypnosis to prepare pilots for resistance to brainwashing, went so far as to coin a term for the subtle new technique which he thought the Soviets had developed since the Korean conflict and had used on Powers. The U-2 pilot, Bryan said, had been "Powerized."

Bryan said that Powers' apologetic manner during the Moscow trial, his submissive, almost crippled words of testimony, his trancelike acceptance, all showed an amazing personality change since his capture.

"The pilot's apparent lack of real emotion during the Moscow trial was the most startling evidence that the Russian brainwashing through hypnosis has destroyed the normal, aggressive confidence and the cockiness characteristic of the air force fliers... The big tip-off came," Dr. Bryan said, "when Powers apologized for his American assignment, testified he knew he was wrong and said he felt no ill will toward his country's Cold War enemy.

"It is no longer a secret that Russia uses hypnosis as a powerful instrument to destroy the resistance of individuals she wishes to conquer," he said. "Brainwashing hypnosis as apparently used on Powers is vastly different from the permissive type of medical hypnosis... and the self-hypnosis used by air force fliers in caring for themselves after a crash... Powers exhibited no telltale marks of physical abuse or torture during the Moscow trial, and indeed, he may have even thought himself that he was being treated rather well, but his manner and personality were obviously so unlike the typical American pilot that only a brand new type of other powerful technique could have changed his personality in so short a time."[7]

Francis Gary Powers was returned to the U.S. in 1962 in a trade for Russian spy Rudolf Abel. He wrote in his book Operation Overflight (which was withheld from publication by the CIA until 1970) that the tactic he decided upon when captured was in accordance with his CIA instructions. He said, "When questioned, I would tell the truth."

Powers insisted that he did not tell the Russians anything which he thought they did not already know. In fact he often agreed to things they suggested simply to mislead them.

As for sophisticated, "Powerizing" techniques, Powers denied their existence. He even went so far as to suggest that the Russians were actually highly overrated in their intelligence-gathering methods.

"From what I had been taught about brainwashing, I had anticipated certain things: I would be lectured about communism, given only propaganda to read. Food would be doled out on a reward-punishment basis; if I cooperated, I would be fed; if I didn't, I wouldn't. Interrogation would be at odd hours, under bright lights. No sooner would I fall asleep than I would be awakened, and it would start all over again, until eventually I lost all track of time, place, identity. And I would be tortured and beaten until, finally, I would beg for the privilege of being allowed to confess to any crime they desired. None of this happened."

Immediately after Powers crossed the bridge from East Berlin he was examined by a West German flight surgeon under orders from the CIA. The surgeon took blood from his arm. Powers says the doctor told him "the blood samples were necessary to determine whether I had been drugged. This seemed to be the first question of almost everyone to whom I talked: Had I been drugged? They seemed almost disappointed when I told them I hadn't."

Powers was then flown to the U.S. "I still couldn't comprehend that after twenty-one months of captivity I was once again a free man," he said, "which was perhaps best, for though I was yet to realize it, I wasn't quite free, not yet. In a sense, I had been released by the Russians to become a de facto prisoner of the CIA."

[7] William J. Bryan III, City News Service, (a suspected CIA asset) September, 1960.

The CIA men told Powers they would like to talk to him for a couple of days. The "couple of days" turned out to be over three weeks, in which Powers was thoroughly debriefed by a team of intelligence analysts and psychiatrists. The first question the psychiatrists asked was, again, had he been drugged by the Soviets? The second question they asked was, had he been brainwashed? When Powers answered "no" to both questions he was given tranquilizers, which were the first drugs he had received since his U-2 left Turkey for the overflight of the USSR. Powers noted with some irony, that "Americans are much more disposed to the use of drugs than are the Soviets."[8]

Perhaps even more Ironic was the public disclaimer issued by CIA Director Allen Dulles, which said the U.S. had no use for brainwashing: "What had popularly become known as 'brainwashing,' while of great psychological interest to the West, as it is important to study defensive techniques, is never practiced by us... for the simple reason that we are not interested in converting people to our way of thinking either forcibly or by trickery, which is its main intent. We have never felt, as obviously the Soviets and the Red Chinese and the North Koreans have, that there is much to gain in putting a brainwashed person on the air to denounce his own countrymen. We have enough people who come over to us voluntarily from communism and who need no prompting."[9] Dulles, it seemed, was either a reader of Hunter's or they both had been briefed by the same propaganda section of the CIA.

Brainwashing was the term the psychological warfare unit of the CIA thought up to explain why American POWs cooperated with the enemy in Korea. Brainwashing was explained as severe deprivation of food, clothing, and shelter, during which time a series of punishments and rewards were applied so effectively that a person's fundamental beliefs could be made to change 180 degrees from their original position. This brutal technique was not called torture; there was no propaganda value in something as old as torture.

The CIA thought up the term "brainwashing" to lead people in the Western world to believe that the inscrutable Orientals had again, like Fu Manchu, invented a revolutionary technique controlling the human mind. The word "brainwashing" and the official government explanation of what happened to the Korean POWs was propaganda. It was aimed at fueling a home-grown fear of the Communists upon which the Cold War so greatly depended. Propaganda, of course, was nothing more than artful deception; the careful planting of "misinformation" and "disinformation," Cold War euphemisms for what had been called "the big Lie" in World War II.

Modern propaganda began when Nazi Germany perfected the art of "the big lie." The Soviet Union and other Communist countries took the methods of the Nazis and improved upon them. The United States did not actively engage in wide-scale propaganda until World War II, when the OSS and the Office of War Information started. But then it was well understood that the guiding principles of propaganda were: "When there is no compelling reason to suppress a fact, tell it... Aside from considerations of military security, the only reason to suppress a piece of news is if it is unbelievable... When the listener catches you in a lie, your power diminishes... For this reason, never tell a lie which can be discovered."

As far back as 1940, American propaganda services had orders to tell the truth. It was a sound premise for effective propaganda, but it was a premise which was ignored by the succeeding generations of Cold Warriors.

Somewhere along the line the CIA's Covert Action Staff lost sight of the value of using the truth as the main weapon. Taking over from OSS, they soon became experts in "the big lie."

This policy surfaced to the attention of the American people during isolated events such as the U-2 incident and the Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba when Presidents Eisenhower and Kennedy took the blame for what were obviously CIA lies. In the light of recent history it would appear that these chiefs of state were somehow convinced that it was better to issue a false confession that they had lied to the nation than to admit that they had been lied to by their own intelligence agency.

In the years since the founding of the National Security Act in 1947 there were hundreds of such lies and false denials and domestic propaganda campaigns which did not immediately gain public attention.

Since the administration of Lyndon Johnson, the executive branch of government seemed to be following Machiavelli's advice: "If you don't get caught, it can't be wrong." The executive privilege, the legacy of the National Security Act -- the art of falsehood -- lies have left our history strewn with the rubble of uncovered cover-ups and stonewalls. The administrations of Nixon, Reagan and Bush lied, not because they were misled by the cryptocracy -- but because they were part of it. If they hadn't been, they probably wouldn't have been elected.

Few seemed to notice that George Bush was an intelligence agent before he was appointed Director of the CIA. That was before he was elected Vice President of the United States, during which time his hand articulated a mentally impaired puppet, a movie actor playing President, to succeed him after eight years. Through Bush the cryptocracy had its hands directly on the helm of state for twelve highly visible years.

Brainwashing, as planted in the press, was one little propaganda weapon in a vast arsenal. But it was a weapon that was supposed to be effective against communism, cropping up in news accounts whenever it was needed -- whenever the Cold Warriors' domestic covert action arm thought that the public was going "soft on Communism."

Albert K. Biderman, a senior research associate of the Rand Corporation's subcontractor, the Bureau of Social Science Research, conducted a study of the news items published about our POWs in Korea. Biderman's analysis confirmed that this kind of propaganda was "successively dominant in the press during and after the Korean War. During the war, Propaganda focused on prisoner atrocities; when the war had ended, the focus shifted to stories involving the brainwashing of POWs.[10]

"Beginning with exchanges of prisoners," he wrote, "prisoner misconduct received gradually increased attention until, several months after the war, it came to overshadow the other themes."

Throughout the Korean conflict, propaganda and counter-propaganda campaigns on both sides grew in intensity until eventually POWs became the most critical issue of the war, the "stumbling block" in the drawn-out truce talks that delayed the war's termination.

In 1953 some 4000 surviving American POWs became the subjects of another type of propaganda -- propaganda by Americans, about Americans, directed at Americans. According to Biderman, "The theme of this propaganda was that there had been wholesale collaboration by the American prisoners with their Communist captors and that this unprecedented misbehavior revealed alarming new weaknesses in our national character. This post-truce propaganda... was an outgrowth of propaganda activities during the war."

Desperately trying to believe that U.S. propaganda was motivated by good intentions, Biderman suggested that the "brainwashing theme" was pushed at home because the Cold Warriors were "apparently worried that a number of American prisoners would return espousing the Communist view." Biderman noted that "the Defense and State Departments and the Central Intelligence Agency issued a stream of press releases during the days prior to the first prisoner exchanges in Korea to prepare the public for the shock of finding that many of the POWs had been brainwashed. The theme of these releases was that evidence of Communist indoctrination or pro-Communist statements by Americans when they were released would be discounted because the prisoners would have been subjected to the well-known tortures that Communists used to brainwash their opponents."

And just what were these "well-known tortures"? the general principles of the Chinese brainwashing techniques were repetition, pacing of demands, the forced participation in classes of prisoners, propaganda which would insert Communist ideas into familiar and meaningful contexts, punishment, threats, rewards, suggestion, pleas for peace, manipulative tricks, and deprivation of all but the minimum necessities of life. There was little that was new or innovative about the techniques used by the Chinese. They did not use drugs or hypnosis, nor did they invent any mysterious new devices for breaking the mind and will of a man.

[10] Albert Biderman and Herbert Zimmer, eds., The Manipulation of Human Behavior (New York, Macmillan, 1961)

Actually the Chinese controlled information in their POW camps just as they controlled the mass media in their own country. The system they used in the camps -- propagandizing through lectures, movies, reading, and testimonials -- was based on the same system used on the Chinese population and is not without parallel in Western education and advertising practices.

Nor are the punishment-and-reward techniques used by the Chinese in their interrogations exclusively Oriental. These same practices are employed by Western intelligence agents, police, and more subtly by reporters trying to elicit information from a hostile subject. Confession and self-criticism have been used in religious movements as a basis of conversion, or as a way of perpetuating the faith, from time immemorial.

Dr. Edgar H. Schein of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology was one of many persons who contributed to the army study of the returned POWs. Of the central reason behind the brainwashing propaganda which the army study disclosed, he wrote "When things go wrong, it is far less ego-deflating to say that we have been brainwashed than to recognize our own inadequacy in coping with our problems. A crucial question, however, is whether such changes in our society and such preoccupations represent weaknesses and signal the deterioration of some of our highly valued institutions, or whether they are merely the symptoms of the changing world..."

Is this then to be a continuing trend in the so-called free world?

"...Are we becoming mentally apathetic and hence more prone to totalitarian solutions," Schein continues," or are we finding new ways in which to relate ourselves to our international and internal problems? Many observers of the contemporary scene, among them the novelist and philosopher Aldous Huxley, and Joost Meerloo, a psychoanalyst, feel strongly that we are headed squarely in the wrong direction -- that the combination of certain social forces and the weapons against the mind now available will inevitably lead to the destruction of the democratic way of life and the freedom of mind which goes with it, unless we recognize clearly what is happening and put counter-forces into operation." [Empasis added.][11]

In succeeding years, talk of "brainwashing" continued. Usually it was heard that the Communists had "brainwashed" somebody, but on April 7, 1967, presidential hopeful Governor George Romney turned that around. Romney, who had gone to Vietnam believing in the rightness of the U.S. involvement there, came home saying that he had suffered "the greatest brainwashing that anyone can get when you go over to Vietnam, not only by the generals, but also by the diplomatic corps over there, and they do a very thorough job."

[11] Edgar Schein, Journal of World Politics, April 1959.

Nine governors who had accompanied Romney on the tour disagreed with him. Governor Philip H. Hoff said that Romney's brainwashing statement "tends to be almost incredible." Finding he had no support among his colleagues, Romney quickly told reporters that he had not been talking about "Russian type brainwashing, but LBJ type brainwashing." He said he meant the same thing the press meant "when you write about the credibility gap, snow job, and manipulation of the news."

Webster's Third New International Dictionary gives the second meaning of brainwashing as "persuasion by propaganda or salesmanship," but the press and Public thought that Romney had meant the word in its first sense: "A forcible indoctrination to induce someone to give up basic political, social, or religious beliefs and attitudes and to accept contrasting regimented ideas."

And the public let it be known that it would not vote for a brainwashed presidential candidate. Romney's popularity fell so dramatically in the polls that he eventually dropped out of the race for the presidency. The word "brainwashing" proved to be more charged with emotions that anyone had supposed.

In one of the first mass market books published on the subject following the army's release of the study of the Korean POWs, Eugene Kinkead wrote, "Unfortunately, the distinction between brainwashing and indoctrination is far from clear to the average American. The army defines indoctrination as an effort to change a man's viewpoint while he is still a thinking individual by regulating his thoughts and actions. This falls far short of the effect produced upon some defendants seen in Communist courts, defendants who had obviously been completely broken, and had ceased to be thinking individuals. I am afraid that the general conception has been that Communist techniques of manipulating human beings are so persuasive, so completely irresistible that no prisoner can keep his integrity in the face of them -- and, by analogy, that no people, including ours, can stand against such an enemy. This is what distresses me so much about the popular and improper use of a word like 'brainwashing'..."[12]

Perhaps. But by 1967, when George Romney claimed he had been brainwashed, our own government was already far beyond what Kinkead referred to as "brainwashing." The United States government did not have to stoop to the slow and exhausting process the Chinese and Russians used. In the age of electronic brain stimulation, neuro-psychopharmacology, and advanced methods of behavior modification and hypnosis, the government certainly didn't have to resort to methods as unsophisticated as brainwashing.

[12] Eugene Kinkead, In Every War but One (New York, Norton, 1959)

The techniques of mind control developed, even by 1967, were making brainwashing seem like the metaphor it was: a washboard and scrub-bucket technique which had little use in a world where the sonic cleaner, with high-frequency sound, higher than the human ear can hear, vibrates the dirt from the very molecules of matter -- or the mind.

Brainwashing was largely a campaign waged in the United States home press. It served as a sharp-edged propaganda weapon and was aimed at the American people to add to the already considerable fear of the Communists. It also covered official United States embarrassment over a seeming rash of defections and collaborations with the enemy, and perhaps most important, offered moral justification for immoral and illegal experiments to scientists working under government contract. They were urged as a matter of patriotism to "beat the Communists in the mind-control race."

It is doubtful that all of the "collaborators" in the Korean conflict succumbed to brainwashing. The eyewitness testimony of air force Col. Laird Guttersen, one of the few heroes of the Vietnam conflict, and a real hero of the mind-control war, would suggest that they didn't.

Guttersen had been in charge of the air force seminar on Korean brainwashing at Maxwell Air Force Base. An expert hypnotist, he later used self-hypnosis to block pain and keep himself alive in a North Vietnamese POW camp where he spent more than twenty-seven months in solitary confinement. He took the time during his campaign for the U.S. Congress to offer me his views on brainwashing and mind control.

As early as 1956 Colonel Guttersen realized that what was called brainwashing was nothing more than psychological indoctrination. "Controlling the mind is one thing," he told me, "but remember, this does not occur with psychological indoctrination. Nor does it occur, normally, with hypnosis. The concept of complete and total mind control was projected by the brainwashing myth, and it was the theme of the book The Manchurian Candidate; but mind control is not what happened to the Korean or Vietnamese POWs. What the Chinese, the Russians, the Vietnamese did was mind influence, not mind control."

Guttersen said that while it was generally believed that brainwashing was the result of drugs and hypnosis, to his firsthand knowledge, from the Korean conflict to Vietnam, "there are no documented cases of drug- or hypnosis- induced mind control. Reading the examples of what the POWs stated in both Korea and Vietnam, and what I saw in Hanoi, there are only men saying, 'I couldn't have done those things unless I had been drugged.' There are no specific reports of anyone saying, 'They stuck a needle into me and I did so and so.' or 'They gave me something to eat, and then I did so and so.' There were men who said, 'I acted in a very strange way, just like I was in a dream or something. I must have been drugged.'"

There was a cover-up for a snafu in some of the original Korean briefings of our combatants who, Guttersen said, were told to cooperate if captured.

"I remember a specific briefing, though later it was denied, where a group of us were told that we would be well advised, if we got shot down, to whip out a bottle of vodka and a red flag and start waving it. We were advised to cooperate in any possible way with the enemy because anybody back home would know that we were cooperating under duress. We were told that if we cooperated with our captors, it would not give them an excuse to torture us. That was a specific briefing given to us. Of course, now we know that a good number of our captive men followed that advice and did collaborate on the basis that 'What the hell, nobody would ever be told to collaborate with the enemy again."

The word "brainwashing" became commonplace after the Soviet Union presented evidence before the United Nations that charged the United States with the use of germ warfare in Korea -- a major violation of the Geneva Convention. The Soviet evidence contained the confessions of several captured United States pilots stating both in documents and on film that they had dropped germ bombs on North Korea. By the time these men were repatriated their stories had changed.

Marine Corps Colonel Frank H. Schwable was the first American to sign a germ warfare confession. His confession named names, cited missions, described meetings and strategy conferences. Before a military court of inquiry Schwable said: "I was never convinced in my own mind that we in the First Marine Air Wing had used bug warfare. I knew we hadn't, but the rest of it was so real to me -- the conferences, the planes, and how they would go about their missions...

The words were mine," the Colonel continued, "but the thoughts were theirs. That is the hardest thing I have to explain: how a man can sit down and write something he knows is false, and yet, to sense it, to feel it, to make it seem real."

A CIA memo dated April 11, 1953 addressed to the Chief of CIA's Plans and Preparations, contained a report of an exchange that took place between then United Nations Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge and an unidentified CIA agent. The CIA agent began to brief Lodge on the germ warfare confessions of Schwable and others when according to the memo, Lodge interrupted expressing "...a profound distaste for the entire matter," adding that "he hoped he would never hear of it again -- it had been a nasty and difficult issue, principally because of the difficulty of explaining away the film and the statements of the American fliers..." (Emphasis added.)

The CIA memo continued with the agent reporting. "I said that we fully shared his view that 'the issue was finished in the United Nations,' but that it had been our experience that 'the bug' comes from a very hardy strain and had exhibited appalling vitality. For this reason, I said that I thought it would be a mistake to be too complacent about the matter. To the last statement Senator Lodge replied with a question as to just what explanation we could give of the statements of the American Fliers -- how did we account for this and what could be done about it? I said that our best guess was that the statements had been in one way or another forced out of the captive airmen and that one of the techniques which we thought had possibly been used was the Soviet (and now Chinese) techniques of brainwashing.' Senator Lodge said that he thought the public was very inadequately informed about 'brainwashing' and that in the absence of a much larger quantity of public information than now exists on the subject, the impact of the fliers' statements is terrific. I replied by stating that we shared his view and pointed out that the Department of Defense is expected to issue a lengthy statement..." (Emphasis added.)

Shortly thereafter, the word "brainwashing" was on the front page of every paper in America. We had not used germ warfare, CIA propaganda claimed, the Communists had used brainwashing.

Marine Sgt. Frank H. Schwable was the first American to confess to his North Korean and Chinese captors that the U.S. had dropped germ bombs in the Korean War (which was true). Thus, because of the CIA's successful coverup, he was the first person in the world to be "brainwashed" – a propaganda term coined for the occasion by Edward Hunter.

WITHOUT KNOWLEDGE OR CONSENT

"I can hypnotize a man -- without his knowledge or consent -- into committing treason against the United States," boasted Dr. George Estabrooks in the early 1940s.

Estabrooks, chairman of the Department of Psychology at Colgate University, was called to Washington by the War Department shortly after Pearl Harbor. Since he was the ranking authority on hypnosis at the time, they wanted his opinion on how the enemy might be planning to use hypnotism. "Two hundred trained foreign operators, working in the United States," Estabrooks told the military leaders, "could develop a uniquely dangerous army of hypnotically controlled Sixth Columnists."[13]

At that time, only a handful of men knew of the government's experiments with hypnosis for the purpose of controlling minds in the interest of "national security." In that decade there had been no concentrated assassinations of presidents, candidates, or civil rights leaders. There had not yet been Watergate, nor any disclosures of government agencies invading the privacy of the United States citizens. The CIA had not yet been conceived, and even its parent, the Office of Strategic Services (OSS), did not exist.

It was unthinkable at the time that an agency of the U.S. government would employ mind-control techniques on its own people. Therefore it was natural for George Estabrooks to believe that if Americans were threatened by hypnotic mind control, the threat would be posed by a foreign enemy working within the United States.

So in 1943 Estabrooks sounded his public alarm, and planted the seed for what would become priority top-secret research for the next twenty-five years. Couching his disclosure in hypothetical terms and saying that the hypnotized mind "could be" put to military use, he then portrayed a scene which he said could "very easily take place."

It would be possible, he said, for "the enemy" to plant a foreign agent as a doctor in a hospital or his own office. This "doctor" could, by means of fake physical examinations, place thousands of people under his power over a period of time. Estabrooks projected how, by hypnotizing key officers and programming them to follow suggestions, this "masked maneuver" could enable a lowly first lieutenant to take-over the reins of the entire U.S. Army.

[13] George Estabrooks, Argosy, February, 1950.

His alternate scenario depicted the General Staff summoning a colonel from Intelligence to an emergency meeting in the pentagon two days after an outbreak of war. Shortly after entering the room where Pentagon "brain trusters" were gathered, the colonel is put into hypnotic trance by an army psychologist and told there has been a change of plans for the defense of major territory. The details of the plan have to be conveyed in absolute secrecy to the pacific command. Since the enemy has been very successful in monitoring U.S. communications, a new highly reliable procedure is needed to slip the message past the enemy. The colonel, under the influence of hypnosis, will carry the top-secret message.

"When you wake up, the hypnotized colonel is told, "you will no longer have the slightest knowledge of the secret information carried in the lower layers of your mind." The colonel is then given instructions to proceed by airplane to Honolulu. He is told that in his normal waking state he will hold the impression that he is on a routine mission and must report after his arrival to General Y.

"He is the only man in the world who can hypnotize you again. Put to sleep by General Y. -- and only him -- you will correctly recall all the details of this conversation and disclose the secret instructions we have just given you."

Estabrooks said later he had given the pentagon episode only as a practical example of how the new science of hypnotism could be used for military purposes.

Going even further with his alarming predictions, Estabrooks told how disguised techniques of hypnosis could be employed to create an entire army of saboteurs within our own country. "Let us suppose that in a certain city there lives a group of a given foreign extraction. They are loyal Americans but still have cultural and sentimental ties to the old country. A neighborhood doctor, working secretly for a foreign power, hypnotizes those of his patients who have ties favorable to his plans. Having done this he would, of course, remove from them all knowledge of their ever having been hypnotized.

"Next comes a one-month period of indoctrination under hypnosis. By various means, including the offer of substantial rewards and educational processes designed to strengthen their ancestral loyalties, their cooperation is obtained."

Estabrooks explained how individuals so controlled would have no conscious aversion to Americans and would continue to behave as good citizens. Subconsciously, however, they would be saboteurs and agents of the enemy.

"All right you say. This sounds beautiful on paper. But what about the 'well-known psychological principle' that no one will do anything under hypnosis that he wouldn't do when he's awake?" Estabrooks asked.

"My experiments have shown this assumption is poppycock. It depends not so much on the attitude of the subject as on that of the operator himself... In wartime, the motivation for murder under hypnosis doesn't have to be very strong," Estabrooks warned.

"During World War I, a leading psychologist made a startling proposal to the navy. He offered to take a submarine steered by a captured U-boat captain, placed under his hypnotic control, through enemy mine fields to attack the German fleet. Washington nixed the stratagem as too risky. First, because there was no disguised method by which the captain's mind could be outflanked. Second, because today's technique of day-by-day breaking down of ethical conflicts brainwashing was still unknown.

"The indirect approach to hypnotism would, I believe, change the navy's answer today. Personally," Estabrooks concluded, "I am convinced that hypnosis is a bristling dangerous armament which makes it doubly imperative to avoid the war of tomorrow."[14]

George Estabrooks may have greatly contributed to the U.S. government's interest in hypnosis. For during the years that followed, seeking ways both to improve the mind and to control it, various government agencies, many of them with intelligence functions, secretly pursued research in hypnotic techniques.

A number of related events during the 1940s demonstrated the extent of the government's interest in hypnosis. Beyond changing beliefs, they sought ways to motivate people to commit acts which they would not commit in a normal state.

Dr. Bernard C. Gindes wrote of an amnesia experiment he undertook for the U.S. Army in the late forties. "A soldier with only a grade school education was able to memorize an entire page of Shakespeare's Hamlet after listening to the passages seven times. Upon awakening, he could not recall any of the lines, and even more startling was the fact that he had no remembrance of the hypnotic experience. A week later he was hypnotized again. In this state, he was able to repeat the entire page without a single error. In another experiment to test the validity of increased memory retention, five soldiers were hypnotized en masse and given a jumbled code consisting of twenty-five words without phonetic consistency. They were allowed sixty seconds to commit the list to memory. In the waking state, each man was asked to repeat the code; none of them could. One man hazily remembered having had some association with a code, but could not remember more than that. the other four soldiers were allowed to study the code consciously for another sixty seconds, but all denied previous acquaintance with it. During rehypnotization, they were individually able to recall the exact content of the coded message."[15]

[14] Estabrooks, Hypnotism, 3d ed. (New York, Dutton, 1944)

In 1947, J.C. Watkins induced criminal behavior in deeply hypnotized subjects during another army experiment. Watkins suggested a distorted view of reality to his subjects by inducing hallucinations which allowed them to avoid direct conflict with their own moral concepts. He carefully chose his suggestions to be in line with his subjects' pre-existing motivational structures, and so was able to induce so-called antisocial behavior.

Watkins took a normal, healthy army private, a young man whose tests indicated a most stable personality, and put him in a deep trance. Though merely striking a superior officer is a court- martial offense in the army, Watkins wanted to see if he could get his subject to strangle a high ranking officer.

After the subject was deep into trance, Watkins told him that the officer sitting across from him was a Japanese soldier who was trying to kill him. He must kill or be killed, Watkins suggested, and immediately the private leapt ferociously at the officer and grabbed him by the throat. In his waking state, the private would have been aghast at the thought of trying to strangle a superior officer. But under hypnosis, believing the officer was a dangerous Japanese soldier, the young private had to be pulled off his superior by three husky assistants. The officer came within a hairsbreadth of being strangled, as the young man was most persistent in his attempt to kill what he regarded as the enemy.

Watkins repeated this experiment with other subjects. The second time he used two officers who were good friends. One of them was given the hypnotic suggestion that the other was a Japanese soldier and that he must "kill or be killed." the man who had received the command not only made a powerful lunge at his friend, but as he did he whipped out and opened a concealed jack knife, which neither the doctor, his assistants, nor his friend knew he had. Only the quick action of one of the assistants, who was a judo expert, prevented a potentially fatal stabbing.

In both cases, reality was so distorted that the subjects took murderous and antisocial action. If they had accomplished their "defensive" acts, both men could have been convicted of murder, since the law did not recognize motivation through hypnosis as a fact. The courts, in all but a few cases, had adopted the traditional scientific view that criminal behavior cannot be induced under hypnosis. That view still stands today.

To test the premise, which was then widely held, that a normal person under hypnotic trance could not be made to divulge information which would be self-incriminating, Watkins conducted a number of experiments where a monetary bribe was offered to withhold information. Watkins discovered that "when placed in a trance they 'spilled' every time, either verbally or in writing.

[15] Bernard C. Gindes, New Concepts in Hypnosis (Wilshire Books, N. Hollywood, Cal., 1973)

The subject of one of these experiments was an enlisted WAC in military intelligence. Her commanding officer ordered her not to reveal a list of what were made to appear to be real military secrets. Under hypnosis she "spilled" everything.

Another experiment was discontinued when it was discovered that a research worker in the government arsenal was spilling vital and top-secret war information to the friendly army hypnotist, who did not have a "need to know." He did this loud and clear while in a trance before an audience of 200 military professionals. If the subject had been allowed to continue, the disclosures of information would have resulted in a general court martial, no matter how the doctor might have tried to persuade intelligence headquarters that this was "just a test."

Much of the army's experimentation with manipulation by hypnosis was inspired by the reports of Wesley Raymond Wells, a doctor at Syracuse University. Wells's research, in turn, had been inspired by the fiction of the 1880's and 1890s, which described criminal acts as being induced by hypnosis. Wells was taken by the idea that "the most striking feature in a hypnotized subject is his automatism." Although earlier experiments had elicited no immoral or criminal behavior from subjects under hypnosis, the results of experiments which asked subjects to resist various suggestions indicated to Wells that people might be more suggestible than was generally believed.

In the late 1930s, Wells conducted a simple experiment with a student volunteer. He chose a subject who had stated that he expected he would be below average in hypnotizability and claimed he could not be put into a trance. Before inducing trance, Wells urged him to do his utmost to resist, in every possible way, first going into the trance, and then doing anything against his own moral code.

When the student told Wells that he was ready to begin the contest, the doctor put his hand on the subject's chest, counted to seven, and found that the subject had already fallen into a deep trance! After testing the subject's muscle control and ability to obtain amnesia and hallucinations, Wells proceeded to suggest that the subject get up from his chair, go over to Wells's overcoat which was on a coat rack across the room, and take a dollar from the right-hand pocket. Wells suggested that the subject see the coat as his own, and take the dollar thinking that he had left it in the pocket. When the subject followed all of Wells's suggestions, he then told him to put the dollar in his own breast pocket and return to his chair. As he was about to sit, Wells said to him that when he sat in the chair he would spend the dollar, just as if it were his own.

Afterwards, during the student's recall of his experiences, Wells found that everything had worked according to the hypnotic program he had implanted. This was, of course, a clinical sort of test for amnesia.

"Whether his amnesia would have withstood third-degree methods of the police or the lie detector methods of the psychological laboratory is another question," Wells said. "On the basis of my previous experimental study of posthypnotic amnesia, I would state it as my opinion that hypnotically induced amnesia in the case of so good a subject... would have withstood any possible tests if added precautions had been taken in the hypnotic production of the amnesia."[16]

Wells' report of this experiment, published in a psychology journal in 1941, brought a negative reaction from the scientific community. Milton Erickson was among the first to say that Wells's experiments were at best inconclusive. Erickson reported that after attempting to duplicate similar hypnotic inducements of crime with fifty subjects, he had failed. He concluded from his own investigations that "hypnosis cannot be misused to induce hypnotized persons to commit actual wrongful acts either against themselves or others..." The so-called antisocial acts induced by Wells and others, Erickson maintained, were most likely motivated by factors other than hypnosis or suggestion.

"We know that it is possible, without recourse to hypnosis, for one person to induce another to commit a wrong, a fact we may explain loosely as the influence of one personality upon another," Erickson explained. "To settle this question is difficult, since it involves three inseparable factors of unknown potentialities -- specifically, the hypnotist as a person, the subject as a person, and hypnosis as such to say nothing of the significant influence upon these three, both individually and collectively, of the suggestion and the performance of a questionable act."[17]

But even Erickson conceded that the primitive being, the libido, which dwells in everyone, makes almost any crime possible. When a hallucinatory state has been induced and the subject thinks he or she is acting out of self-preservation, the primitive mind takes over and the killer instinct is unleashed.

{Milton W. Erickson's insights into human behavior were used to develop (with the CIA watching over the scientists shoulders) what is perhaps the 20th Century's most important technology of empowerment or enslavement, a science known as Neuro-Linguistics Programming (NLP).}

In the late 1930s psychologists began grappling with the problem of human will, as the theologians before them had done for centuries. Some maintained that "will" meant conscious volition; others, that it meant nothing but the manifestation of the belief system, that is to say, the result of the earliest conditioned responses. The area of will still lies outside the limits of modern psychology. Many experts are loath even to use the word "will" since it represents a most ill-defined dimension of human nature.

[16] Wesley Wells, The Journal of Psychology, 1941.

[17] Milton Erickson, Journal of Biology and Pathology of Interpersonal Relations, August, 1939.

Summing up a carefully constructed semantic argument, psychologists often say, "A person cannot be made to do anything against his will or basic moral precepts." That statement, taken at face value, is certainly true. A normal person would not wittingly kill a friend. But if he was made to hallucinate that his friend was an enemy, and it was a "kill or be killed" situation, he would initiate a natural response to preserve his own life. In the process he might even take the imagined enemy's life. After the hallucination passed, he would realize he had killed his friend. This criminal act would be considered in one sense, an act of will; but the real cause of the action would not be understood outside the hallucinated state.Only the killer's grief would remain, to attest to his knowledge of what he did, and that he really did not want to do it.

Whether or not hypnosis can be used to deeply motivate people to commit antisocial acts despite the call of their own conscience is still an open question in academic circles.

George Estabrooks had evidence which made him conclude that "one in every five of the human race are highly suggestible, at least half are suggestible to a very considerable degree." And he warned, "... mere figures do not tell the story. That one fifth has a power far beyond its numbers; for this type of man, acting under direct suggestion, is no mere average person. He is a fanatic, with all that fanaticism may imply for good or evil... Can this prospective subject -- this one in five individual -- be hypnotized against his will?"

"The answer to this very vital question," Estabrooks concluded, "is 'yes,' though we prefer to say 'without his consent' instead of 'against his will.' We do not need the subject's consent when we wish to hypnotize him for we use 'disguised technique..."[18]

Believing in Estabrooks' logic, pragmatists in the government began to explore the possibilities of ways to change belief and motivate behavior. They let scores of contracts for research into hypnosis, behavior modification, conditioning, and virtually anything that held even a slim chance of being able to give them control over the individual human mind and will.

Meanwhile foreign governments unfriendly to the United States were involved in similar psychological research. But the U.S. government's fear of losing superiority in this new and untested field ran away with it. Intelligence analysts believed a "mind-control gap" existed, and to close it they mobilized "think tanks" to develop a usable program of experimental research, at once.

[18] Estabrooks, Hypnotism.

From one such think tank, the Rand Corporation, came a report entitled Are the Cominform Countries using Hypnosis Techniques to Elicit Confession In Public Trials? Dated April 25, 1949, it helped set the stage for using national security as the rationale for resorting to mind control to motivate criminal acts, both at home and abroad.

The successful use of hypnosis," the report said, "Would represent a serious threat to democratic values in times of peace and war. In addition, it might contribute to the development of unconventional methods of warfare, which will be widely regarded as immoral. The results of scientific research in the field under discussion would obviously lend themselves to offensive as well as defensive applications and to abuse no less than use. It must be assumed that almost all of the scientific personnel in the field of hypnosis are keenly aware of these social implications of their work and that they are interested in limiting the practice of hypnosis to therapeutic applications." That assumption proved to be untrue.

The Rand report recommended "that these moral and political implications of experimental research on hypnosis be explored as fully as possible prior to official encouragement or sponsorship of such research, so as to establish the most effective safeguards against its unintended consequences."

The Rand study dwelt at length upon Soviet experiments in hypnosis dating back to 1923. "At the State Institute of Experimental Psychology in Moscow," the report stated, "it was demonstrated that hypnosis could be used in inducing an innocent person to develop intense guilt feelings and to confess to a criminal or immoral act which he did not commit. In 1932 the experiments on hypnotically implanted 'crimes' were reported (in English translation) by A. R. Luria, who at that time was a professor in the Academy of Communist Education."

Quoting Luria, the report described how hypnosis was used as a device for producing emotional disturbances in order to control behavior. "We suggested to the person under test, while in a sufficiently deep hypnotic state, a certain situation, more often a disagreeable one, in which he was playing a role irreconcilable with his habits and contrary to his usual behavior -- we thus obtained an actual and rather sharply expressed acute effect. After awakening the person under test... we had a subject who was 'loaded' with certain definite affective complexes, which mostly remained unknown to himself..."

Luria described an experiment with a twenty-year-old female college student who was told under deep hypnosis that she was sitting in her home studying when a neighbor child, a boy of six, came into the room. She was told that the child shouted when he came into the room. She asked him to stop, but he did not listen. The young woman was then told that she would get angry and forget herself. She would take a stick and beat the boy, first on the back and then on the head. The boy would cry out from the wounds on his head, but she would keep on beating him. She would then feel very ashamed and would be unable to understand how such a thing could happen, how she could beat up a child. Finally, she was told that she must try and forget the incident altogether.

Luria explained that he had chosen this situation with a definite purpose. Since the hallucinated event was entirely unacceptable by the moral standards of the young woman's personality, it was natural that she would feel repentant. He reinforced her natural desire to forget by suggesting to her that she remove the memory of the event from her mind.

In subsequent trances the subject was questioned about the "beating." With great difficulty she reconstructed the event, but shifted the emphasis on several points so that the imagined event would conform more to her basic moral code. At first she refused to remember that she had "beaten" the child. She then conceded that she had "pulled his ears." Then, finally, she admitted she had "beaten him," but she maintained she had not beaten him with a stick. Luria said that this showed how unacceptable the situation was to her personality. The student said twice, "my conscience has tortured me." Luria said this showed the effectiveness of the hypnotic suggestion.

Of the experiment, Irving Janis, author of the Rand report, observed, "in this particular case, the implanted memory was initially referred to by the examiner as a 'dream' rather than as a real event. But from the detailed reports of other investigators, this procedure does not appear to be necessary for eliciting a false confession: a hypnotized subject will often accept and confess to an implanted memory as a real event in his own past life."

The Rand report itself suggested that this trick of hypnotic suggestion might be used on a defendant awaiting trial. The defendant could be "prepared" in a series of hypnotic sessions to accept guilt about a criminal act he did not commit, and then, if placed in a hypnotic trance while in the courtroom, the prosecutor's interrogation would elicit a false confession.

Fearing the Communists' use of hypnosis, the Rand report warned that hypnosis, once accomplished, is hard to detect. Contrary to reports in the nineteenth century, "a hypnotized subject is not blindly obedient, nor does he act like an automaton when in a trance. Hypnotic suggestions are acted out and elaborated in a way that is consonant with the individual's habitual social behavior and his basic personality traits." The report stated that while often "the hypnotized subject seems literal and humorless... he appears entirely unselfconscious, and very often he acts abstracted, inattentive, almost as if he were insulated against his surroundings," this is not always the case. A number of experienced hypnotists had been able to train their subjects to perform "in such a way that observers could not tell that the subject was in a trance or that he was acting under hypnotic suggestions."

The Rand report outlined the following procedure that would elicit a false confession. "First, make the subject feel guilty about some acts he had thought about or had actually carried out in the past. Second, make him feel guilty about having committed some crime of which he was actually innocent. The implanted guilt would compel the subject to confess when examined by a hypnotist or any one else designated by the hypnotist. Third, train the subject, by means of post-hypnotic suggestion, to go into a trance whenever a simple signal was encountered." The subject would be trained to give his false confession in a normal, convincing manner, so that observers would not be able to detect the trance state.

To induce hypnosis in an unwilling subject, the report suggested any of three possibilities which were then well supported by research findings:

1. As part of a medical examination, talk relaxation to the subject, thus disguising the hypnotic induction. For example, the person could be given a blood pressure test, told that he must relax completely in order to give an adequate test record, and then be given suggestions to go to sleep which would result in a hypnotic trance.

2. Induce hypnosis while the person is actually asleep from normal fatigue. This could be done by simply talking softly into the sleeper's ear.

3. Use injections of drugs to induce hypnosis. the hypnotic drugs would relax the subject and put him in a "twilight state" where the subconscious mind is very susceptible to suggestion.

Subjects who refuse or resist the simple "talking" methods of hypnotic induction could be given a few grams of paraldehyde or an intravenous injection of sodium pentothal or sodium amytal. The appropriate dosage of these drugs invariably induces a state of light hypnotic sleep. During sleep, the subject could then be given suggestions which would produce the characteristic deep hypnotic trance. While in the first drug-induced trance, the patient could be given posthypnotic suggestions to the effect that he would be susceptible to hypnosis thereafter without the use of drugs. Subsequently the subject could be allowed to practice carrying out posthypnotic suggestions. He could then be rehypnotized, still without his conscious cooperation, but this time without the use of drugs.

The report admitted that at the time of its writing there was no certain knowledge of just how successful each of the three methods described might prove to be with individuals "who are on their guard against being victimized by hostile authorities."

"The drug technique," suggested the report, "would probably turn out to be the simplest and most efficient of the three and so it would be the most likely candidate for... hypnotizing defendants against their will."

Another important use of hypnosis for the government the report said, would be the induction of amnesia: "Once a deep hypnotic trance is achieved, it is possible to introduce posthypnotic amnesia so that [a subject] ...would not know... that he had been subjected to hypnosis, to drugs, or to any other treatment."

The report then turned to the problem of producing the deep hypnotic trance essential to post hypnotic amnesia. It stated that, based on research reports of that time, "in about 90 percent of any unselected population it should be possible to produce the deepest (somnambulistic) type of trance. According to numerous authorities, a light trance is sufficient to elicit a 'confession' of actual misbehavior which might otherwise be withheld; but, for carrying out complete posthypnotic amnesia, it is a somnambulistic trance that is required."

The Rand document expressed fear that Soviet investigators had found other techniques which could produce deep hypnosis in perhaps 90 percent or more of all individuals. Anticipating future advances, the report speculated on more efficient ways to develop greater depth in hypnotic trance. It suggested that a subject could be placed in a trance many times each day until a sufficient depth of trance was achieved. It was thought that hypnotizing the subject and then awakening him several times in the same session might speed up the process. This technique of successive and rapid trance induction would, it was hoped make the subject easily susceptible to deep trance in a few days.

To increase speed and depth of hypnosis, special uses of hypnotic drugs were also suggested. "For example, a series of drug-induced trances, as against only one such treatment might serve to develop the majority of cases into somnambules. Moreover, certain unique drug compounds may be especially effective in inducing very deep states of hypnosis." (NLP practicioners have developed ways of reaccessing any drug state, or any state at all for that matter, once it has been achieved. NLP added to that which is described above can exponentially amplify the effects.)

The report then said, "Conceivably, electroshock convulsions might be used as an adjunctive device to achieve somnambulism in a very high percentage of the cases. Many studies have shown that there is a temporary intellectual impairment, diffuse amnesias, and general 'weakening of the ego' produced during the period when a series of electroshock convulsions is being administered.

From my own and others' investigations of the psychological effects of such treatments, I would suspect that they might tend to reduce resistance to hypnotic suggestions. It is conceivable, therefore, that electroshock treatments might be used to weaken difficult cases in order to produce a hypnotic trance of great depth."

In 1958 the Bureau of Social Science Research (BSSR), a subcontractor to the Rand Corporation, issued a "technical report" on hypnosis to the air force that took up where the earlier Rand report had left off. Once again a "think tank' was calling for action in the mind-control race against the Communists.

"To both the lay person and the behavior scientist," the author, Seymour Fisher, wrote in the introduction, "hypnosis has long been regarded as a potentially powerful instrument for controlling human behavior. Undoubtedly, the intelligence divisions of many counties have given serious thought to this potential and have done classified research in various areas of hypnosis... it is conceivable... that these techniques could have been used and covered up so successfully that they might be impossible to recognize... " [Emphasis added.]

Fisher outlined areas of future research where Americans could advance in the mind-control race. He urged the government to develop test to determine who was and who was not a good hypnotic subject. He urged further research in pharmacology, suggesting that a number of drugs little known at the time might prove to be effective in inducing hypnosis.

He predicted that some drugs would prove useful in reducing the amount of time required to induce complex hypnotic behavior and that others would be useful in reinforcing the lasting effects of hypnotically induced behavior control. He predicted that drugs would be developed which would permit far greater control over autonomic processes. Some drugs, he suggested, would be found to permit control over learning and perception as well. He also predicted that new drugs would be discovered which would be capable of inducing deep hypnosis in virtually any individual regardless of his degree of cooperativeness. " [Emphasis added.][19]

All of these techniques, involving drug-induced hypnosis and electroshock convulsions, were eventually developed and used to reduce some of our own citizens to a zombie state in which they would blindly serve the government. Regardless of the Constitution and the laws which supposedly protect the individual against government coercion, "zombies" were covertly created to do the government's more unsavory bidding. Such "zombies" asked no questions about the legality of their assignments. Often their assignments were never consciously known. And if they were ever questioned about their own actions, amnesia protected them from self-incrimination.

[19] Seymour Fisher, The Use of Hypnosis in Intelligence and Related Military Situations.

What had started out a race against the Communists slowly turned into a war against Americans. It was waged by a cryptocracy that had taken over the country once the electorate had been lulled into a hypnotic trance by the techniques it had developed to win the mind-control race against the boogey-men Commies.

In an early hypnosis test circa 1940, the enlisted man with his head back, is in a trance. Holding out his hand at the command of the hypnotist, a match is put to his fingers. While the flesh sizzled, no blisters formed due to the suggestions of the hypnotist.

HOLY ACID WARS

In 1951, a former naval officer described "a secret" of certain military and intelligence organizations. He called it "Pain-Drug-Hypnosis" and said it "is a vicious war weapon and may be of considerably more use in conquering a society than the atom bomb. This is no exaggeration. The extensiveness of the use of this form of hypnotism in espionage work is now so widespread that it is long past the time when people should have become alarmed about it... Pain-Drug-Hypnosis is a wicked extension of narcosynthesis, the drug hypnosis used in America only during and since the last war..."[20]

That naval officer was none other than L. Ron Hubbard. Before the war an explorer and prolific science fiction writer he went on to found one of America's fastest growing IFcontroversial religions, Scientology. (In an exchange of letters, Hubbard told me that he had written a book called Excaliber which had been stolen. The information in the book, he said, had all been subsequently published in his many other books. Excaliber, was, he intimated, the guts of what would be published as Dianetics, a work which takes all the mind control insights Hubbard was exposed to both in his travels in the east and in Naval Intelligence, and applies them to empower the human spirit -- the exact opposite of mind control as it came to be. He was subsequently kidnapped, and of course we know that he, and The Church of Scientology were hounded by the government much as others like Willhelm Reich had been hounded, for spreading the truth about technologies which may have the potential to liberate, rather than enslave. Several years after Hubbard's death, The Church of Scientology was granted, in 1993, official recognition by the Internal Revenue Service. It finally granted them the tax-deductible status which run-of-the-mill religious groups have little trouble obtaining.)

Hubbard's statement on "Pain-Drug-Hypnosis" was the tip of a vast iceberg of mind-control research using drugs as an aid to hypnotic induction. In the 1950s, under air force (and ultimately CIA) guidance, a series of papers were written defining the limits to which a government (ours or an enemy's) could go "to make persons behave against their will." In the introduction to one of these, the authors stated that the purpose of their study was "to review available scientific knowledge on the use of pharmacologic agents to influence the communication of information which, for one reason or another, an informant does not wish to reveal."

[20] L. Ron Hubbard, The Science of Survival (Church of Scientology, L.A. Cal., 1951)

They went on to say that, contrary to the alleged necessity for conducting such drug experiments, "no published reports have come to attention... detailing the scientific application of drugs by intelligence agencies of any nation as a means of obtaining information. The methods of Russian interrogation and indoctrination are derived from age-old police methods that have been systematized, and are not dependent on drugs, hypnotism, or any other special procedure designed by scientists."

The report, expressing concern over "proper" drug experimentation, urged that control placebos be administered "silently" so that no one would know who was getting what or when. Also discussed were the effects of drugs on different individuals in various settings, the relation between dosage levels, the effect of food, drink, and other physiological needs, and the effects of individual variables, such as sex, intelligence, medical and psychiatric status, life situation, and so forth, upon drug reactions.

The top priority for testing in mind control were those drugs which were found to induce hypnosis. The administration and effects of barbiturates, amobarbital, seco- barbital, pentothal, and sodium amytal were studied. Nonbarbiturate sedatives and calmatives such as etho-chlorvynol, glutethimide, methyprylon, methylparafynol, captodramin, and oxanimide were also tested. A whole range of amphetamines and their derivatives were discussed as good tools to "produce a 'rush'-- an outpouring of ideas, emotions, memories, and so forth." New drugs such as ritalin, marsilid, and mescaline were thought to hold great promise for mind-control applications. Perhaps the most promising of this last group was a "consciousness-expanding" drug called LSD-25.[21]

Four months after the first nuclear reaction was created in a pile of uranium ore in Chicago, the psychotropic effects of LSD-25 were discovered by a thirty-seven-year-old Swiss chemist working at the Sandoz research laboratory in Basel, Switzerland. On April 16, 1943, Dr. Albert Hofmann accidentally absorbed a minute quantity of the rye fungus byproduct with which he was experimenting. He later filed a report which described history's first LSD "trip."

"I was forced to stop my work in the laboratory in the middle of the afternoon and to go home, as I was seized by a peculiar restlessness associated with a sensation of mild dizziness... a kind of drunkenness which was not unpleasant and which was characterized by extreme activity of imagination... there surged upon me an uninterrupted stream of fantastic images of extraordinary plasticity and vividness and accompanied by an intense kaleidoscope-like play of colors..."[22]

Sandoz Laboratories had actually been manufacturing LSD since 1938, when it was first used in an experiment with monkeys. Their scientists observed then that the substance caused a marked excitation of the animals, but these results did not motivate scientists to follow up with further research. Work with LSD fell into abeyance until the spring of 1943 when Hofmann prepared a new batch for the storeroom, and accidentally ingested some himself.

[22] Albert Hoffman, High times, July, 1976.

Dr. Hofmann described that LSD experience: "...I did not know what was going to happen, if I'd ever come back. I thought I was dying or going crazy... My first... experiment with LSD was a 'bum trip' as one would say nowadays."

Dr. Hofmann's new discovery was investigated by the European psychiatrists as a possible key to the chemical nature of mental illness. In 1950 LSD was introduced to American Psychiatrists, and interest spread rapidly in the scientific community here.

In 1953, the CIA made plans to purchase ten kilograms of LSD for use in "drug experiments with animals and human beings." Since there are more than 10,000 doses in a gram, that meant the CIA wanted 100 million doses. The CIA obviously intended to "corner the market" on LSD so that other countries would not be ahead of the U.S. in their potential for "LSD warfare." (Later the cryptocrats were to say that they'd merely gotten milligrams and micrograms confused.)

That year Sandoz Laboratories Filled many orders for LSD from the CIA and the Department of Defense. According to Hofmann, they continued to do so up until the mid-sixties. The army would visit the labs every two years or so, to see if any technological progress had been made towards the manufacture of LSD in large quantities. Dr. Hofmann said that he had never been told the reason for the army's interest in the drug, but he assumed, from the large quantities being discussed, that it was to be used for weapons research.

As an employee of the pharmaceutical house, Dr. Hofmann was in no position to warn the army researchers away from the drug despite his belief that it would be extremely dangerous if used improperly and despite his personal distaste for their work.

"I had perfected LSD for medical use, not as a weapon," he said. "It can make you insane or even kill you if it is not properly used under medical supervision. In any case, the research should be done by medical people and not by soldiers or intelligence agencies."

In 1963 Hofmann received a letter from a scholar at Harvard requesting twenty-five kilograms of psilocybin for research purposes. Psilocybin was a psychedelic substance similar in effect to LSD but more subtle and much less powerful. Before the sales department at Sandoz would act on this order for "the extraordinarily large quantity of psychedelic compounds," they asked the scholar to provide them with the necessary import license from U.S. health authorities. He failed to provide it. Later Hofmann Commented on "the unrealistic manner with which he handled this transaction [which] left the impression of a person unconcerned with the regulations of society."[23] The scholar's name was Timothy Leary.

Leary came to the CIA's attention through a drinking buddy at Berkeley named Frank Barron. Barron had guided Leary through the creation of his first book, a supposed landmark in 1956 psychology circles entitled: Interpersonal Diagnosis of Personality. Barron introduced Leary to CIA officials and set him up for his role in the "Psychedelic Sixties."

Shortly after Leary entered the circle of the cryptocracy his wife died and he was left with two children to raise. Miraculously he was offered a well-paying job on the faculty of Harvard University. His boss was former OSS official, David McClelland, the editor of the secret service's important work Assessment of Men, a book which outlined the framework by which individuals were selected for espionage work during W. W. II.

At Cambridge, Leary launched himself into his work which was funded by Harvard, which in turn was funded by NIMH, which in turn was funded secretly by the CIA's MKultra program. Leary began experimenting with LSD on prisoners in the Concord Correctional Facility in Concord, Massachusetts. On the books, this research was funded by the Uris Brothers foundation in New York City, under the auspices of Harvard. What Leary learned from the Concord prisoners was published in 1962 in his paper entitled How to Change Behavior. In it, Leary explained what a powerful tool LSD was for changing ways of thinking and living.

By 1960 Leary had become fascinated by the effects of LSD upon creativity, so he went to Greenwich Village in New York City. There he began to recruit artists as LSD guinea pigs. He claims to have "guided trips" for about 3,000 volunteers among them Allen Ginsberg, Charles Olson, Jack Kerouac, Robert Lowell, Charles Mingus, Miles Davis, John Lennon, Jim Morrison, Aldous Huxley, Arthur Koestler, Alan Watts as well as "swamis, gurus, mystics, psychics by the troop." It was poet Allen Ginsberg who, after experiencing the mystical effects of LSD himself, persuaded the up-tight Dr. Leary to try it. That marks the time when a very different Leary began to emerge.

While Leary had received NIMH grants at the University of California at Berkeley from 1953-56, and while working for the U.S. Public Health Service from 1954-58, at first he denied that any of his psychedelic research projects at Harvard were funded by the government. Yet when I finally sat with him face-to-face after Operation Mind Control had been published (1979), and naively asked him if he was "witting" or "unwitting" of his collaboration with the CIA, Leary answered with: "Who would you work for, the Yankees or the Dodgers? I mean, who was I supposed to work for, the KGB?"

[23] Ibid.

Previous to my interview with Leary I had queried National Institute of Mental Health Director Bertram Brown. Brown said that, although such research at Harvard University was funded by HEW and NIMH grants from the period of 1956-63, "records available for projects supported during that period generally do not go below the major institution level; e.g., awards are identified as being made to Harvard University, but not to departments or centers within that institution..." Here we encounter another example of the government's built-in deniability.

Harvard claimed that its records on Leary's research could not be located.

Leary told ABC Newshack Paul Altmeyer:" The CIA funded and suported and encouraged hundreds of young psychiatrists to experiment with this drug (LSD). The fallout from that was that young psychologists (like himself) began taking it themselves and discovering it was an intelligence enhancing, consciousness raising experience...[24]

"I give the CIA total credit for sponsoring and initiating the entire consciousness movement, counter culture events of the 1960s," Leary said.

The CIA's former chief psychologist, John Gittinger obviously was asked by Altmeyer if the CIA did indeed provide Leary with the LSD which fueled the "Psychedelic Sixties." Gittinger replied on camera:" The countercase that I would make in relationship to that is that, remember the people who were doing the research were people who would be doing the research regardless of who was the sponsor; that it was not the CIA who asked these people to work on these. These people were working on it and the CIA helped them (emphasis added) to do that particular work."

In the spring of 1962 Leary was approached by Mary Pinchot Meyer, wife of CIA executive Cord Meyer. Leary says he looked up from his deck to see a good-looking woman leaning against the door post with her hip tilted provocatively, studying him with a bold stare. "She appeared to be in her late thirties," he said, "...Flamboyant eyebrows, piercing green-blue eyes, fine-boned face. Amused, arrogant, aristocratic.

"'Dr. Leary," she said coolly, "I've got to talk to you.'"

She introduced herself to Leary as Mary Pinchot and told him, "I've come from Washington to discuss something very important. I want to learn how to run an LSD session.

"...I have this friend who's a very important man. He's impressed by what I've told him about my own LSD experiences and what other people have told him. He wants to try it himself. So I'm here to learn how to do it. I mean, I don't want to goof up or something."

[24] Timothy Leary, Mission Mind Control, ABC-TV News Documentary, Paul Altmeyer, Producer, 1979.

Leary invited her to bring her friend to Massachusetts for a couple of days and he'd run a session with them. But Mary refused the idea, saying her friend was such a well-known public figure that'd be impossible.

"People involved in power usually don't make the best subjects," Leary told her.

"Don't you think that if a powerful person were to turn on with his wife or girlfriend it would be good for the world?" Mary asked.

"Nothing that involves brain-change is certain," Leary said. "But in general we believe that for anyone who's reasonably healthy and happy, the intelligent thing to do is to take advantage of the multiple realities available to the human brain..."

Later, while Leary and Mary were sharing a glass of wine, according to Leary, Mary said: "You poor innocent thing. You have no idea what you've gotten into. You don't really understand what's happening in Washington with drugs, do you?"

Leary admits he said he'd heard rumors about the military.

"It's time you learned more," Mary said. "The guys who run things -- I mean the guys who really run things in Washington -- are very interested in psychology, and drugs in particular. These people play hardball, Timothy. They want to use drugs for warfare, for espionage, for brainwashing, for control."

"Yes," Leary writes in 1983, describing what he knew in 1962 or before, "We've heard about that."

"...Teach us how to run sessions, use drugs to do good," Mary said.

Leary said he felt uneasy, like "that hit you get from people who live in the hard political world." There was something calculating about Mary.

Still, apparently Leary did turn her on and a couple of days later he put her on the plane back to Washington. Six months passed before he saw her again. With no warning she called him to a clandestine meeting in Room 171 at the Ritz Hotel in Boston.

"...Everything is going beautifully," Leary reports she said. "On all fronts in fact. I can't give details, of course, but top people in Washington are turning on. You'd be amazed at the sophistication of some of our leaders. And their wives. We're getting a little group together, people who are interested in learning how to turn on."

Leary repeated his doubts about getting high with "power-oriented" people, but Mary protested, saying that there were a lot of very smart people in Washington those days, but agreeing that power was important to them. "And these drugs do give a certain power. That's what it's all about. Freeing the mind. "...Until very recently control of American consciousness was a simple matter for the guys in charge. The schools instilled docility. The radio and TV networks poured out conformity..." Leary reports Mary saying.

According to Leary, Mary told him that drugs were of the most vital interest to the power elite in Washington. She said that a few years before "they" (she was obviously talking about her husband's employers) had become "absolutely obsessed with the notion that the Soviets and the Chinese were persuading our POWs in Korea to defect by brainwashing them with LSD and mescaline..." (There is yet no evidence that this was true.)

"That's certainly possible, "Leary quotes Leary saying. "With what we've discovered about set and setting, we know that almost anyone's mind can be changed in any direction."

"Any direction?" he says, Mary asked.

"With a minimum of information about the subject's personal life and two or three LSD sessions, you could get the most conventional person to do outrageous things."

"Suppose the person wanted to be brainwashed in a certain direction... wanted to change himself?"

"Easier yet," Leary quotes himself saying. "Our research is conclusive on this. Changing your mind, developing a new reality-fix, is a simple and straightforward proposition. Of course, altering your mind is one thing. Changing the outside world to conform to your new vision remains the difficult problem for us..." Leary says he struggled with the word. "Utopiates."

Mary was delighted. "I told you the first time we met. I want to learn how to brainwash."

After talking with Leary about making it a better world, she again asked Leary to teach her how to "brainwash". He said that didn't sound very ladylike and she burst into laughter saying: " If I can teach the use of utopiates to the wives and mistresses of important people in our government, then we can... well shit, Timothy, don't you see what we can do?"

"What?" Leary says he said.

"We can do on a bigger scale what you are already doing with your students -- use these drugs to free people. For peace, not war. We can turn on the Cabinet. Turn on the Senate. The Supreme Court. Do I have to explain further?"

One wonders, who, besides Abbie Hoffman, would have the courage to say something like that in public? The cryptocracy took Hoffman seriously when he threatened to dose New York City's water supply.

Leary says his response was to feel scared. "But come to think of it, it was close to what we Harvardites in our session rooms, lazily architecturing hopeful futures, had spelled out as the goal of psychedlic research.

So Leary told her," What do you want from me? The drugs?"

"Just a little bit to get started. With our connections we'll be able to get all the supplies we want. And all you need too. Mainly I want advice about how to handle sessions. And how to handle any problems that come up," Leary reports Mary saying.

Leary describes giving her a "cram course" on psychedelic sessions, then he drove her to the airport to catch a plane back to D.C.

Tim Leary and Richard Alpert were fired from Harvard in 1963, ostensibly for giving LSD to an undergraduate, but basically because they were giving it indiscriminately to just about anyone who asked, and the news got out. A controversy over the nature of their research exploded into headlines, so Leary and Co. retreated to Mexico, where they attempted to carry on LSD experiments outside the purview of the press, or do-gooders in local government. In June of 1963 they ran afoul of even the notoriously corrupt Mexican government and were expelled from that country for "engaging in activities not permitted to a tourist."

From Mexico they moved to a huge estate outside of Millbrook, New York, which was owned by Margaret Mellon Hitchcock and her sons, Tommy and Billy. (It may have been mere coincidence that the father of Tommy and Billy, Tommy Hitchcock Sr., an Air Ace of W.W.I who lost his life in 1943 over England, was connected to the highest levels of U.S Intelligence. And there are more suspicious circumstances which might be explored at another time which could indicate that the Hitchcocks were very tight with elements of the cryptocracy.) With Hitchcock support, Leary, Metzner, Alpert and company established the International Federation for Internal Freedom (later to be called the Castalia Foundation). These organizations served as a platform for Leary to propagandize for LSD which, he now claimed, could save the world from nuclear perdition by "blowing the mind."

In late November, 1963, just after Leary had returned from Mexico, a phone call came from Mary Pinchot. With urgency in her voice, she insisted on seeing him.

"Oh, you reckless Irishman," She said," You got yourself in trouble again. It's magnificent, these headlong cavalry charges of yours. Mais ce n'est pas la guerre."

"What'd I do wrong?" Leary says he said.

"Publicity. I told you they'd let you do anything you want as long as you kept it quiet. The plan to set up psychedelic training centers around the country was ingenious from all sides. They would have infiltrated every chapter to get some of their people trained. But they're not going to let CBS film you drugging people on a lovely Mexican beach. You could destroy both capitalism and socialism in one month with that sort of thing," Leary says Mary said.

Leary says he was struck by the brittleness Mary had picked up from (and here Leary knows of what he speaks, turning admirable phrases in the process): "those stern-eyed business-suited WASPs who shuttle from home to office in limousines -- the information brokers, editors, board members, executive branch officials -- youngish men with oldish eyes (faces you used to see around Harvard Square or in the Yale quad), initiated early into the Calvinist conspiracy, sworn to the forever reliable, working for Wild Bill Donovan in Zurich, for Allen Dulles in Washington, for Henry Luce as bureau chiefs and then shuffling from Newsweek to the Post, manipulators of secret documents, facts, rumors, estimates, arms inventories, stock margins, voting blocs, industrial secrets, gossip about the sexual and drug preferences of every member of Congress, trained to grab and maintain what they can, all loyal to the Protestant belief that the Planet Earth sucks."

Mary was scared. She burst into tears. "You must be very careful now. Don't make any waves. No publicity. I'm afraid for you. I'm afraid for all of us."

Leary tried to calm her, inviting her back to the big house on the estate in Millbrook.

"I know what you're thinking. But this is not paranoia. I've gotten mixed up in some dangerous matters. It's real. You've got to believe me." Leary says she glared at him. "Do you?"

The next call from Mary came the day after the assassination of Jack Kennedy. "I had really been expecting it," Leary says.

He could hardly understand her. He said she thought she was either drugged or "stunned with grief."

Leary says, Mary Pinchot Meyer said, "They couldn't control him any more. He was changing too fast. He was learning too much... They'll cover everything up. I gotta come see you. I'm scared. I'm afraid. Be careful."

That was the last time Leary heard from Mary. He kept waiting for her to call again but she never did. He didn't know what happened to her until he saw an article in The New York Times:

Woman Painter Shot and Killed on Canal Towpath in Capital

Mrs. Mary Pinchot Meyer was a Friend of Mrs. Kennedy; Suspect is Arraigned

Mary had been shot twice in the left temple and once in the chest at 12:45 in the afternoon of October 13, 1964. Dressed in a sweatsuit she had been walking alone, along the Old Chesapeake and Ohio Canal towpath in Georgetown. A friend told reporters that she sometimes walked there with her close friend Jacqueline Kennedy.

Mary's brother-in-law was the Washington bureau chief of Newsweek, Benjamin C. Bradlee. It was he who identified her body. The article described Bradlee as having been an intimate of the late President Kennedy. The Times article also mentioned Mary's ex-husband, Cord Meyer, Jr., identifying him as a former leader of the American Veterans Committee and the World Federalists, "now a government employee". The CIA, of course was not mentioned.

Police said that the motive was apparently robbery or assault. Her purse was found in her home. The suspect, a black male, was held without bail.

Distraught, over the news of Mary's death, Leary asked his well-connected friend, Van Wolfe, to see what he could find out. Wolfe had been movie mogul Mike Todd's partner in business and his attractive young wife was a Rothchild. Over the years Wolfe had developed an incredible network of friends in high places.

"...Police intelligence knew all about the Mary Pinchot Meyer case," Wolfe said. "Apparently a lot of people are convinced it was an assassination. Two slugs in the brain and one in the body. That's not the M.O. of a rapist. And a mugger isn't going to shoot a woman with no purse in her hand."

Leary says that he didn't find out what happened until he read an article in the San Francisco Chronicle some time later. Leary paraphrases it:

"James Truitt, the source for this sensational story, was identified as a former assistant to Philip Graham, publisher of The Washington Post. In interviews with The National Enquirer, Associated Press and The Washington Post, Truitt revealed that a woman named Mary Pinchot Meyer had conducted a two-year love affair with President John Kennedy and had smoked marijuana with him in a White House Bedroom. A confidant of Mary Meyer, Truitt told a Post correspondent that she and Kennedy met about 30 times between January 1962 and November 1963, when Kennedy was assassinated. Mary Meyer told Truitt that JFK had remarked, "This isn't like cocaine, I'll get you some of that." Truitt claimed that Mary Meyer kept a diary of her affair with the president, which was found after her death by her sister Toni Bradlee and turned over to James Angleton, chief of CIA counter-intelligence who took the diary to CIA headquarters and destroyed it. According to the Post another source confirmed that Mary Meyer's diary was destroyed. This source said the diary... contained a few hundred words of vague reference to an un-named friend.

"Mary Meyer's sister was quoted by the Associated Press as saying, "I knew nothing about it when Mary was alive.

"The article," Leary says," also revealed that the former husband of Mary Pinchot Meyer was Cord Meyer, Jr., one of the most influential officials in the CIA -- the only agent who had been awarded the Distinguished Intelligence Medal three times."

Leary frequently smoked marijuana and took LSD himself. His speeches, which were (and still are) addressed to overflow audiences, were tailor-made for true believers in the new drug cult. Leary issued many public statements on the benefits of LSD to the individual and society. Always pretending to be politically naive, he predicted that there would come a day when "a new profession of psychedelic guides will inevitably develop to supervise these experiences."

Finally, in the mid-sixties, Leary coined his famous slogan, "Turn on, tune in, drop out," and spoke at college lectures to the legions of young people who had illegally experimented with LSD and other psychedelic substances. Through magazine interviews, television appearances, movies, records, and books, Leary projected himself as the culture hero of a new generation which was fighting for an individual's right to alter his own consciousness -- a right, Leary then maintained, which was guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

A declassified CIA memo dated November 1, 1963 features Dr. Leary, Dr. Richard Alpert and their organization which advocated the expansion of consciousness through psychedelic chemicals, the International Federation for Internal Freedom (IFIF). In alarming tones the memo ordered all CIA groups involved in mind control operations to report if any agency personnel were involved with either Leary or Alpert or IFIF. The responses to this in-house memo have not yet been released by the CIA.

By 1968, society seemed to become divided into those who had taken psychedelic drugs and those who hadn't. Eventually LSD, marijuana, and cocaine were available on street corners and schoolyards throughout the land. The cryptocracy had covertly supported Leary and associates, and the snowballing effects of their LSD propaganda now caused an apparent reversal of policy, Was it that LSD and the other psychoactive drugs were politically dangerous in that they suspended the conditioning of people, if only temporarily, long enough to see the lies they were being fed? Was it that they suspended the conditioning long enough for people to see through the indoctrination of the government, span the credibility gap, and the government propaganda for the Vietnam War? The "acid heads" began to act with visionary fervor. They started to actively criticize the war in Vietnam and call for many social reforms. The "psychedelic revolution" embarrassed the government at every turn.

But if the government didn't deliberately create the "psychedelic revolution," it certainly was responsible for shutting it down. It did this by controlling the availability and quality of drugs. The very underground LSD labs which the CIA had helped set up were raided. Then it wasn't long before the quality of LSD degenerated and the supply dried up. Several studies have shown that when LSD became illegal (October 6, 1966) pure LSD became scarce and the habits of the drug culture changed.

Domestic counter-intelligence agencies began to manipulate the press, trying to overcome all the favorable publicity psychedelics had received. A Science article run in 1967 which claimed that LSD caused damage to chromosomes proved to be untrue. The article was picked up and carried by The Journal of the American Medical Association, which warned of LSD-induced "malformations, fetal loss and mental retardation." This article was widely quoted, even in the sub-culture press. In 1971 Science ran a survey of all the available literature, and concluded that LSD did not cause genetic damage.

In 1969 Diane Linkletter jumped from a window to her death. Her father, talk-show host Art Linkletter, blamed her death on the effects of LSD. "It was murder," he said. "She was murdered by the people who manufacture and sell LSD. LSD can kill!" Linkletter got a lot of press and a private audience with President Nixon. In 1982, Linkletter told author Jeremy Alderson that there was never any proof that LSD was involved with his daughter's death.

Rumors in the underground press had it that LSD caused "flashbacks". Psychedelic sojourners of the Sixties are still waiting for those flashbacks to happen. The Journal of Psychoative Drugs did a survey which showed no more "flashbacks" from those that had taken LSD than from thoses who practiced yoga or other forms of meditation.

But, simultaneous with the negative press about LSD, the supply began to dry up, and large supplies of heroin mysteriously became available. It was strong heroin, imported from the Golden Triangle in Southeast Asia (largely under CIA control). Many young people who had their "consciousness expanded" too far to distinguish between one drug and another turned to heroin. The government-inspired hysteria over drugs led many to think, "Well, they lied to us about pot, they must be lying about heroin." And so when psychedelics were no longer easily obtained, and heroin was, many young people became addicts.

The political visions of the psychedelic generation faded, as many who had "turned on" dropped out of city life and fled to the country. Those who stayed in the cities followed Leary's advice and dropped out from participation in the main stream of the society. Many of them followed an alternate route in the American tradition by living as pushers and bootleggers, making large sums of money from the newly created demand for illegal drugs.

In 1958, Dr. Louis Gottschalk, the CIA's "independent contractor," had prepared a think tank report which suggested that the intelligence agencies might control people through addiction.

Presaging the cunning behind the unwinnable "War on Drugs," Gottshalk's report put it this way: "The addiction of a source to a drug which the interrogator could supply, obviously would foster the dependence of the source on the interrogator. Where the source was addicted previous to the situation, the interrogator might find, already established, a pattern of evasion of laws and responsibilities which the addict had developed to meet his need for the drug in a society which proscribes its use."

The report went so far as to recommend that wounded GIs who had become addicted to pain-killing drugs be recruited from hospitals. It stated: "Where the source had become addicted in the setting as a sequel to the treatment of injuries, the ability of the interrogator to give or withhold the drug would give him a powerful weapon against the source..."[25]

In the late sixties, when it became known that thousands of GIs serving in Vietnam had become addicted to Laotian heroin, the U.S. Bureau of Narcotics tried sending a team of agents to Laos, but its investigations were blocked by the Laotian government, the State Department, and the CIA. While the Laotian government's hostility toward the bureau is understandable, the reticence shown by the American government and the CIA requires some explanation. According to U.S. narcotics agents serving in Southeast Asia, "the Bureau encountered a good deal of resistance from the CIA and the Embassy when it first decided to open an office in Vietnam..." Did this policy bear some relation to Gottschalk's think-tank statement, made some thirty years earlier -- to create an army of drug dependent people who could be controlled by their suppliers -- in this case the CIA?

The CIA also contributed indirectly to the heroin traffic by training men who then turned to smuggling. In the 1974 Pulitzer Prize-winning study of the heroin trade by the staff and editors of Newsday, it was revealed the U.S. Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs (BNDD) agents in Miami cross-checked a list of men who landed at the Bay of Pigs against police records. They found that at least 8 percent of the 1,500-man CIA-trained force had subsequently been investigated or arrested for drug dealing.

[25] Gottschalk, op.cit.

"If it hadn't been for their CIA training," one BNDD agent was quoted as saying, "some of these might never have gone into the [smuggling] business." He added that their training in paramilitary operations, weapons use, and smuggling of equipment and men from one place to another is well suited for illegal drug importing.

The head of the Office of Strategic Intelligence at BNDD, John Warner, said, "The key to heroin trafficking is the principle of compartmentability. It's the same way the CIA operates. Most people don't know what the whole project involves; most just know their particular job."[26]

Former CIA agent, Victor Marchetti was reported as stating "The CIA is implicated in the drug traffic in several countries. The Mafia, thanks to the CIA, has a free hand in the vast opium traffic from Turkey through Italy to the United States."[27]

On July19, 1975, Sen. Charles H. Percy, (R., Ill.) released a letter charging that the CIA had the Justice Department drop a drug case to protect its own involvement in drugs. Percy's letter said that the CIA refused to give federal prosecutors evidence in a case against Puttaporn Khramkhruan, a CIA employee, and one other person. Percy complained that "apparently CIA agents are untouchable -- however serious their crime or however much harm is done to society."

The senator's letter said he had written the Justice Department to find out why charges were dropped against the two men, who were allegedly attempting to smuggle fifty-nine pounds of opium into the United States from Thailand. The reply he received, from Deputy Assistant Attorney General John C. Kenney, stated that CIA Associate General Counsel John Greany had "insisted that there were other considerations at stake and that the material sought by the prosecutors would not be turned over." Kenney said Greany had explained that if Khramkhruan and his associate went on trial, "the situation could prove embarrassing because of Mr. Khramkhruan's involvement with CIA activities in Thailand, Burma, and elsewhere."

The CIA knew that heroin causes no "consciousness expansion." It brings on a physical feeling, a warm, glowing "high," and then dullness and insulation. But the government was interested in behavior control, and heroin, like LSD, was an important tool in gaining such control.

While some clandestine agencies of government were busy distributing drugs to pleasure-seeking underground America, in the laboratories they were studying drugs for their capacities to provide access to the mind for purposes of behavior control. Seeking the perfect "incapacitating agent," army chemists at Edgewood Arsenal came up with a drug known as "BZ" whose effects were ten times more powerful than LSD. Described as a hallucinogenic "superdrug," BZ was said to be so powerful that a person who took it often experienced amnesia for long periods of time afterwards.

[27] Victor Marchetti, Freedom News Service, August, 1976.

To test its effects BZ was given to 2,490 "volunteers." Gen. Lloyd Fellenz, former commander of the Edgewood facility, said that the purpose of the BZ experiment was to produce an incapacitating gas (sprayed from the sky as in the film Jacob's Ladder) or drug which could be placed in an enemy's water supply.

Dr. Solomon Snyder, professor of psychiatry and pharmacology at Johns Hopkins University Medical School, had formerly worked at Edgewood. "The army's testing of LSD was just a sideshow compared to its use of BZ," Dr. Snyder said. "Nobody can tell you for sure it won't cause a long-lasting effect. With an initial effect of eighty hours, compared to eight hours for LSD, you would have to worry more about its long-lasting or recurrent effects."[28]

Dr. George Aghajanian, who had also worked at Edgewood, confirmed Snyder's opinion. "With LSD," Aghajanian explained, "you tend to dwell on the experience and recall it and that can lead to flashbacks. But with BZ an amnesia occurs afterwards that blocks the experience out." [Emphasis added.][29]

Predicting the course of future events, Gottschalk's report stated: "the volume of effort devoted to studying the behavioral effects of drugs has expanded tremendously in recent years and will probably continue to grow. In part, this may be attributed to the ready financial support such activities have achieved. The interest of scientists in employing drugs in research, however, transcends an interest in drug effects, per se. Drugs constitute valuable tools for experimentation directed toward developing basic physiological and psychological knowledge. Work by scientists in several such areas, in particular, will increase knowledge of drugs which may be exploitable by interrogators."

Gottschalk's conclusion was that "drugs can operate as positive catalysts to productive interrogation. Combined with the many other stresses in captivity that an individual may be obliged to undergo, drugs can add to the factors aimed at weakening the resistance of the potential informant... But for many reasons, the use of drugs by an interrogator is not sure to produce valid results. The effects of drugs depend to a large extent on the personality makeup and physical status of the informant and the kind of rapport that the interrogator is able to establish with the informant. Knowing the predominating pharmacologic actions of a number of psychoactive drugs, an interrogating team might choose that chemical agent which is most likely to be effective in view of the informant's personality, physical status and the various stressful experiences he has already undergone..."[30]

This study and subsequent ones verified the fact that a number of drugs could conveniently be used to take over the human mind against the will of the individual. Through the use of drugs, the skilled mind controller could first induce a hypnotic trance. Then, one of several behavior modification techniques could be employed with amplified success. In themselves, without directed suggestions, drugs affect the mind in random ways. But when drugs are combined with classical conditioning and the language of hypnosis, an individual can be molded and manipulated beyond his own recognition.

The government's interest in controlling minds and motivating involuntary behavior was focused not only on individuals but also on large groups. Mass hypnosis and "crowd psychology" were well-known phenomena, and to that end propaganda techniques had already been developed. But mass "narcosis" was a new concept out of which grew the idea of "nonkill" warfare, where vast populations could simultaneously, or in one action, be drugged into submission.

In 1961, in an appearance before the Subcommittee on Science and Astronautics of the House of Representatives, Maj. Gen. Marshall Stubbs, head of the Army Chemical Corps, gave a speech cautioning that "we have not gone far enough in our research on these incapacitating compounds to be confident that they have real potential in warfare. We do not want to exaggerate claims for them to create the impression that we are on the verge of bloodless war."

General Stubbs admitted, "We are attempting to completely separate the incapacitating agents from the lethal agents so that any castigation normally given to toxic agents will not be associated with them, since they do not maim or kill. As a result we hope to have a weapon which will give the commander much freer rein in its use as compared to the toxic agents. It is my hope that through the use of incapacitating agents, the free world will have a relatively clear and rapid means of both fighting and deterring limited war, which has come to the forefront in the international political scene in the last several years. It is one means by which we can maintain some degree of equality in the face of overwhelming manpower superiority of the Communist-dominated nations."

One idea consistently expressed in the utterances of government employees was the idea that "we must beat the Commies to the punch." To that end the army launched a crash program investigating nerve gases, riot control gases, defoliants, herbicides, and biological agents such as anthrax, Rocky Mountain spotted fever, and bubonic plague. It also developed what it called "harassing agents" -- chemicals that cause headaches, vomiting, and severe pain.

[30] Gottshalk, op cit.

The idea was that one saboteur would be able to carry enough in his pocket to temporarily incapacitate the population of a city the size of New York. A two-suiter piece of luggage could hold enough drugs to disable every man, woman, and child in America. Most of the drugs the government experimented with were odorless, colorless, and tasteless and therefore undetectable. They were easily soluble in water, and only slowly would they lose their potency in chlorinated water supplies. Food which came in contact with these chemicals remained contaminated for days unless thoroughly washed. The inhalation of particles of these drugs suspended in the air produced the same effects as ingestion. Dissolved, they could penetrate the skin and enter the bloodstream without having been ingested.

The army assumed that a city exposed to such chemical attack would cease to function, the inhabitants so confused by the "trip" that the army could march into the city and take over, facing only minimal resistance. And the next day, the populace would return to normal consciousness and be fit to work for the occupying army.

To test their assumption, the army gave a squad of soldiers LSD in coffee without their knowledge. After the drug effects began the soldiers were ordered by their sergeant to perform normal and routine tasks while they were being filmed by a hidden camera. They could not follow even the simplest command nor accomplish the most ordinary task with an acceptable degree of competency. Two of the men simply giggled helplessly throughout the entire afternoon. As the platoon sergeant was not a coffee drinker, he did not receive the drug. Neither had he been told about the test. Accordingly he grew more and more frustrated and perplexed as his men acted more and more erratically.

Further studies indicated, however, that in actual warfare things would not be that easy. Urban populations spend relatively little time out of doors. Since most of these drugs settled out of the atmosphere quickly and did not pass through air-conditioning systems, they would therefore not affect everyone. If the water supply were lightly laced with a psychedelic, an individual would have to drink a pint of tap water before being affected. The concentration could be made heavier, enough so that one would only have to brush his teeth or wash his face before getting "high," but with concentrations that large, even an infant's formula or a cup of tea would be a dangerous poison.

Further, those exposed to minute amounts of these "incapacitating agents" might be able to fight off the symptoms. Those heavily dosed would suffer enormous mental distortions and could become wildly irrational. Mildly intoxicated persons might go about as if in a normal state, unaware that their judgment and motor skills were impaired. The resulting number of accidents would be monumental.

The army pretended to shelve its plans for "nonkill" warfare. But the major obstacle, as they saw it, was only the drugs. It was not that they might kill the enemy, but that as of yet the army was unable to immunize its own troops against drug effects. Not until 1975 was a reliable LSD antidote developed.

THE GUINEA PIG ARMY

In June, 1975, it was revealed publicly for the first time what many had suspected -- that the CIA and a number of government agencies under its direction had actually been giving behavior-influencing drugs to citizens within the United States for more than twenty years.

I was in Washington at the time, searching the catalogue card files at the National Technical Information Service. A previous search by friends in military intelligence of the M.I. Classified Index had revealed nothing but peripheral references to the object of my study: government research in drugs, hypnosis, behavior modification, and related subjects.

The NTIS file is supposed to contain a complete numerical listing of all government contracts, by contract number, whether or not they are classified. The contract cards were indeed numbered in consecutive order, but the ones I was looking for were missing; the index simply skipped over them and continued on in numerical sequence. Other cards in the index were marked "classified," and I would not have been able to obtain the papers to which they referred. But the reports I was looking for were not even cited in the index, although references to them in scientific journals indicated that they had once existed. Classified or not, these documents had been removed from the record.

That afternoon press accounts of the Rockefeller Report to the President on CIA Activities said, "Beginning in the Late 1940s, the CIA began to study the properties of certain behavior-influencing drugs (such as LSD) and how such drugs might be put to use in intelligence activities."

Further, according to the report, "The primary purpose of the drug program was to counter the use of behavior-influencing drugs clandestinely administered by an enemy, although several operational uses outside the United States were also considered."

The Drug program," the report went on to say, "was part of a much larger CIA program to study possible means for controlling human behavior. Other studies explored the effects of radiation, electric shock, psychology, psychiatry, sociology, and harassment substances."

As it would do two years later, the press played up the drug angle and ignored the other experiments. The CIA had been actually experimenting with all kinds of mind-control techniques for twenty-odd years.

It gave me little comfort, but it reaffirmed my sanity, to read in the report that "unfortunately only limited records of these drug programs are now available. All the records concerning the program were ordered destroyed in 1973, including a total of 152 separate files."

As I left NTIS, George Orwell's prophecy in 1984 came to mind: "Who controls the past controls the future. Who controls the present controls the past." How long would it be before our society would perfectly mirror that state Orwell envisioned when he said; "All that was needed was an unending series of victories over your own memory. 'Reality control,' they called it... 'double-think.'"

In Orwell's book 1984, the government continually changed its past by creating new historical fictions to justify its present. In 1975 I was wondering if we hadn't already gone beyond 1984, where, as Orwell said, "truth is falsehood," and "ignorance is strength."

Five days after the Rockefeller Report was released, the public flap began. The children of Dr. Frank Olson were informed by the DIA that their father had been the individual the Report cited as the "employee of the Department of the Army who was given LSD without his knowledge while he was attending a meeting with CIA personnel working on the drug project." Olson had died when he fell, jumped or otherwise exited from a twelfth-floor hotel window in New York, while still under the influence of what was then billed as the most powerful mind-altering drug known to man.

For twenty-two years the cause of Olson's death had been concealed. His family had been led to believe that he had committed suicide because of a mysterious, unexplained "mental breakdown." At no time after Olson's death was his family offered a true explanation of the real circumstances which had caused it.

Eric, the eldest son of Dr. Olson, said, "I'm very angry at the CIA because they let us grow up thinking our father had inexplicably committed suicide," Young Olson said that his family had decided to sue the government, not only out of desire to collect monetary damages but because "we think there's more information involved in this. It's also a way of holding the CIA publicly accountable for what they did."

The Olson family discovered that an individual damaged while in government employ cannot sue the government. But this didn't stop them. They asked the Senate to vote them a special bill of recompense for the death of the head of their household. On May 18, 1976, the full Senate approved S.B. 3035 by voice vote and sent it on to the House. Senate Bill 3035 specifically authorized appropriations totaling $1.25 million to be paid to the Olson Family. The House of Representatives, being more conservative at the time, cut the Senate's generous award and the Olson family eventually received only $750,000. A similar case, tried in civil court, might have brought the Olson family as much as three million dollars.

Months before Olson plunged to his death, Harold Blauer, a professional tennis player, died after being given repeated doses of experimental psycho-chemicals by the army at New York State Psychiatric Institute in New York City. For years the Blauer family had been trying to no avail, to find out the true cause of Harold Blauer's death. In the wake of the Olson scandal, the army relaxed its cover-up and finally surrendered Mr. Blauer's medical file to his daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Barrett.

The chemical identities of the drugs he had received were not given; the drugs were listed only by number. The numbers were said to represent various hallucinogens, but because of "national security" it has never been revealed what the chemicals were that killed Harold Blauer.

The crucial part of the army's medical report stated: "Prenarcosis: -- apprehensive -- considerable persuasion required-- injection administered at 9:53 a.m.; postnarcosis: -- 9:59, subject so restless has to be restrained by nurse -- out of contact with reality -- arms flailing -- sweating profusely; 10:01, rapid oscillation of eyeballs; 10:11, body rigid all over, 10:15, stimulant administered; 10:20 to 11:45,deep coma; 11:50, artificial respiration administered; 12:15, doctor pronounces subject dead; 12:30, hospital authorities notified; 3:30, body transferred to city morgue."

Harold Blauer died without ever knowing what drug he received. And from the words in the report -- "considerable persuasion required" -- it looks as though he hadn't volunteered, either.

Both Blauer's and Olson's deaths were covered up by the excuse of "national security." Their families were deliberately misled about the cause of death. No monetary compensation was offered except for the pensions or allotments due the families under normal circumstances.

In the wake of these personal tragedies, increasing public pressure led other government agencies to make their confessions. The army announced that since 1956 it had tested LSD on nearly 1,500 unwitting servicemen, and on several thousand more volunteers, a total of 6,940 in all. At the same time the army made this disclosure, it requested permission from the Defense Department to conduct further tests with at least two new drugs -- drugs which were many times more powerful than LSD. Permission was granted with the stipulation that the "guinea pigs" be volunteers only.

Within days of the army's admission of drug testing, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare revealed that it had administered LSD to about 2,500 prisoners, mental patients, and paid volunteers between 1954 and 1968. HEW said further that it had given seven and a half million dollars in grants to more than thirty university researchers who independently ran LSD tests on human subjects.

What was not revealed until much later was that the CIA had used every possible military and civilian agency of government, as well as a number of universities and private research groups, to test LSD and other drugs, plus a whole array of psycho-technologies in an all-out search for reliable methods of controlling the human mind.

But the CIA's record was pretty good; for out of all the thousands of individuals who were given LSD or other drugs without their knowledge, only three are known to have died.

In 1955 a new drug-testing program was begun at the Edgewood Army Chemical Center. Volunteer soldiers were recruited but were not told what drugs they would be given, nor that men had died as a result of similar experiments. They were told they'd suffer only temporary discomfort. Seven thousand soldiers underwent the Edgewood Arsenal's tests. Five hundred eighty-five men were given LSD; the rest were administered other unspecified drugs.

Dr. Gerald Klee was one of the first psychiatrists to work on the drug-testing program for the army. When questioned by television crews as to how the volunteers had been recruited, he said that he didn't really know. They had come from all over the country, believing only that they were going to the Chemical Center to be used as subjects in chemical experiments.

"Most of them were not highly educated, and even if they had been told exactly what they were to be given, they wouldn't have understood it," Dr. Klee said. "The advantage to them was time off to get away from some place they didn't want to be, to be near their family, girlfriends, whatever, and they had a pretty good life while they were there, as a matter of fact. They spent very little of their time in the experiments and had a lot of free time..."

Wendell Queen was an army sergeant in 1964 when he volunteered for the drug experiments at Edgewood. Years later, when the Olson case was made public, Mr.

Queen tried to find out what drugs he had been given. He ran into a wall of security. The army stated that it had no record that he was ever given drugs.

But Sergeant Queen remembers differently. He had been given a drug that penetrated his skin, not through injection but simply by being placed on his arm with an eye dropper. "They just took a small drop and put it on my arm and my arm became inflamed and kinda itchy, something like a bad mosquito bite," he said. He was not told what drug it was. He was told only that the effects would be temporary.

Several hours afterwards, he began to float. "I began to feel kinda happy and the room started turning around," Sergeant Queen related. "I had lost all my senses. I had no sense of balance or sense of the environment around me... Later on that night I really got paranoid and if anybody would come close to me I would think that they were going to kill me..."

Sergeant Queen had "flashbacks" for several months after that experiment when he would relive the states of mind he had experienced on that day.

"My roommate told me later that one night I woke up screaming and hollering 'don't kill me, don't kill me.' He said I became so violent that I began tearing my bed up," Sergeant Queen said.

Sergeant queen remembers that at Edgewood he tried making a joke about being a human guinea pig. The medic administering the test didn't appreciate his sense of humor. "He said that the doctors were the only human guinea pigs around there because they took every new drug first. he said that they always got a bigger dose than anyone else ever did."

According to the army, their LSD testing program came to an end in 1967. An army spokesman promised a follow-up study on the 585 men who had been given LSD, but actually carried it out with only thirty-five officers -- and superficially, at that. Still, the army maintained that there had certainly been no LSD since Olson and Blauer. Once again it was not telling the whole truth.

George Danald, a colonel at the Army Chemical School in Fort McClellan, Alabama, agreed to become a guinea pig in 1959. He believed in progress, and he believed that without experimentation and research there could be no progress. Thus, when the opportunity presented itself to him, he readily submitted to an injection of what was said to be LSD.

Immediately after he took the drug, according to his wife, "his overall characteristics seemed to change, his attitude changed, mannerisms changed, and I'm sure a great deal more that I didn't notice at the time."

A year after Colonel Danald's psychedelic experience he was transferred to Edgewood Chemical Center. Every day it was his habit to pick up his daughter Dawn promptly after school. One day he didn't meet her and Dawn walked to the Officers' Club looking for him. His car was in the parking lot, so assuming her father was inside, she went into the club and asked if anyone had seen him. When nobody seemed to remember that he'd been there that day she went up to their apartment on the floor above and knocked on his door. There was no answer, so she went in. The sitting room was littered with papers. She walked into the bedroom and noticed that the twin beds were apart. When she turned on the lights, she saw her father's body slumped at the foot of the bed.

In shock, she went to her room next door and telephoned her mother, who was at work. "Mommy, I found Daddy," she said. "He's on the floor and he looks awful white."

Colonel Danald had been dead for five hours when Dawn found him. He had taken his own life by putting a .25 caliber bullet through his temple. The pistol was still in his hand.

Colonel Danald did not have a history of mental instability. Until the time of his experience at Fort McClellan, he had never had a depressed moment. The only clue his family had to his apparent mental anguish was that, a few months before he died, he had once threatened to kill himself in a family argument. No one had paid any attention to that since he had been such a stable person in the past.

Mrs. Danald believes that her husband's death was caused by the mind-bending effects of the experiment, but she has so far been unable to prove her case. She and her family have received no compensation except the benefits which would normally accrue to a lifetime army officer.

Mary Ray was a research assistant at a psychiatric hospital which held military contracts to test LSD from 1958 to 1969. She helped doctors conduct experiments on more than 900 people. Some of them were mental patients. In 1966 she offered herself for LSD testing. Her description is typical of a "bum trip."

"I was in a state of becoming the universe. I became objects," she said. "I was no longer a person. Then, I got to a state of absolute terror. The closest thing I can remember being like that was as a child, when I was given ether... it was the feeling like just before losing consciousness."

But Mary was able to bring herself back from the LSD void: "I realized that I was a person, out of this billowing black seething weirdness, this horror...

"I looked down and I saw my arms which were two white rivers with black threads and they were my veins. I realized that, and I felt that if I tried really hard, somehow I could sever the veins. I realized even though I was not really a person that I could end all this living nightmare, this hell, by cutting my veins.

"Then I concentrated on this problem for what seemed centuries, because time did not exist. It was a strange time distortion. I tried desperately to try to kill myself. There is no question in my mind, that if I'd had some sort of sharp instrument, and if I were alone, I would have killed myself..."

The doctors and medics were helpless. "No one seemed to know how to handle the situation. No one knew what to do. It seemed like they were kids playing scientists."[31]

Mary Ray reported no amnesia, and no recurring after-effects. She never felt another overwhelming compulsion to commit suicide, nor any compulsion to keep her experience secret.

In June of 1958, William F. Chaffin was a sergeant in the U.S. Air Force, stationed at Dover Air Force Base in Delaware. He had been a basic training instructor in biological, chemical, and radiological (CBR) warfare earlier in his career and thought, when he read the bulletin offering volunteers a thirty day tour of duty at Edgewood Arsenal, that it would be easy duty. It would be a nice break in his dull routine and a thirty-day leave at government expense. He assumed that he'd be involved in a program much like the one he'd taught in basic military training on chemical and biological warfare tactics and defenses.

On September 10, 1975, before a joint session of the Senate Subcommittee on Health and the Senate Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure, Chaffin testified to the lasting effects of his volunteer tour of duty at Edgewood. He told the committee that upon his arrival at Edgewood, he was placed in a barracks with approximately thirty other volunteers. Daily, some of the volunteers were taken to various points on the base, given gas masks, and used in experiments involving DDT and other relatively mild chemicals. But at first Chaffin was simply ordered to report to a certain station each morning and then he would be released for the remainder of the day to pursue his own interests.

Today Chaffin cannot say with any certainty how long this procedure went on. He can't remember whether he was there for one week, two weeks, or three weeks, before he was actually used in a test.

"At some point around the middle of the month of July [1958]," Chaffin told the committee, "myself and four or five other individuals were taken to a hospital on the base. We were, at that time, taken into a room and a psychologist or psychiatrist -- I cannot remember which -- who I believe was associated with the University of Maryland, informed us that we would be administered a drug or a substance in distilled water. We were further informed that this drug or substance would be odorless, tasteless, and colorless. We were asked to perform certain tests prior to the ingestion of the substance. My best recollection of these tests is that we were simply asked to estimate certain amounts of elapsed time by any means other than a watch or clock. We were then taken back to our various wards and a short time thereafter, I was given a beaker of colorless, odorless, and tasteless substance by an orderly or an attendant.

"I have no recollection whatsoever that I was informed of the nature or qualities of the substance. Certainly, no reference was made to any possibility of detrimental psychological or physical effects on myself, or my future family, by taking of the substance.

"I cannot estimate adequately the length of time that elapsed after I took the drug until I first began to notice the effects, but my best recollection is that it was in the nature of one-half hour.

"At that time, I remember being taken back to the psychiatrist or psychologist and again asked to estimate various lengths of time by any means except observing a clock or watch. It is extremely difficult for me to describe adequately what occurred in the next hours of that day. I have to this day, distinct recollections of vivid and colorful events that made no sense whatsoever to me. I have distinct recollections of either myself hallucinating or other individuals hallucinating and imagining that they were seeing certain objects and things. I do not recall if they were in fact hallucinating, or if I was simply imagining they were.

'I was obsessed with a feeling that I can only describe as utter and total depression. I don't think these words adequately convey the meaning of that which I experienced, but I simply do not have the words to set forth the occurrences of that day.

"Later, I was released from the hospital. I cannot recall if this was after a period of twelve hours, twenty-four hours, or thirty-six hours or more. It is simply impossible to adequately determine what lengths of time elapsed."

Shortly thereafter, Chaffin returned to his base. His life returned to its usual routine, but for some reason, he found it extremely difficult to talk to anyone. He could not even bring himself to tell his wife about his Edgewood experience.

"Since that time," Chaffin said, "I have experienced what I believe to be LSD flashbacks on at least three separate occasions. The feelings that encompassed me on those three different occasions were again what I can only describe as a total depression accompanied by a nearly uncontrollable desire to take my life..."

(Extensive research has shown that there is no more chance of flashbacks with LSD than with alcohol.)

"After Chaffin's return, his wife became pregnant. In November of 1958, she miscarried. The Chaffins' doctor informed them that in all likelihood the fetus had been deformed. "I do not know at this time if this was attributable to LSD which I was administered at Edgewood, Maryland, or not. We do not at this time know if various other problems which have arisen in one of my children are directly attributable to LSD or not. Conversely, we do not at this time know that there is no relation.

Actually there is no scientific evidence that ingestion of even large amounts of LSD-25 can cause genetic malformation. There is only evidence that if laboratory animals and eggs are saturated with a pure concentration of LSD, chromosomal damage can occur. Dr. Jolyn West did manage to kill an elephant with a huge dose of LSD at Oklahoma University, but that's about as far as the lethal studies ever went.

"After the ingestion of the substance in July of 1958," Chaffin said, "my personality and behavior began to change [emphasis added]. After seven years of marriage, I was certainly not an individual that tended to depression. However, after an ingestion of LSD, I have undergone, as I mentioned earlier, several occasions of the same total and extreme depression that occurred when I was given the LSD initially. Additionally, my wife has related to me one incident that occurred and which I have no recollection of whatsoever. This incident involved my actually taking a gun and attempting to leave our home for the purpose of taking my own life."

Then Chaffin told the Joint Committee, "I would like to state for the record that I believe that the United States Air Force was always extremely fair to me in my military career. I enjoyed my military career and consider myself to be a loyal member of the United States Air Force, retired. I must also state that the trauma that I have undergone as a result of being surreptitiously administered this drug is something I consider to be totally out of keeping with my concept of the service. I can only hope that the Committee will take every means available to make sure that the other individuals who were administered LSD receive notification and help."

Army records show that William Chaffin was given a drug known only as EA1729. On August 5, 1975, after the Olson disclosure, Chaffin wrote a letter to the army stating that he thought he might have been given LSD. He requested the medical follow-up the army had promised. Michael V. Johnston of the Army Surgeon General's office responded to his letter. "In checking our records" Johnston wrote, "we find that you did receive LSD in the army research program. Medical consultants in the Office of the Surgeon General are now making plans for a follow-up study of persons who took LSD. You will be contacted within the next two months and invited to be examined..."

Chaffin was called in for a physical subsequently but he feels the examination was inadequate. He has only the army's word that the drug he received was LSD. Probably it was not. LSD is not known for its abilities to induce amnesia, to cause depression, or to place a lock on the tongue. If anything, LSD could be used in interrogation to loosen the mind and the tongue.

Until that day in Edgewood, William Chaffin had always had a firm grip on reality. Either he was given one of several drugs far more powerful than LSD, and with different properties to affect the mind, or he was given LSD and put through some extreme behavior modification procedure which programmed him to remain silent, and later, after his connection with the Edgewood experiment had been severed, to wish to take his own life.

Tennis pro, Harold Blauer on his ass in happier days, before he was "persuaded" to take an "experimental" CIA drug which killed him.

THE MKULTRANS

Following the release of the Rockefeller Report, John D. Marks, author and former staff assistant to the State Department Intelligence Director, filed a Freedom of Information Act appeal on behalf of the Center for National Security Studies requesting documentation from the CIA. I filed an identical request at about the same time. Marks and I both requested documentation for the evidence cited in the Rockefeller Report on the CIA's mind-control activities conducted within the United States.

Seven months later, Marks was given more than 2,000 pages of top-secret and "eyes only" documents by the CIA's Information Review Committee. A short time later I began to receive what Marks had gotten. These pages were said to be the bulk of the information upon which the Rockefeller Commission had based its report.

Exempted from release were portions of or entire documents which contained information said by CIA officials to pertain to "intelligence sources and methods which the Director of the Central Intelligence has the responsibility to protect from unauthorized disclosure pursuant to section 102 (d) (3) of the National Security Act of 1947." But in the photo-copied pages obtained was a statement to the effect that within a few hours of his resignation (forced by the disclosures of the Watergate and Church Committees), Director Richard Helms ordered the records shredded and burned.

The remaining documents, which were judged by the CIA to be "safe" to keep for subsequent release were all highly sanitized. They contained few names of participating individuals or organizations and none of the details of the long-range experiments designed to mold and control the minds of American citizens.

In addition to offering a superficial review of the CIA's involvement in research on mind control, the documents Marks obtained gave the Agency's own officially censored version of what had happened to Dr. Frank Olson.

According to the CIA, at a "liaison conference" with Fort Detrick personnel at Deep Creek Lake, Maryland, on the eighteenth and nineteenth of November, 1953, Dr. Olson and seven other men were given LSD in glasses of Cointreau, an orange-flavored liqueur. The unsuspecting "guinea pigs "were told twenty minutes later that they had been given LSD.

Olson suffered "serious aftereffects," and later the same day, he was sent, at CIA expense to New York City with an escort, Dr. Robert Lashbrook. There he was taken to see a psychiatrist, Dr. Harold A. Abramson. After five days of observation and treatment, Dr. Abramson decided that Olson had to be hospitalized. Arrangements were made for his admittance to a private sanitarium near Rockville, Maryland.

Following that consultation with Abramson on November 22, Olson and Lashbrook returned to their rooms at the Statler Hotel and retired for the evening. At 2:30 a.m. the next morning, Lashbrook was awakened by a loud crash. According to the "eyes only" investigation report, he went into Olson's bedroom and found him missing. The window, "glass and all," and the blinds were also missing. Lashbrook assumed that Olson had dived though them.

Before Lashbrook notified the hotel desk he called Dr. Sidney Gottlieb, the chief medical officer of the CIA drug project, and informed him of Olson's fate. Lashbrook then called the desk man who called the police.

When the police from the Fourteenth Precinct arrived, Lashbrook told them that Olson was employed by the U.S. Army. He also told them that he, too, was a government employee and a friend of Olson's, but nothing else. Police, however, found Lashbrook in possession of government identification, including a CIA badge, and made note of this identifying data. The CIA and the Department of Defense quickly took over liaison with the police and succeeded in covering up the cause of Olson's "suicide."

Three months later, CIA Director Allen W. Dulles wrote three notes of reprimand and sent them to the chiefs of the Technical Services Staff, Technical Operations and Chemical division. The "eyes only" reprimand to the Chief of the Chemical Division said, "I have personally reviewed the files from your office concerning the use of a drug on an unwitting group of individuals. In recommending the unwitting application of the drug to your superior, you apparently did not give sufficient emphasis to the necessity for medical collaboration and for proper consideration of the rights of the individual to whom it was being administered. This is to inform you that it is my opinion that you exercised poor judgment in this case." It was signed, "Sincerely Allen W. Dulles, Director."

In 1975, President Gerald Ford apologized to the Olson family on behalf of the government and made a monetary settlement. The Olson case was also the . subject of congressional investigations and a government-appointed commission. which found that there was no evidence of homicide.

There was no change of operations. The research on mind control continued unabated. The coverup continued. The official story was Olson fell, but the family of Frank Olson always suspected that he was pushed because he had become a security risk. According to his son, Eric Olson, the normally cheeful researcher sank into a deep depression after the CIA slipped acid into his drink. He told his wife he had made a "terrible mistake" and wanted to quit his job. Nine days later he was dead.

Eric Olson, is now a psychologist who has access to any number of people working within the cryptocracy. In 1994 Eric and his brother, Nils, had the 40-year-old remains of their father exhumed. The body was found in a "mummified" condition. The CIA said that it had no reason to think that Olson's death was a homicide, but the sons had the body sent to the nation's top forensic pathologists who would try to determine if Frank Olson was dead before he hit the New York City pavement. "It's been a pressing question for me all the time and the questions certainly were not laid to rest with the CIA story in 1975," Eric said.

"The remains are in exeedingly fine condition and that's attributable to the embalming done in New York and to the container," said James E. Starrs, professor of law and forensic sciences at George Washington University. "We have remains that are in mummified condition. We even have the opportunity to get fingerprints."

Forensic experts analyzed hair, brain tissue, fingernails and bones for injuries not attributable to the fall, Starrs said. They looked for toxins and drugs, including LSD and other hallucinogens. The chairman of the behavioral science department at York College. Dr. John S. Levisky, examined the skeleton.[32]

Starrs found new forensic evidence which suggested that Olson may have landed on his feet shattering both legs and causing massive internal trauma that would have led to death in minutes.[33] But, curiously, Starrs found "so many fractures in the skull that it is not possible that he received this type of injury simply from falling out of a window... It would not be possible unless he were on a trampoline. You don't bounce around like that; when you hit pavement, you hit pavement." Starrs also found no evidence of cuts from smashing through the glass window which were reported in the original autopsy. Starrs characterized the new evidence as "sinister," but decided (as of September 1994) to hold off his concluding remarks pending toxicological results and a final inquiry.

After toxicological results were turned in, in November, Starrs said, "I am exceedingly skeptical of the view that Dr. Olson went through that window on his own."

The CIA issued a hasty statement saying that it "wil cooperate fully" if the case is reopened, saying that if the private investigation has uncovered new evidence, it should be brought to the attention of the authorities.

Starrs singled out the presence of several bruises on Olson's skull that suggested he may have been smashed on the head before he plunged 173 feet at 65 miles-per-hour to his death on the sidewalk below.

The criminal and dishonorable ways of the CIA again surface. Despite Congressional hearings, despite exposure in the press, despite Presidential apologies, Operation Mind Control continued.

According to the documents, the CIA mind-control program was run under four different project names. "In 1949 the Office of Scientific Intelligence (OSI) undertook the analysis of foreign work on certain unconventional warfare techniques, including behavioral drugs, with an initial objective of developing a capability to resist or offset the effect of such drugs. Preliminary phases included the review of drug related work at institutions such as Mount Sinai Hospital, Boston Psychopathic Hospital, University of Minnesota, Valley Forge General Hospital, Detroit Psychopathic Clinic, Mayo Clinic, and the National Institute of Health.

"This first project, code-named Project BLUEBIRD, was assigned the function of discovering means of conditioning personnel to prevent unauthorized extraction of information from them by known means. It was further assigned to investigate the possibility of control of an individual by application of special interrogation techniques, memory enhancement, and establishing defensive means for preventing interrogation of agency personnel."

(A number of the "survivors" of Operation Mind Control have been tattooed with bluebirds. Several think that this was a mark of rank , that it meant they had received special "Bluebird" programming and could be accessed with certain triggers. This has not yet been sufficiently tested to my knowledge.)

In August, 1951, Project BLUEBIRD was renamed Project ARTICHOKE, and was subsequently transferred from the Office of Scientific Intelligence (OSI) to the Office of Security (OS). OSI, however, retained the responsibility for evaluating foreign intelligence aspects of ARTICHOKE. In 1953, the OSI proposed that experiments be undertaken to test LSD on Agency volunteers. Records do not indicate however, whether or not such experiments were made. According to the information released, OSI's involvement in Project ARTICHOKE ceased in 1956.

The emphasis originally given ARTICHOKE by the OS became focused on the use of drugs such as sodium pentothal in connection with interrogation techniques and with the polygraph. During this period there was an informal group known as the Artichoke Committee which had representatives from OSI, OS, Medical Services, and Technical Services. True to form, only brief records were kept, so that the details of the exchanges of this committee are still secret.

A CIA memo to the Director of Central intelligence dated July 14, 1952, cited a successful application of narco-hypnotic interrogation undertaken by a team of representatives from the CIA. This memo revealed that by that date two successful interrogations had already been conducted using drugs and hypnosis. The subjects were Russian agents suspected of being double agents. The cover was called "psychiatric-medical" (they were admitted to a hospital). The control methods were by narcosis, by hypnosis, and by a combination of both. The subjects were regressed by hypnosis and made to relive past experiences. When the interrogation was completed posthypnotic suggestion succeeded in giving the subjects amnesia of the actual interrogations. The interrogations were regarded by the CIA as being very successful.

"In each case," the CIA memo read, "a psychiatric-medical cover was used to bring the ARTICHOKE techniques into action. In the first case, light dosages of drugs coupled with hypnosis were used to induce a complete hypnotic trance. This trance was held for approximately one hour and forty minutes of interrogation with a subsequent total amnesia produced by posthypnotic suggestion. In the second case (an individual of much higher intelligence than the first), a deep hypnotic trance was reached after light medication. This was followed by an interrogation lasting for well over an hour. However, a partial amnesia only was obtained at this time, although a total amnesia was obtained for a major part of the test. Since further interrogation was desired, a second test was made on this individual in which the ARTICHOKE technique of using a straight medication was employed. On this test, highly successful results were obtained in that a full interrogation lasting two hours and fifteen minutes was produced, part of which included a remarkable regression During this regression, the subject actually 'relived' certain past activities of his life, some dating back fifteen years while, in addition, the subject totally accepted Mr. (deleted) [the case officer and interpreter at this time] as an old trusted, and beloved personal friend whom the subject had known in years past in Georgia, USSR. Total amnesia was apparently achieved for the entire second test on this case."

The memo revealed that sodium pentothal and the stimulant desoxyn were the drugs used to aid the hypnotic trance. The memo continued: "For a matter of record, the case officers involved in both cases expressed themselves to the effect that the ARTICHOKE operations were entirely successful and team members felt that the tests demonstrated conclusively the effectiveness of the combined chemical-hypnotic technique in such cases. In both cases the subjects talked clearly and at great length and furnished information which the case officers considered extremely valuable."

According to the Agency Inspector General Chamberlain, "There is reference in papers in the records held by the Office of Security, of something referred to as an ARTICHOKE Team traveling overseas in 1954, with indications of operational applications to individuals representing a Communist Bloc country. There is no record of the operation or its results."

A summary of a conference on July 15, 1953, offered a clue to other kinds of operations conducted under ARTICHOKE. The report, addressed to the Chief of Security, CIA, said, "Mr. (deleted) then discussed the situation of a former Agency official who had become a chronic alcoholic and who at the present time, was undergoing operative treatment in (deleted) for a possible brain tumor. This individual had called the Agency prior to the operation and warned that when given certain types of anesthetics (sodium pentothal), previously he had been known to talk coherently. The matter was taken care of by placing a representative in the operating room and by bringing the various personnel participating in the operation under the secrecy Agreement. Mr. (deleted) stated that the subject did talk extensively under the influence of sodium pentothal and revealed internal problems of the Agency. Dr. (deleted) added that he was acquainted with the details in the case.

"(Deleted) then commented that this type of thing had been a source of great concern to himself and others in the operations work and stated that he hoped that the ARTICHOKE efforts to produce some method that would perhaps guarantee amnesia on the part of those knowing of Agency operations in vital spots would be successful. He stated that some individuals in the Agency had to know tremendous amounts of information and if any way could be found to produce amnesias for this type of information -- for instance, after the individual had left the Agency -- it would be a remarkable thing. Mr. (deleted) stated the need for amnesia was particularly great in operations work. Mr. (deleted) and Mr. (deleted) both explained that work was continually being done in an effort to produce controlled amnesia by various means.

"Mr. (deleted) called attention to the fact that at the preceding conference, Colonel (deleted) had advanced the idea of testing new methods, new chemicals, and new techniques (and combinations thereof) on certain carefully selected employees of the Agency, probably individuals in the training groups..."

One of the documents John Marks obtained was dated July 30, 1956. Under the heading "Schizophrenic Agent" the memo stated that bulbocapnine, an alkaloid, could cause catatonia or stupor from its affects on the central nervous system and the cerebral cortex. The report stated: "We desire to have certain psycho-chemical properties tested on man, using the bulbocapnine which we were fortunate to obtain from (deleted), a sample being enclosed herewith. More bulbocapnine is available if needed."

Along with the sample was the request that subjects be tested for loss of speech, loss of sensitivity to pain, loss of memory, and loss of will power."

Another memo in 1956 authorized psychiatrists in universities and state penitentiaries (names were deleted) to test these drugs on unwitting subjects.

An even earlier memo said, "it was essential to find an area where large numbers of bodies would be used for research and experimentation. Dr. (deleted) stated that in connection with the testing of drugs, he was quite certain a number of psychiatrists all over the United States would be willing to test new drugs, especially drugs that affect the mind..."

ARTICHOKE evolved to become project MKULTRA which, according to CIA documents, was "an umbrella project for funding sensitive projects... approved by Allen Dulles on April 3, 1953. Cryptonym MKDELTA covered... policy and procedure for use of biochemicals in clandestine operations..."

Besides drugs, MKDELTA and MKULTRA experimented with radiation, electroshock, psychology, psychiatry, sociology, anthropology, harassment substances, and what were called "paramilitary devices and materials." Contacts were made with individuals at prominent hospitals and drug "safe houses" under Bureau of Drug Abuse control. Through the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs (BNDD) and federal institutions such as prisons, drugs could be administered to unsuspecting individuals.

One hundred thirty-nine different drugs, including various amnesia potions, were first tested under laboratory conditions (See Appendix B), then beginning in 1955 the most promising drugs were given to unwitting subjects "in normal social situations" through the informal arrangement made between the CIA and BNDD. The CIA inspector General's report indicates that this part of the mind-control program was terminated in 1963, but that a project to test various drugs "in an inquiry into improvement of learning ability and memory retention" did continue until 1972.

Document 32 in the MKULTRA file, sheds a more direct light on the CIA's involvement in Mind-control research. The "Memorandum for the Record" was written by an unidentified intelligence officer. It is reproduced below in its entirety.

17 January 1975

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

SUBJECT: MKULTRA

1. The following represents the best of my unaided recollection regarding the MKULTRA program. I was first briefed on it in 1962. At that time it was in the process of a significant decrease in activity and funding. As Chief, Defense and Espionage (C/D&E), I continued to decrease funds significantly each year until the program was phased out in the late 1960s.

2. MKULTRA was a group of projects most of which dealt with drug or counter-drug research and development. The Director Central Intelligence (DCI) and the Deputy Director of Plans (DDP) were kept informed on the program via annual briefings by Chief Technical Services Division (C/TSD) or his Deputy. Most of the research and development was externally contracted and dealt with various materials which were purported to have characteristics appealing for their covert or clandestine administration under operational conditions. The objectives were behavioral control, behavior anomaly production and counter-measures for opposition application of similar substances. Work was performed at U.S. industrial, academic, and governmental research facilities. Funding was often through cut-out arrangements. Testing was usually done at such time as laboratory work was successfully completed and was often carried out at such facilities as the (deleted) and (deleted). In all cases that I am aware of, testing was done using volunteer inmates who were witting of the nature of the test program but not the ultimate sponsoring organization.

3. As the Soviet drug use scare (and the amount of significant progress in the MKULTRA program) decreased, the program activities were curtailed significantly as budgetary pressure and alternate priorities dictated.

4. Over my stated objections the MKULTRA files were destroyed by order of the DCI (Mr. Helms) shortly before his departure from office.

CI OFFICER

By Authority of 102702

As for the unidentified intelligence officer's claim that the experiments "in all cases that I am aware of" were performed on "volunteer" and "witting" subjects, one can only suggest that this man may not have had the "need to know" about the unwitting subjects. Records of court proceedings indicate that many "guinea pigs" in federal institutions were not fully informed of the long-range consequences of drug-enhanced behavior modification.

One such experiment on Human "guinea pigs," conducted at the California Medical Facility at Vacaville, involved the use of the drug anectine, a strong muscle relaxant which leaves the victim totally without involuntary muscle control. The body lets loose its waste, breathing stops, and without proper attendance, death can result.

Whether or not the subject dies, he experiences the feeling that he is dying. According to chief Vacaville psychiatrist Dr. Arthur Nugent, anectine induces "sensations of suffocation and drowning. The subject experiences feelings of deep horror and terror, as though he were on the brink of death." While in this condition a self-styled therapist scolds him for his misdeeds and tells him to reform or expect more of the same. Dr. Nugent told the San Francisco Chronicle, "even the toughest inmates have come to fear and hate the drug. I don't blame them. I wouldn't have one treatment myself for the world."

Writing about the anectine therapy program, Jessica Mitford noted that of those given the drug, nearly all could be characterized as angry young men. "Yet some seem to have been made even angrier by the experience. For the researchers said that of sixty-four prisoners in the program nine persons not only did not decrease, but actually exhibited an increase in their overall number of disciplinary infractions."[34]

Experimentation with drugs and behavior modification became so widespread in prisons and mental institutions that in the middle and late 1960s court dockets became crowded with lawsuits filed on behalf of the "human guinea pigs" who were victims of such research. By 1971 the number of lawsuits had reached such proportions that the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights began an investigation. Three years later, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, chaired by Senator Sam Ervin, released a report entitled "Individual Rights and the Federal Role in Behavior Modification." It was largely ignored by the press, yet it revealed some interesting information.

Two years before the CIA and its subcontractors owned up to their mind dabbling, a large number of behavior modification projects were already underway. The report disclosed that thirteen projects were run by the Defense Department; the Department of Labor had conducted "several experiments"; the National Science Foundation conducted "a substantial amount of research dealing with understanding human behavior"; even the Veterans' Administration participated in psychosurgery experiments, which, in many cases, were nothing more than an advanced form of lobotomy.

One of the largest supporters of "behavior research" was the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and its subagency the National Institute of Mental Health. the subcommitee said that HEW had participated in a "very large number of projects dealing with the control and alteration of human behavior." Largest of all the supporters of behavior modification was the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA) which, under the Department of Justice, funded hundreds of behavior modification experiments. All the above agencies were named in secret CIA documents as those who provided research "cover" for MKULTRA.

[34] Jessica Mittford, Kind and Unusual Punishment (New York, Knopf, 1974)

The subcommittee found that controls and guidelines, where they existed, were at best loose. the poorly organized and loosely accountable research operations included not only traditional conditioning techniques, but also more advanced modifiers such as chemotherapy, aversive therapy, neurosurgery, stress assessment, electric shock, and the well known form of psychological indoctrination popularly call "brainwashing."

Another of the documents released to John Marks was one dated February 10, 1951 entitled "Defense Against Soviet Mental Interrogation and Espionage Techniques." It began: "International treaties or other agreements have never controlled the experimental development and actual use of unconventional methods of warfare, such as devices for subversive activities, fiendish acts of espionage, torture and murder of prisoners of war, and physical duress and other unethical persuasive actions in the interrogation of prisoners."

According to this document, the Technical Services division of the CIA contracted with officials of what was then known as the Bureau of Narcotics to have mind-influencing drugs given to unwitting subjects. The CIA felt that the drugs needed to be tested in "normal life settings," so that the full capabilities to produce disabling or discrediting effects" of the drugs would be known.

With the full approval of Allen W. Dulles, and arrangement had been made with the Bureau of Narcotics whereby the CIA financed and established "safe houses" in which federal narcotics agents could dispense the drugs and record the reactions of those who took them. No CIA men were present when the drugs were administered. The report did not reveal the number of "unwitting" subjects given drugs nor the identities of any but Olson. But it did acknowledge, for the first time, the scope of the cryptocracy's interest in mind control.

The CIA Inspector General, Donald F. Chamberlain, was stimulated by Olson's death to investigate the above cited drug program himself. In a summary dated February 5, 1975, he wrote "Records do not permit a description of such relationships as may have existed between these various activities; it is apparent there was some sharing of information between these various components in the Agency, and some overlap in time, but there also are indications of independent approaches to the problem."

Naturally, the CIA allows itself to be questioned and examined only by loyal employees. But even the in-house inspector general could not avoid reporting that the CIA had a recurring interest in behavioral drugs for more than twenty-five years. The earliest record of this interest dated to the post-World War II period, when the CIA, heir to the OSS mind control research and perhaps the victim of its own motivating propaganda, thought that the Soviets were using drugs and other behavior-influencing techniques.

In 1949, Irving L. Janis of the Rand Corporation, wrote: "Defense against these [mind control] actions will depend largely upon knowledge of enemy capabilities. Reports of experimental and actual use of illegitimate interrogation techniques by the Soviets to obtain intelligence and court confessions against the interrogatee's will indicate clearly the need for medical investigation," the report claimed.

"The implications referred to above embrace several categories. The behavior of defendants in Soviet courts and in those of the satellite countries, together with the whole pattern of Soviet trial procedure, makes it essential for us to consider Soviet use of drugs, hypnotism, hypno-narcoanalysis, electric and drug shock, and possibly the use of ultrasonics."

The report continued, "There is documentary evidence to support the belief that the Soviets have been conducting medical research, have actually used various techniques, and have made provision for large-scale productions of uncommon drugs known for their speech-producing effects..." Only a few drugs with which the Soviets were supposed to be experimenting are named. No hard evidence is presented that they were in fact experimenting with such drugs. The report goes on to point to the trial of Joseph Cardinal Mindszenty, who was accused of collaborating with the enemy (the United States), as an example of the Russians' use of drugs in obtaining forced confessions in court procedure. "Behavior patterns, rapport, symptoms of residual effects of treatments, and the physical condition of the defendants all indicate the use of drugs. Several documents refer to memorized testimony and departures from text, indicating forced false confessions."

It was later learned that the elicited confessions were false. By Mindszenty's own admission, they were not induced by drugs or sophisticated techniques of mind control; they were simply forged, and rather poorly forged at that. Mindszenty's foggy mental state at the trial had resulted from psychological indoctrination, isolation, and interrogation, and generally can be regarded as standard police procedure, for most countries of the world.

The report clearly stated that "the use of these drugs does not usually result in amnesia of past interrogations unless the victim's mental faculties have been destroyed by their effects." Thus, even if drugs were used on Mindszenty, by the CIA's own conclusion he would have remembered getting the drugs and something about the subsequent interrogation sessions. The fact was he remembered neither. It is surely not a coincidence that the CIA "eyes only" report which claimed Mindszenty was narco-hypnotized was issued the same year that Edward Hunter, the CIA "propaganda specialist," released Brainwashing in Red China. Most newspaper reporters would never go to press on the kind of sourceless generalized information provided in the CIA report; yet are we to believe the cryptocracy had launched a thirty-odd-year research and development project based on evidence which amounted to hearsay?

Another CIA report uncovered by Marks, "Defense Against Soviet Medical Interrogation," revealed the alarming statistics that "although susceptibility to narco-hypnosis varies from person to person, skilled operators can readily hypnotize about twenty-five (25) percent of a given group of average persons." It added "at least eighty (80) percent, however, would be susceptible following the use of certain drugs..."

This second document also discussed the plan of the CIA's organization of "a Special Defense Interrogation Program." In addition to outlining the use of drugs and hypnosis, the report brought up two other mind-bending possibilities: electroshock and ultrasonic sound.

"Psychiatrists in many nations," the report said, "have used insulin and electric shock as methods of choice under certain circumstances in their psychiatric work. Electric shock is more rapid than any of the above techniques [drugs or hypnosis]. It is instantaneous. It can be applied with or without the recipient's knowledge. Amnesia of interrogations equals that of hypnosis. If the enemy uses electric shock for interrogation purposes and the victim is available after recovery from the shock, highly trained specialists should be able to reveal the past use of electric shock by electroencephalographic analysis."

The report went on to recommend that groups within the CIA, the armed forces, and the FBI be organized and coordinated to give high-level direction to this project. "Civilian capability for solution of some of the problems should be utilized," the report said. "Close liaison between CIA and Armed Services has been established, but it is not as effective as it should be.

Liaison within the Armed Services appears to be inadequate, and they do not seem to be aware of some civilian sources of knowledge. Liaison with the FBI on this subject may be described as 'cooperative,' although somewhat mutually evasive. A satisfactory guiding organization could be set up under high-level direction for the development of an integrated program. If feasible, a committee to accomplish this purpose should be appointed." the report concluded by recommending that "a technical committee should include medical intelligence representatives from the CIA, Navy, Army, Air Force, probably the FBI and ad hoc Government and non-Government consultants."

From the first days of Project BLUEBIRD, and throughout all the ensuing CIA projects the goal was the same -- find answers to the following questions:

"Can accurate information be obtained from willing or unwilling individuals?

"Can Agency personnel (or persons of interest to this Agency) be conditioned to prevent any unauthorized source or enemy from obtaining information from them by any known means?

"Can we obtain control of the future activities (physical and mental) of any individual, willing or unwilling, by application of [mind control] techniques?"

Beyond the laboratory and operational research on unwitting subjects, the CIA set up training teams which included polygraph operators, interrogation specialists, hypnotists, and others in what was a long-range, all-out effort to develop reliable mind-control and counter-mind-control techniques. In all, fifteen separate research areas were defined by the CIA planners.

Most of the drug projects came under the operating authority of the U.S. Navy. At Bethesda Naval Hospital, under the direction of a Dr. Gaefsky. The drug project, begun in 1947, continued until 1972. the CIA reports defined the project as one which sought to "isolate and synthesize pure drugs for use in effecting psychological entry and control of the individual " (italics added).

Also under the navy's direction was a project headed by a Dr. Ellson at the University of Indiana called "Detection of Deception." this project was aimed at determining the physiological changes which occur when a person is engaged in deception. Mechanical and electrical devices were developed to measure these changes.

At the University of Rochester, again under navy direction, a Dr. Wendy investigated motion sickness. The CIA report describes that study as one to determine "the effect of drugs on the vestibular function of the ear and the development of side effects which indicate the possibility of psychological entry and control."

Besides mind-control drugs and techniques, also investigated were tools which might be effective in compromising individuals. One report stated that in spite of the intensive research, as late as 1960, "no effective knock-out pill, truth serum, aphrodisiac, or recruitment pill was known to exist." Towards that goal under the auspices of the U.S. Army Surgeon General's Office, a Dr. Beecher at Harvard University was given $150,000 to investigate, "the development and application of drugs which will aid in the establishment of psychological control."

And, under air force guidance, a Dr. Hastings at the University of Minnesota was engaged to research the effects of LSD on animals. His research area, as defined by CIA, also included the use of electric shock in interrogation, with particular emphasis placed on the detection of prior use of electric shock and the "guaranteed amnesia" it produced.

According to the documents, the investigation of hypnosis as a mind-control tool was kept under the aegis of the CIA. Their prime research interest was the "investigation of the possibilities of hypnotic and post-hypnotic control."

While MKULTRA was the code name for the research and development period of mind control, MKDELTA was the code name for the operational phase, during which all of the techniques of mind control were applied to individuals.

What followed next was the MKULTRANS, acting out their "mindless" roles at the behest of the cryptocracy.

Dr. Frank R. Olson, a former biochemist at Fort Detrick, Md. whose body was exhumed in 1994. While the CIA alleged that Olson had committed suicide in 1953 when he jumped or fell from the tenth floor of a New York building, the 1994 autopsy showed that Olson was dead before his body hit the pavement.

THE MATA HARI OF MIND CONTROL

Candy Jones was a sex symbol during World War II. Born Jessica Wilcox, with her catchy stage name and shapely legs she rose to a standing second only to Betty Grable as America's most popular pinup girl. She was a favorite of the troops at the front, and she felt it a duty to entertain them near the battlefields. After her advertised beauty faded and she could no longer serve to raise the morale of the troops with her appearance, she served her country in another way. She served under MKULTRA as a hypno-programmed CIA courier for twelve years.

While on a USO tour in the Pacific in 1945 Candy contracted a case of undulant fever and, shortly thereafter, malaria. On top of that, she caught the contagious fungus known as "jungle Rot." Within a week, her hair had begun to fall out, and her complexion had turned a sickly yellow.

The combination of these diseases sent her to a military hospital in Manila, where she met a young medical officer whom she identifies only by the pseudonym "Gilbert Jensen." Later, he would offer her the opportunity to become a CIA courier.

In 1959 Candy started a modeling school in New York. She rented office space in a modern skyscraper across the hall from an office occupied by the one-time heavyweight boxing champion, Gene Tunney. One night Candy noticed a "cleaning lady" fumbling for keys to open Tunney's door. The next day Tunney reported that his office had been burglarized, but nothing important had been stolen.

Later the same week Candy observed a young couple approaching Tunney's door. She watched as the young man took out a set of keys and went through the same trial-and-error process that the cleaning lady had performed a few nights earlier. Candy went into the hallway and asked the young man what he was doing. He told her that he was supposed to meet Tunney there. Candy informed him that Tunney had left hours before and was not expected back that evening. The couple hurriedly left.

The next day Candy told Tunney about the incident. He was not alarmed nor did he even seem to be interested that a second burglary of his office had been attempted.

One day later, in the lobby of her building, Candy ran into a retired army general she'd known in the South Pacific. The general had not known her well in the past, but now he was more than courteous. He mentioned that he was on his way to have lunch with Tunney so Candy invited him to her office first and showed him around. Then she brought him across the hall to Tunney. Tunney seemed quite surprised that Candy had known the general, and, after a brief conversation, the two men went to lunch and Candy continued with her business.

A few days later Candy was visited by a man who introduced himself as an FBI agent. he asked her about the burglary of Tunney's office, and Candy told him what she had told both Tunney and the superintendent of the building. The FBI man then unexpectedly went over to the window ledge and picked up a microphone Candy had obtained from Allen Funt of "Candid Camera" fame. The agent wanted to know what use Candy had for the microphone. She explained that she used it to tape her models' voices to help them develop their speech. The agent said that he'd been looking for just such a microphone to use in a surveillance job on Fifty-seventh Street. He asked Candy if she would mind if he borrowed it. Flattered that she'd been asked to help the FBI, Candy offered it for as long as it was needed. the FBI man thanked her and left with the microphone.

When he returned a month later, he was accompanied by another agent. After making casual conversation for a few minutes, the FBI men asked Candy if she would allow them to have some of their mail delivered to her office. There would be letters addressed to fictitious names in care of her modeling school. Some of the letters, he said, might be mailed from Europe and addressed to her, or to a specified fictitious man's name. If that happened she was supposed to call a number and report the arrival of the mail. Candy, once again flattered, said she'd be happy to help.

Two weeks after Candy took the job with the FBI, Gene Tunney moved out of his office. The general, however kept in touch with her all during that year. He invited her to several parties, and even sent her a Christmas card.

In the summer of 1960, Candy received a letter at her apartment from the first FBI man, and the next day the general called her at her office. Somehow he knew she was taking a trip to speak at the all-male Tuesday Night Supper Club in Denver, and afterwards going on to San Francisco to attend a fashion show. the general wondered if, since she was going to California anyway, she would mind carrying a letter from a government agency. He told her the letter was to be delivered to a man who would call at her hotel and identify himself.

Again flattered to be called upon to serve her country, Candy agreed to act as a courier. The important letter was hand-delivered to Candy's office a few days after the general's phone call. There were two envelopes -- a large one inside of which were her instructions and a smaller one which contained the actual letter. Candy carried the letter with her to Denver, then on to San Francisco where she waited for her contact.

Within a few days she received a call at her hotel from a man who identified himself as Gil Jensen; it was the same man who had been Candy's doctor in the Philippines.

Jensen invited her to dinner that evening at the Mark Hopkins Hotel. During dinner Candy Brought up the subject of the letter, but Jensen avoided the subject, saying they could talk about it at his office the next day.

Candy protested she had to go back to New York the next day, but Jensen would not take no for an answer. He told her it would be worth her while to stay on for a few days. "There's some interesting work you could do for the Central Intelligence Agency, Candy, without interfering with your business."

He told her that the work could be quite lucrative and since at that time she needed money, she decided to stay and find out what the CIA was offering.

The next day a car picked Candy up at her hotel and drove her across the Bay Bridge to the Oakland office of Dr. Jensen. That was the beginning of what Candy's biographer Donald Bain (who told Candy's story in the book The Control of Candy Jones[35]) described as twelve years of adventure which would eventually take her to the Far East as a covert operative of the CIA.

"She would be harassed, badgered and even tortured." Bain wrote. "Her role was small, a carrier of messages, and the fact that she chose initially to perform such duties, for pay, renders the misfortunes that befell her 'occupational hazards.'

"What Candy hadn't bargained for, however, was becoming a human guinea pig in a secret CIA scientific project in which mind control was the goal.

"She was an unwilling and unknowing laboratory subject for twelve years, and only her chance marriage saved her from the final stage of her adventure -- her own suicide as choreographed by Dr. Gilbert Jensen."

In 1973 Candy Jones married an old friend, "Long John" Nebel, the host of a New York all-night radio talk show. Candy had met John in 1941, at the height of her career, when he was working as a free-lance photographer assigned by a magazine to photograph her. After losing contact with each other for more than a decade, they accidentally renewed their acquaintance and were married twenty-eight days later.

[35] Donald Bain, The Control of Candy Jones((Chicago, Playboy Press, 1976)

On their wedding night, John noticed his bride was suddenly acting out of character. She had left the bed and gone into the bathroom to look in the mirror. When she returned, John said, "I saw somebody who only resembled the woman I'd married." He stressed the word "resembled" because, although the body which walked out of the bathroom belonged to Candy, the being inside it did not. Her voice was cold and distant, and her expression was cruel. Soon the strange bitter mood passed and the warm and loving Candy returned.

The next evening Candy's strange "mood" returned. John naturally became curious about his wife's psycho-history and began asking questions about her past. Candy told him about her contact with the FBI in 1959. She also told him that from time to time she would still have to take little trips for the government.

On June 3, 1973, John and Candy came home early in the morning after doing one of his all-night talk shows. Candy tried to sleep, but found she could not. She tossed and turned and when she complained to John of her sleeplessness, she was near tears.

John told Candy that he'd read that hypnosis could relax insomniacs, and although he never had tried to put anyone into the trance state, he'd read a lot about it and he suggested perhaps they ought to try it. Candy laughed and said, "I can't be hypnotized, John." but a short while after John began to hypnotize her, Candy was deeply asleep.

Although John had no way of knowing it then, Candy was already a highly suggestible subject since she had been hypnotized on many previous occasions by the CIA. Because of this, whenever John sought to induce trance in Candy, she rapidly became relaxed and was able to get a full nights' natural sleep.

One night, while under John's hypnosis, Candy suddenly and spontaneously began to relive her childhood. During these age regressions, she revealed many terrible incidents in what had been, an obviously lonely and troubled past. In dreamlike monologues she related how her father had abused her. Once when she was eleven he'd crushed her fingers, one by one, in a nutcracker because she wouldn't cry when he was about to leave.

Candy's portrayal of her mother depicted a person only a little less cruel than her father. A calculating woman, she often locked Candy inside a closet as a form of punishment.

In several hypnotic monologues Candy revealed how she had developed an alter ego named Arlene to defend her from the blows of her formative years. Later, John was to discover the despicable personality which he had observed taking over his wife's consciousness on their wedding night was the same alter-ego she'd developed in her childhood. John Nebel began tape-recording his wife's hypnotic monologues.

(Bain fails to say whether or not Candy's alter ego playmate was a manifestation of what was then thought to be the rare illness known as Multiple Personality Disorder (MPD). Since 1976 the psychiatric community has come awake to the fact that there are tens of thousands of people suffering from what is today called Dissociative Identity Disorder(DID), but then there were only a handful of cases diagnosed. We now know that DID children were recruited by the cryptocracy which made good use of their many outstanding capabilities.)

One day, while under hypnosis, Candy told John about working with Dr. Jensen in California. She revealed that Jensen worked for the CIA and she did, too, but John was not interested in the CIA story.

John became interested, however, when his wife described how Dr. Jensen had tried to hypnotize her. According to Candy, when Jensen had suggested she submit to hypnosis and she had told him with great certainty that she couldn't be hypnotized, he had agreed with her that this was probably true, judging from what he knew of her personality.

John had read that the best way to deal with a subject who believes he cannot be hypnotized is first to agree with him, then to proceed to demonstrate how a hypnotist might try to induce trance. John's subsequent hypnotic sessions with Candy verified that was exactly what Jensen had done. But he'd gone one step further.

According to the memories dredged up from Candy's subconscious, Jensen had regularly given her injections of "vitamins." John thought these might actually have been hypnotic drugs. Although Candy had probably always been a good hypnotic subject, narco-hypnosis provided access to greater depths in her already pliable personality.

When John began asking Candy about Jensen in her conscious state he found that she could provide little information about him. She could only recall visiting Jensen on that first trip for the CIA. She had no memory of what had happened in his office, nor of the events of her life which immediately followed that visit. John began to fear that the CIA doctor still possessed a hold over his wife's mind.

Over the course of many hypnotic sessions with Candy, John Nebel gathered up her fragments of memory and wove them into a picture of a satanic CIA doctor. But reports Donald Bain, "the major difficulty in dredging up this material is that Candy Jones was programmed by Jensen not to remember, and this programming proved frighteningly effective."

John later discovered that on that first visit, Jensen had obtained from Candy the important piece of information about her imaginary playmate named Arlene. This single fact provided the basis for the methodical splitting of her personality, for it was Arlene that Jensen wished to cultivate as a courier, not Candy.

Candy's willingness to carry messages was the extent of her conscious cooperation with the CIA. But from the first visit to Jensen's office she had become an unwitting victim of Operation Mind Control. Jensen had her sign a security oath which officially made her an employee of the government, and as such she forfeited her right to legal compensation for the harm done her by the ruthless mind-control operation.

Jensen also placed her against a large sheet of paper and traced her silhouette. Then he photographed her and asked her to pick a pseudonym for a new passport. She suggested her actual middle name Arlene.

In answer to Jensen's questions she revealed that her imaginary playmate had spelled her name A-r-l-e-n-e. Jensen said that he didn't care which way she spelled it and asked her to pick a last name as well. Candy suggested the name Grant, which was the last part of her grandmothers's name, Rosengrant and "Arlene Grant" was agreed upon. It would be an easy name for Candy to remember since that was the very name she had given her alter ego in childhood.

As time went on, John found that he was talking more to Arlene than to Candy. In one session John asked Arlene if she thought Jensen had in any way crippled her. Arlene scornfully replied that Candy had not wanted to be programmed, but that "she didn't know what end was up."

John asked Arlene who had developed her, and she replied, "Mother Jensen. He hatched me like a mother hen." Jensen had told her to come through Candy's stomach, she said. He'd say, "A.G.! A.G.!" and Candy would experience a severe stomach pain before Arlene took over her personality. When she refused to come when she was called, Jensen would give Candy an injection, and one day he miscalculated and gave her three injections, which put Candy to sleep for fourteen hours. Jensen had quite a scare because he had a difficult time reviving her.

Under John's hypnosis, Candy revealed that she had been given a number of drugs by Jensen: possibly aminazin, reserpine, and sulfazin, as well as the "truth drugs" sodium amytal and sodium pentothal. She was programmed not to allow any doctor except Jensen to treat her, and never to allow anyone to give her thorazine, the powerful tranquilizer.

The details of Candy's role as a mind-controlled CIA courier were pieced together from hundreds of hours of tapes of her hypnotic monologues. She worked for the CIA under her professional name Candy Jones, under the name Arlene Grant, and under her given name, Jessica Wilcox. She was first ordered to lease a post-office box at Grand Central Station in the none of Jessica Wilcox in August of 1961. She maintained this box until 1968 or 1969 and paid for it herself. Mail seldom arrived at the box, but when it did Candy would take it to her office and hold it for an unidentified man who always made the pickup, or sometimes, a phone call would order Candy to deliver certain letters to various locations around the city.

Slowly it began to dawn on Candy that some of the people she was delivering mail to might be just the kind of people who could kill her for reasons of their own. To protect herself, she wrote a letter to her attorney and put two copies in safe deposit boxes at different banks. The letter stated that for reasons she couldn't disclose she often used the names Arlene Grant, Jessica Wilcox, and Candy Jones. She wanted to put on record the fact that these different names all referred to her. In the event of her death she wrote, whether it was due to accident or sudden illness, whether it happened in the United States or outside the country, there should be a thorough investigation. She wrote that although she was not at liberty to divulge her sideline activities, she was not performing illegal, immoral, or unpatriotic acts.

Candy held that assumption to the end of her days, even after hearing her own voice under hypnosis tell tales of physical torture, of illegal entries and exits from the country, and of the most shocking kind of abuse at the hands of the CIA. Candy probably still would do almost anything out of this hypno-cultivated sense of patriotism.

Eventually John tried to get his wife to see a psychiatrist, but she refused, saying that if she did so she would get very sick and might even have a convulsion. Evidently Jensen had told her this. Even talking about possible therapy gave Candy severe stomach cramps.

Candy had been programmed so that she would not only be protected from foreign intelligence operations, but from everyone, the CIA included. Jensen planned to use her for some evil design of his own.

Candy Jones was, in fact, not one, but two zombies, Candy and Arlene, sibling rivals trapped inside the same skin.

They would talk to each other but never about each other to anyone but Jensen. They traveled together on the CIA assignments, Candy Jones being the person who acted within the United States, and Arlene Grant, the alter who took over once the airplane left the country.

Usually when Candy arrived in San Francisco from New York she would immediately go to Jensen's office. There she would change clothes, don a black wig, and pick up her fake passport in the name of Arlene Grant. Jensen would call forth the Arlene personality and send her off to Southeast Asia to deliver her messages. In his book, Donald Bain writes that Arlene often carried an envelope, but he wonders, wisely, if in fact there was any thing in the envelope. The possibility is strong that Candy carried her secret messages within her mind, locked behind posthypnotic blocks which could be released only by hearing the proper cue.

In 1966 she was sent on several missions to Taiwan where three businessmen were her contacts.

On her first mission to Taiwan, Arlene was met at the airport by one of them. She immediately offered him the envelope, but he insisted that she accompany him to his home, which turned out to be a large and institutional-like structure located on an impressive estate twenty miles outside Taipei. In front of the house a long row of trees lined the driveway which circumscribed a lush green lawn. There were other buildings on the property some distance from the main house.

As he escorted Arlene into the house she noticed two Chinese women dressed in lab coats on the lawn. She asked him who these women were, and he explained that they were only household help. During that first three-day visit the man entertained Arlene royally. he took her to extravagant dinners and on an extensive sightseeing tour of the island.

When she returned to San Francisco, Jensen met her at the airport and drove her back to his office. There he gave her an intravenous injection of drugs and restored her to the Candy Jones personality. She turned in her Arlene Grant passport and put her black wig, dark makeup, and clothing in a closet in Jensen's office. On that trip she also turned over to Jensen several rolls of exposed film which she had taken on her sightseeing tour. On her return to New York, she found her staff at the modeling agency very upset because she had forgotten to tell anyone where she was going or how long she would be gone.

A month later, Candy was again summoned to San Francisco. Jensen put her through the same procedure as before, having Arlene Grant emerge and travel to Taiwan. Again, the same man met her at the airport and took her to his country home. Again she stayed for three days. But this time she was not a guest but a prisoner.

Candy recalled, through John's questioning under hypnosis, that she was hooked up to an electric box of some kind and was shocked repeatedly on her shoulders, arms and breasts. The Chinese grilled her about the contents of the envelope she'd just delivered. She protested that she did not know anything about its contents, but that answer did not satisfy her torturers.

When she wouldn't change her story, they turned to questions about Dr. Jensen. Arlene maintained that she did not know Dr. Jensen. Obstinately, she stuck to her programmed cover story, even though she was severely and repeatedly shocked.

Although the real event had taken place almost ten years earlier, the physical impressions revived by reliving these experiences under her husband's hypnosis were so strong that her lymph system responded protectively and pumped fluid to her shin producing blisters in the exact places where the electrodes had been attached.

According to Candy's recollection, the torture stopped only after the Chinese man talked with someone on the telephone. Following his conversation he unstrapped her from the chair and seemed most friendly and apologetic. He told her the electrodes had been used not to torture her but to try and jog her memory. After lunch he drove her to the airport and put her on a plane for San Francisco. She remembers that on the return flight she wore gloves in order to hide the blisters. She also recalls that her hands smelled of sulfuric acid, although she has no recollection of having been burned with it.

At San Francisco, Jensen met her and gave her the customary injection after they reached his office. He told her that the torture had been a mistake, the result of a typographical error in the message she had carried.

In 1968 Candy was again sent to Taiwan. Normally an individual would not knowingly and willingly place herself in a position to be tortured a second time, but Jensen's control over Candy was so complete that she did his bidding without the slightest hesitation.

The final trip to Taiwan brought her into contact with other Taiwanese. She delivered her envelope, this time to a girl in an art gallery. She remembers that after the girl took the envelope from her, she spit in her face. Under hypnosis Candy could not recall any reason why the girl had done so.

After delivering the message, Arlene was picked up by the same man and driven to his home. Again she was tortured with electrodes and questioned about the contents of the message she'd delivered. When she would not or could not answer, her torturers put her hand in a box which contained a scorpion. This apparently was supposed to be a scare tactic, for when the scorpion bit her, the torturers immediately stopped the shocks and gave her antibiotics and administered other medical treatment.

Candy told her husband that on another occasion her thumbnails had been cut to the quick in an attempt to make her talk. She remembered that this had taken place on January 24, 1968. On still another occasion, something had been put in her ears to cause pain. But throughout all this torture, Jensen's programming held. She said nothing.

In another hypnosis session Arlene told about getting dizzy in a Taiwan hotel after having one drink. She began to sweat profusely and went to a bathroom which had a little dressing room and a bed in it. An attendant accompanied her and took her clothes and hung them up since they had become drenched with perspiration. She was given a dressing gown and allowed to lie down. Eventually a doctor came to see her. He gave her an injection and she drifted off to sleep.

After the doctor left the room, the female attendant came over and began to pinch her on different parts of her body, asking her where "the papers" were. When the attendant began to pinch Arlene's nipples, she fainted from the pain. The woman persisted, repeatedly pulling her to a sitting position and severely pinching her nipples.

When the woman finally left the room, Candy remembers, she tried to crawl under the bed to hide. The doctor came back and gave her another injection. The next day when she awoke and dressed, she was courteously escorted to the airport by her torturers as if nothing had happened.

When she got back to Jensen's office, she reported the incident to him. He seemed most concerned about it but when he asked to see her bruises, she refused to show him her black and blue nipples.

On a number of occasions Candy was sent to the Central Intelligence Agency's training ground called "The Farm." Known to the outside world as Camp Peary, it appeared to be an ordinary military installation. There Candy learned how to search a room, and various guerrilla warfare tactics including how to commit undetectable arson. She was taught how to use a poison lipstick to take her own life, and how to use the same lipstick to kill someone else by sticking a pin inside it, then jabbing the intended victim. She learned how to use acid as a defensive and offensive weapon. She learned how to fire various weapons, how to climb ropes, and how to write coded messages on her fingernails and cover them with polish. The training at "The Farm" was known as 3-D: "Detect, Destroy, and Demolish."

At one point Candy told her husband of an especially outrageous incident which took place at CIA headquarters in Langley, Virginia. She had been taken to an amphitheater where more than two dozen CIA men were gathered to witness a performance of Dr. Jensen's stable of zombies. There were eight subjects scheduled for the performance and Candy was the first.

In a deep hypnotic trance, she was made to lie naked on a table. The table was wheeled before the CIA audience and Candy was introduced to the group as Laura Quidnick. She wore her Arlene wig during the entire performance.

Dr. Jensen demonstrated his complete control over the prone, disrobed figure of Candy Jones. He lit a candle and told his nude subject that she would not feel a thing. Then he shoved the burning candle deep into her vagina. Several of the witnesses tried to break through Jensen's control, but they all failed. "Candy is perfect," Arlene told John. "Jensen proved in Virginia how impossible it was to break his control."

Piecing together such fragmented incidents of Candy's secret CIA past, John Nebel discovered that his wife had been programmed to commit suicide once she was no longer useful to the CIA. The self-destruct program was to be activated in Nassau. She was to check into the Paradise Beach Hotel on December 31, 1972. She'd stayed at the hotel many times before on normal business trips, so there was nothing unusual about that. But on this occasion Arlene was primed to spontaneously take over Candy's body upon receiving a phone call from Jensen. She was programmed to walk Candy's body to a steep cliff overlooking the sea and there to make a high dive. This was to be the last dive of Candy Jones' life, for from that location her body would certainly have crashed into the rocks on the beach below.

It was extremely fortunate that Candy married John Nebel on the very day she was supposed to check into the hotel. The marriage, by putting off the Nassau trip, had short-circuited Jensen's program of suicide, which was scheduled for the same month.

Even to the end of her life, despite John's help in countering much of Jensen's programming, Candy was still not completely free of his control over her mind. Still, whenever she looked into a mirror, she felt Arlene struggling to take over her consciousness.

Although Candy told Jensen that she was through working for the Agency in the middle of 1972, more than six months after she and John were married a strange phone call was recorded on their answering machine. The message was: "Japan Airlines calling on the 03 July at 4:10 p.m.... Please have Miss Grant call 759-9100... She is holding new reservation on Japan Airlines Flight 5, for the sixth of July, Kennedy-Tokyo, with an open on to Taipei. This is per Cynthia that we are calling. Thank you."

A check with Japan Airlines disclosed that the number 759-9100 was indeed the reservation number for the airline. There was, however, no record in the airline's computer of the reservation or a record of who made it. Neither was there a reservation clerk named Cynthia, or anyone else at the airline by that name. the "per Cynthia" phrase may have been a code which was supposed to trigger Candy's automatic program, or it may have been a thin disguise for the Agency represented by Cynthia's first and Last two letters.

Candy's controlled mind and John Nebel's sense of patriotism prevented the whole truth of the story from emerging. For some reason John Nebel, Candy Jones and Donald Bain conceal the real names of Candy's programmers. In Bain's book the name Gilbert Jensen is said to be a pseudonym.

Another doctor, who supposedly conditioned to hate and distrust people, is given the name "Dr. Marshall Burger" in the book, though at one point there is a footnote stating that Nebel wondered if Burger wasn't a cover name for the California hypnotist Dr. William Jennings Bryan. (In a samisdat document supposed to have come from a CIA briefing,(see Chapter 37) it was noted that Bryan had been one of the programmers of Sirhan Sirhan.)

Bryan, as noted in an earlier chapter, was the hypnotist and physician who offered the long-distance, instant diagnosis that Gary Powers had been "Powerized" by the Soviets. He was formerly a hypnotist for the air force and has been linked to the CIA. He was also the technical consultant for the film The Manchurian Candidate.

According to the April 22,1969, Los Angeles Times, the California State Board of Medical Examiners found him guilty of "unprofessional conduct in four cases involving sexual molesting of female patients." For this offense Bryan was only placed on five years' probation -- the lightness of the penalty might well have been accomplished through his connections with the CIA.

Alan W. Scheflin, and attorney who spent five years researching the subject of mind control for his book The Mind Manipulators, said he has evidence which suggests that the Nebels and Donald Bain may be concealing the fact that the "doctor" who programmed Candy is the same doctor who programmed Lee Harvey Oswald, James Earl Ray and Sirhan Beshara Sirhan.

In early 1976 Candy Jones and I both spoke on a KSAN radio special on mind control. I was interviewed via telephone and Candy was interviewed in the studio. We did not meet face to face, but KSAN provided all the participants with duplicate tapes of the program.

On the KSAN program Candy Jones and Donald Bain both insisted, despite my own evidence and arguments, the testimony of Jessica Mitford, and the evidence provided by two other investigative reporters that Candy had been only a human guinea pig used for experimental purposes. The records of the CIA mind-control project clearly show, however, that during the 1960s the cryptocracy's mind control had gone far beyond the experimental stage. On that radio show, Candy herself revealed that Sir William Stephenson (A Man Called Intrepid) believed that she was no guinea pig. She reported that Stephenson wrote her that as far back as the early days of World War II he had used zombie agents like her in the service of British Intelligence.

Shortly after the program was aired I called Nebel's office to try and make contact with Candy or John. They had ignored my previous letters and my calls were taken by their producer, who tried to help me but finally had to report that the Nebels were not interested in being interviewed. I subsequently learned that neither would they grant an interview to John Marks of the Center for National Security Studies.

My Attempt to clarify the question of whether or not Dr. William Jennings Bryan had anything to do with programming Candy Jones was also frustrated by his avoidance of me. I persisted in trying to get an interview with him until March of 1977, when Dr. Bryan died prematurely at the age of fifty, allegedly of a heart attack. He was a rather flamboyant man who toured the country holding "conferences" where he would lecture on the uses of hypnosis in police interrogation. He died at one such conference in Las Vegas, Nevada, only months after his name was raised in connection with Candy Jones.

Both Long John and Candy are now moulding in their graves. Among the legacy they left are questions which begged for their answers: What are the real names of the men who programmed Candy? Why weren't they included in the book? What are Candy's and John's personal political affiliations? Why were they not outraged by Candy's manipulation? Why are they attempting to protect the guilty and justify the rape of Candy's body and mind by the "national security" rationale? Why wouldn't they sit still and let me interview them in detail?

In light of Candy's disclaimer, and the Nebels' refusal to clear up these questions, I can only ask the reader to decide whether or not Candy Jones was a courier in a fully operational sense, or only an experimental guinea pig, as she tried to make us believe.

The late Candy Jones, Powers model, CIA courier, Dissociative Identity Disordered by the cryptocracy. (Note her pupils are dilated in the strong light. This could indicated that she was in a drugged state when this photo was taken.) Today Candy is recognized as among the first "Presidential Models" by the survivors of the so-called Monarch Project.

THE STORY OF O

Due to the volatile nature of the information contained in her story, I am withholding this victim's identity. The evidence is still being uncovered. Others are coming forward with corroborating information. While details of her testimony is still being checked, we do know, that what she describes in her story is entirely possible, so, from the perspective of students of mind control this story has great value as it is here presented. Future editions may contain more.

We'll call her O. She was born in 1957. Her first memories are of being suffocated by her father's penis in what was to be a childhood of continual sexual abuse. After six years of "deprogramming" with Mark Phillips, O has come to reintegrate her fragmented personality and has gained access to most of the shocking memories of her abuse by, among others, high government officials.

In her unpublished autobiography O writes: "I recall as a toddler being unable to run (I could barely walk) to my mother for help as my instincts demanded..." describing one moment of the lurid details which drove her to a condition many call Multiple Personality Disorder. Instead of helping, her mother abused her.

"Multiple Personality Disorder (MPD)," she explains, "is the mind's sane defense to an insane situation — a way of dealing with trauma that is literally too horrible to comprehend. By compartmentalizing the memory of such horrendous abuse as incestuous rape, which violates primitive instincts and surpasses pain tolerance, the rest of the mind can function "normally" as though nothing has happened. This compartmentalization is created by the brain actually shutting down neuron pathways to a specific part of the brain. These neuron pathways are triggered open again when the abuse recurs, whereby the same part of the brain that is already conditioned to the trauma deals with it again... and again... as needed..."

The results of this childhood abuse left little O unable to recall her father's sexual assaults. Until she saw or felt his penis thrust at her in another attack she remained innocent and open, amnesic of the previous abuses. "As quickly as I felt the terror from conditioned response (to his sexual assault)," she writes, "my neuron pathways opened up instantaneously to the part of my brain that had previously endured the trauma. This part of my mind developed into a personality of its own which belonged to my father... which he rented out and later sold to the U.S. Government."

Her father (through her own investigations) was apparently a multigenerational incest victim himself from a large, poor and "horribly dysfunctional family where his mother earned a living as a prostitute to local lumbermen... My father's brothers and sister," O says, "were all sexually and (occult) ritually abused just as he was, and they grew up to be drug addicts, prostitutes, street derelicts and pedophiles who also sexually abused me and my brothers and sisters." (By occult ritually abused, O means such as in the black rites of Satanism.)

O's case duplicates the mind control effects described by the cases of David, Luis Castillo and Candy Jones. But it goes further because O says she's regained her memory and reintegrated her multiple personalities, remembering the process that she was a courier (like David and Candy) who carried secret messages locked behind posthypnotic blocks, and she muled drugs (mostly cocaine) for the CIA and performed perverted sex acts for a number of leading politicians including two Presidents of the United States while they were in office and one before he came to office. Her father prostituted her to his friends, local mobsters, Masons, relatives, Satanists, strangers and police officers before he entered her into service of the cryptocracy.

Young O and her siblings were used in child porn films by her father and her uncle. As a child she was forced to perform sex acts before the cameras with her Uncle's boxer dog, Buster.

It was her uncle, she says, who informed her father of "the U.S. government Defense Intelligence Agency's mind control operation that was recruiting multigenerational incest abused children with Multiple Personality Disorder for its... mind control studies. I was a prime candidate, a "chosen one", and my father seized the opportunity as it would provide him immunity from prosecution (for the child porn charge he was facing)." Her father, she says was hurriedly flown to Boston for a two week course on "how to raise me for this off-shoot of the MKultra Project, Project Monarch."

When he returned from Boston, she says, he was smiling and pleased with his knowledge of what he termed "reverse psychology." This she describes as puns and "phrases that stuck in my mind like 'You earn your keep, and I'll keep what you earn.'" Her description of her father's newly acquired linguistic techniques include what David called "audio-reversals."

It is slowly coming into acceptance among the psychiatric community that people suffering from Multiple Personality Disorders often exhibit unusual abilities in their different personalities. While the "control" or day-to-day normal personality might be seriously nearsighted, another personality might have 20/20 vision. Quite common is the hypermnesia David described, and the high tolerance to pain we find in Candy Jones' story. O has her own version of these abilities.

"I learned to read at the young age of 4 due to my photographic memory which is a result of MPD. Our government researchers," O says, "knew about the photographic memory aspect of MPD, as well as the increased visual acuity which is 44 times greater than that of the average person, the unusually high pain tolerance, and the compartmentalization of memory, all of which were appealing for military and covert operations development. Additionally, my sexuality was primitively twisted since infancy... which was appealing to perverse politicians who could hide their actions deep within my memory compartments referred to as personalities...

"I had personalities for pornography, a personality for bestiality, a personality for incest, a personality for withstanding the horrendous psychological abuse of my mother, a personality that witnessed my occult father ritually murdering a man, a personality for prostitution, while the rest of 'me', functioned somewhat 'normally' at school. My 'normal' personality provided a cover for the abuse I was enduring, but best of all it had hope — hope that there was somewhere in the world where people did not hurt each other..."

O's young mind was scrambled with the "Project Monarch methodologies", she says, which confused fantasy with reality. Disney stories, Cinderella and the Wizard of Oz were placed at the base of her programming.

When she was 13, with her breasts beginning to swell, she was judged to be "too old" for pedophile perversions. It was then that she was "sold" to U.S. Congressman, Senator Robert C. Byrd (Democrat West Virginia). From that point on, she says, "my MPD existence became more regimented... I was kept physically worn down to the point of exhaustion in order that I be sufficiently receptive to my father's limited hypnotic programming capabilities ...

"My television, books, and music became even more strictly controlled and monitored than before, not only to infringe on my last minuscule freedom of choice, but for total mind control conditioning purposes.

"For example, the annual television of Judy Garland's Wizard of Oz was celebrated as a holiday around my house to prepare my mind for future base programming on the theme that I, like Dorothy, could 'spin' into another dimension 'over the Rainbow.' After all, 'Birds (Byrds) fly over the Rainbow...'

"My father insisted I watch the Walt Disney movie 'Cinderella' with him, paralleling my existence to Cinderella's — 'magically trance-forming from a dirty little slave to a beautiful Princess' — and in typical 'reverse psychology' humor, he referred to pornographic photos when singing 'someday my prints (Prince) will come', or by placing literal sexual emphasis on 'will come.'

"My brother, who was often featured in kiddie porn with me, was not a 'chosen one' for Project Monarch (beyond supplying more children to be dedicated in later years), yet my father figured what was good for me would be good for my brother. He took us to see Walt Disney's "Pinnochio", explaining that my brother and I were his puppets still in the carving stage. The distortions of reality that these and other Disney theme movies provided when coupled with my father's controlling conscious and subconscious influence, began to further erode our ability to discern fantasy from reality. My brother, now 37, remains psychologically locked in to those traumatic childhood years and is obsessed with Disney to this day, decorating his house in Disney memorabilia, wearing Disney clothes, listening to my father's instructions on his Disney telephone, and maintains 'When you wish upon a star' as his favorite song, with no conscious idea as to why..."

Every other Project Monarch "slave" she met, had been programmed along similar lines as she had. "I had to watch such programs as 'I Dream of Jeanie', 'The Brady Bunch', 'Gumby and Pokey', and 'Bewitched'. I could relate to the Genie pleasing her master, who was a Major in the Air Force in 'I Dream of Jeanie.' This served to confuse the reality of my own experiences with the fantasy of the TV production. I told all outsiders that my family was 'just like the Bradys'. Through 'Gumby and Pokey' I was led to believe that I was as flexible as these clay figures, capable of being physically maneuvered into any sexual position. In 'Bewitched' it is the normal next door neighbor that is considered crazy rather than the witches, another reversal that applied to my bizarre existence..."

O says her father took advantage of his new political connections and advanced himself in his work. "Soon he was promoted... due to who he knew within the Pentagon Procurement Office and General Services Administration, and what he had learned about double bind hypnotic persuasion... In true pedophile fashion, he surrounded himself with children by coaching little league sports, chaperoning school and Catechism activities, and becoming involved with the Boy Scouts, all of which made him appear to be a pillar of the community. The illusion was forming..."

Abused by both government representatives and priests in the Catholic church, O says that there are strong "political ties between the Catholic Church and the U.S. government" which was "evidenced by the much publicized relationship between the President and the Pope during the Reagan Administration. But this political relationship was evident to me years before through experiencing... direct involvement in Project Monarch's physical and psychological conditioning" and abuse.

Satanic rituals, she says, were often used to traumatize her in attempts to further fragment her personality. But that, she says, "did not promote the helpless attitude" that was desired. What they wanted, she says, was to make people believe that there was "spiritual warfare" going on which was beyond mankind's ability to stop.

"I knew it was my father, not Satan, that murdered the unsuspecting hunter in the woods during a ritual. And I knew no spirits or demons were being appeased by my Uncle Bob's slaughter of numerous pets, even when Bunny screamed like a woman while being tortured to death. Regardless of my spiritual beliefs. I experienced the 'results' just the same, being subjected to and witnessing trauma so horrible it literally drove me out of my mind, while my body was raped, tortured, and ravaged by men.."

"Whether I was in a military, NASA, or government building, the procedure for maintaining me under total mind control remained consistent with Project Monarch requirements. This included physical and/or psychological trauma; sleep, food, and water deprivation; high voltage electric shock; and hypnotic and/or harmonic programming of specific memory compartments /personalities. The high tech equipment and methods I endured from that time on gave our government absolute control of my mind and life since I had been literally driven out of my conscious mind, and I existed only through my programmed subconscious. I lost my free will, ability to reason, and I could not think to question anything that was happening to me. I could only do as I was told."

In the summer of 1975, O's family drove her from Michigan to the Teton Mountains of Wyoming. There she was introduced to Dick Cheney, Wyoming's Congressman who had become the White House Chief of Staff to President Ford and eventually Secretary of Defense to George Bush.

O says Cheney enjoyed a sadistic ritual called "A Most Dangerous Game." Originally devised to train the military in survival and combat maneuvers, it was used on O as a means of further conditioning her mind to believe that "there was no place to hide," as well as to more deeply traumatize her for ensuing programming.

"It was my experience over the years," O says, "that A Most Dangerous Game has numerous variations of the primary theme of being stripped naked and turned loose in the wilderness while being hunted by men. In reality, the 'wilderness' area was enclosed in military fencing and it was only a matter of time until I was caught, repeatedly raped and tortured.

"Dick Cheney has an apparent 'addiction' to the 'thrill of the sport', and appears obsessed with playing A Most Dangerous Game as a means of traumatizing mind control victims, as well as for his own sexual kink. My introduction to t he game occurred upon arrival, and it physically and psychologically devastated me..."

O says she was so traumatized by the event that after it she stood trembling "naked in his dark hunting lodge office after being hunted down and caught.

"Cheney was talking as he paced around," she says. " I could stuff you and mount you like a jackalope and call you a two-legged dear. Or I could stuff you with this (he unzipped his pants to reveal his oversized penis) right down your throat, and then mount you. Which do you prefer?"

While O stood silently trembling, not knowing what to say, blood and sweat and dirt slid down her legs and shoulders.

"Make up your mind, Cheney shouted," O says. "You don't get a choice anyway. I make up your mind for you. That's why you're here. For me to make you a mind and make you mine/mind. You lost your mind a long time ago. Now I'm going to give you one. Just like the Wizard (of Oz) gave Scarecrow a brain, the Yellow Brick Road led you here to me. You've come such a long long way for your brain, and I will give you one."

When O asked to use the bathroom Cheney's face turned red with rage, she says, and he was on her in an instant, slamming her back into the wall, growling, "If you don't mind me, I will kill you. I could kill you... Kill you... with my bare hands. You're not the first and you won't be the last. I'll kill you any time I goddamn well please."

"He flung me on the cot that was behind me, and finished taking his rage out on me sexually," O says. During that assault Cheney used an electric cattle prod on the young woman.

The following year, O says, she was "dropped off" at the Kennedy Space Center in Titusville, Florida where she was subjected to her first NASA programming. "From then on, I was obsessed with following the Yellow Brick Road to Nashville, Tennessee where she got involved with people in the country music business who were working undercover for the cryptocracy.

"In the early 1980's, my base programming was instilled by US Army Lt. Col. Michael Aquino, who holds a Top Secret clearance in the Defense Intelligence Agency's Psychological Warfare Division (Psyops). Aquino is a professed Neo-Nazi, the founder of the Himmler inspired occult Temple of Set, and has been charged with child ritual and sexual abuse at the Presidio Day Care in San Francisco, Ca. But like my father, Aquino remains 'above the law' while he continues to traumatize and program CIA destined young minds in a quest to create the 'superior race' of Project Monarch mind controlled slaves. I quickly learned that Aquino did not adhere to his profoundly professed occult superstition any more than I did, and that his "satanic power" was in the form of numerous variations of high voltage stun guns, which he used on me regularly. Although Aquino used occultism (blood trauma) as a trauma base, his programming was high tech and "clean" — not muddled in a proverbial witches brew of ignorance. He quickly dispelled the... influence (of her previous programmers), and began programming me according to Byrd's specifications... as his 'own little witch' for sadistic sex and covert CIA drug muling, blackmail and prostitution operations."

"Aquino provided the ancient instructions on how to mutilate me," O says. Silver nitrite and hot exacto knives were used to carve the details of the "witch" on her vagina without any form of anesthesia. The muscles were cut so that when she flexed, they would protrude from her body showing the hideous face. This was done, not only as a "curiosity" but because, according to O, it made her vagina "suited to Byrd's tiny, underdeveloped penis," and made her "Byrd's own little witch" for "which witch is which" programming.

In 1981, Byrd joined Aquino at Huntsville, Alabama during one of the programming sessions. O says, "NASA cooperates with Byrd since it is Byrd's Appropriations Committee that determines how much and/or whether or not NASA receives any government funding. I laid naked on the cold metal table, tranced and photographically recording every word and detail of my programming and every word that Byrd and Aquino exchanged. Byrd was providing Aquino with specific details of certain perversions he wanted me equipped to fulfill or perform. Additionally, they talked about scrambling my immediate memory with two private porn films they were arranging to have produced locally... "How to Divide a Personality" and "How to Create a Sex Slave." These films are the kind NASA became involved in producing for the dual purpose of "scrambling" memory as well as documenting their mind control procedures. The resident pornographers were two local police, one of which was a Sergeant, and this serves NASA and CIA well when cover-up is necessary. I photo-identified the Sergeant and his (jailer) officer in 1990, and my life was threatened as a result of this revelation.

"The 'How to Create a Sex Slave' film depicts the common 'spin' programming, which in essence is the combination to unlocking or accessing a specific programmed act. For example, the compartment of the brain that holds memory of incest is stimulated to open when the abuse occurs again. Seeing my father's penis would 'trigger' specific responses, supposedly opening the neuron pathways of my brain to allow the part of my brain that dealt with him before to deal with him again. With 'spin' programming, the 'trigger of seeing my father's penis is replaced with a combination of specific verbal commands and a specific number of revolutions in turning my body so that anyone with the combination could access that particular part of my brain. The part of my mind originally abused by my father learned to 'like' sex... painful sex. Byrd wanted me programmed in such a way that he could decide if he wanted me to scream and cry when he whipped me, or if he wanted me to become sexually aroused and beg for more. After programming when I met with Byrd, I would 'dance' like a music box dancer, twirling 'round and 'round until Byrd's fiddle 'music' stopped. My brain knew how many revolutions I had made whether I was capable of conscious counting or not, and the desired results were produced (and the appropriate state) accessed.

"This is but one simplified example of sex programming, and I was programmed for more than sex. But this particular incident of programming at the US Army Redstone Arsenal would change my existence entirely and set the stage for my role in covert government operations as a 'Presidential Model.'"

"The majority of my programming," O continues, "was Oz theme based, which meant the combination of codes, keys and triggers to access me were related to L. Frank Baum's Wizard of Oz. CIA cryptic language is a manipulation of the English language in such a way that words have double meaning, much the way people familiar with each other have 'inside jokes.' Since a mind controlled slave exists through their very literal subconscious, which has no way of discerning fantasy from reality, or intended meaning from literal, cryptic language is especially effective. Many CIA covert operations I was involved in occurred in public, and anyone who might have overheard the conversation would have heard something very different than what actually 'trance-spired.' For example, my escort linked arms with me like Dorothy's companions did with her when walking the Yellow Brick Road in the Wizard of Oz, which must have appeared normal or even romantic to outsiders, but signaled me that I had better follow 'directions.' He read the sign on the door 'Service Entrance'... accentuating syllables ever so slightly so that I heard him command 'Serve us. En-Trance.'

"After Aquino instilled my base sex programming, I was often taken... to Youngstown, Ohio to attend the sex slave training camp referred to as 'Charm School,'" O says. Often O was trained "with other CIA/Mob slaves." Whenever 'Charm School' was in session, O says, "there were several girls being tortured and trained at once. I have seen and known numerous girls to go through 'Charm School', but understandably very few are reported to have survived or recovered their minds enough to talk about it."

This so-called 'Charm School', O says, was owned and operated by a member of a prominent banking family, who took the name and role of 'Governor' from the movie 'My Fair Lady' in an attempt to confuse reality with movie fantasy." (In the movie, "Governor" is the cockney title given Professor Dolittle who transforms a female street urchin into a high society lady.) "Additionally, the title of 'Governor" was intended to create a scramble for the real Governor who often frequented the school as though it were a whore house." (The Governor of Pennsylvania at that time was Richard Thornburgh.)

"Charm School," O says, "meant I would be charmed, mesmerized (hypnotized), and programmed to be a high-class prostitute for politicians. I did learn their way to walk. I learned when to talk, how to dress, how to sit, stand, etc... table manners were not taught as they were not needed since slaves endured food and water deprivation when working..." Noticeable in O's behavior is her conditioned way of sitting, walking, talking, and smiling, in a quite charming if artificial manner, not unlike the behavior of sorority girls in the South during the late '50's or early '60's.

A typical three-day course at "Charm School", O says, included the "usual factors of sleep, food and water deprivation, trauma and high voltage programming (aversive conditioning with electric shocks.) "Often experimental drugs or tried-and-proven CIA manufactured 'designer' drugs were administered which produced specific brain wave activity to maximize and/or compartmentalize programs. I usually spent the first day hanging in the dungeon.

Charm School was housed in a historic stone railroad magnet's former residence, in the basement wine celler. "It is dark, damp and musty," O says, "and has been decorated in classic torture chamber fashion complete with hanging chains, stretching rack, whips, alter and animal altars.

"As I hung by my wrists, I could hear and smell the animals in the next cells..." A managerie of animals were kept in the 'Charm School dungeons. According to O there was a black Nubian goat called "Satan", a small donkey named "Nester', and a small white pony called "Trigger" and various dogs, and snakes.

The animals were trained to respond sexually to the smell of urine. As O describes it, "when someone entered my cell and urinated on me, I knew I would soon be released from my chains and led to the animal altar for bestiality lessons, pornography, or to please a perverse onlooker. I was hung by my ankles, stretched on the rack, burned and tortured repeatedly. My feet and hands were chained to a wall for what was termed 'off the wall sex', and I was taught 'Silence!' in Oz fashion since screaming did not produce results anyway. I was repeatedly filmed pornographically, and always taken upstairs to 'the Master's Chambers' for prostitution to various participants..."

Other programming took place at Tinker Air Force Base Near Tulsa, Oklahoma. "At Tinker, the Disney theme of Peter Pan's Never Never Land was cryptically used to further convince my child personalities that reality was fantasy, and that I would 'Never grow up' due to the timelessness of my existence. I was cryptically labeled a "Tinker-Belle", which signaled 'those in the know' that I had endured government military programming consistent with Tinker AFB mind control research and development. My 'Tinker-Belle' conditioning further enhanced my photographic memory through direct control for receiving and delivering government messages — a computerizaton/compartmentalizaiton of my brain, so to speak. I was also trained in covert criminal operations, such as international drug transactions for funding the Pentagon's and CIA's Black Budgets," O says.

She was led to a secret NASA installation at Maxwell Air Force Base in Nebraska. There she experienced what she calls "the 'you can run, but you can't hide' conditioning.

"I was taken underground to a secret circular room where the walls were covered with numerous screens showing satellite pictures from around the world. These satellites are referred to as the 'Eye in the Sky', and an Air Force official explained to me that my every move 'could be monitored via satellite'. On a separate four-screen viewer, he demonstrated what in retrospect was a contrived pre-recorded slide show, with the scenes changing as rapidly as he spoke and typed it into the computer. 'Where will you run? To the Arctic? The Antarctic? Brazil? The mountains? The desert? The prairies? The hills of Afghanistan? The city of Kabul? Devils Tower (Wyoming)? Would you try to run to Cuba and live among our enemies? We can find you there. There is truly no place to run and no place to hide. The US Senate? (The picture was of Byrd) The White House? Or to your own backyard? (My father was waving from his front door, cupping his hands over his mouth saying 'come back' just like Aunt Em in the Wizard of Oz.) The moon? We got you covered. You can run, but you can't hide.' "

This well-produced and tailor-made multimedia presentation convinced O that her every move could be monitored.

O says that her "owner" Senator Byrd prostituted her routinely to other high ranking politicians in Washington, D.C. And when Byrd used her for his own pleasure it was usually with a whip and a pocket knife. O says he "picked up where my mother left off to destroy any self esteem I might have had left... He often threatened me (and told me) that I was considered 'disposable' because, after all, 'The first Presidential Model, Marilyn Monroe, was killed right in front of the public ... and no one knew what happened.'"

"Byrd justified mind control atrocities," O says," as a means of thrusting mankind into accelerated evolution according to the Neo-Nazi principals he adheres to. He justifies manipulating mankind's religion to bring about the prophesied biblical 'world peace' through the 'only means available' — total mind control in the New World Order — because, after all, 'even the Pope and Mormon Prophet know this is the only way to peace... (they) cooperate fully with the project...

"Byrd justified our country's involvement in drug distribution, pornography and white slavery as a means of 'gaining control of all illegal activities world wide' to fund Black Budget covert activity that will bring about 'world peace' through world dominance and total control. 'Ninety-five percent of the people want to be led by the five percent' is Byrd's justification for mass mind control world wide, and he claims this can be proven because 'the ninety-five percent do not want to know what really goes on it government'..."

Literally Byrd's captive audience, O absorbed and remembered information that the "masterminds" behind the New World Order would never have revealed for security reasons. Since Byrd regarded her as his object, a game-piece that could be moved through life as though he were playing chess, he felt it safe to make her listen to his hidden political beliefs.

"Bryd likely would have talked to a post," she says, "and I filled the role as his silent sounding board. To date, I apply much of what I absorbed from his recitations to my survival and ultimately exposure of who is running our government, and the mind control atrocities and crimes proliferating against humanity for ushering in the New World Order..."

O identifies several of the hidden mind control centers in the U.S. One she says is at Mount Shasta California. It is used as a training and operations camp for a variety of paramilitary projects. Among other things, robot soldiers are trained there. Usually this training is done with the highest technology in invisible weaponry even, what she calls, "Star Wars electromagnetic mind control equipment."

She reveals that there is a CIA "Near Death Trauma Center" at Lampe, Missouri, and several more across the country. At these centers 'A Most Dangerous Game' is played. As her discipline and programming took over what was left of her, she was forced to do strenuous exercise for two hours a day and was programmed to "eat like a bird (Byrd)... (to keep a stunning figure.) My public image was a programmed personality that always smiled, looked and talked like the proverbial air-head blonde, and kept outsiders away by socializing only within my controlled environment..." One of the most frequented centers for her programming was MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa, Florida.

"Presidential Modeling" action, for O, consisted in taking cruise ships from Miami, Florida throughout the Caribbean and Mexico muling cocaine. "While I was robotically carrying out transactions as ordered, I was also prostituted to Central and South American drug lords and politicians and often times filmed pornographically... "

In the early 1980's her duties included passing messages to and from Senator Byrd to Baby Doc Duvalier, and Puerto Rican drug lord Jose Busto. "The working relationship between the CIA and Haiti was abruptly concluded with Baby Doc being whisked away from an uprising in Haiti by our government... along with his CIA drug profits.

"The only Drug Wars I ever witnessed in the US, Caribbean and Mexico were those launched by the CIA against its competition... The drug business was booming for the CIA... I brought suitcases of cocaine into the Port of Miami..."

According to O, her mind-controlled existence became more complicated after Byrd introduced her to President Ronald Reagan in 1983 at a White House party. Byrd told her, she says, "When you meet the Chief, imagine him with his pants down. He's most comfortable knowing you are imagining him with his pants down. He doesn't want formality."

Apparently Reagan had seen the videos made at Huntsville: "How to Divide a Personality" and "How to Create a Sex Slave." "He was very pleased with me as though I had participated in them willingly," O says. "Within the first few minutes of meeting Reagan, he was giving me acting tips to utilize in pornography!!"

"When you become your part," O reports Reagan saying, "your performance increases, which in turn increases your ability to do your part... for your country... 'Ask not what your country can do for you, Ask what you can do for your country'... your part." Here was Reagan using one of her trigger phrases.

"Reagan explained to me that the illegal CIA covert activities I was forced to participate in were 'justified' as they funded covert activities in Afghanistan and Nicaragua." O says Reagan said: "America's Freedom Train is spanning the globe and sex is but a sidetrack to the ultimate course of freedom. Our job of procuring and transporting arms is the most difficult part of all. But it can and must be done How can a man with no arms fight?" She says he told her that covert activity was "necessary as American people raise too much hell about violence, and it is better they're not informed of our supporting wars they cannot understand..."

O says that Reagan twisted reality to fit his personal perceptions rather than adhere to Byrd's philosophies of providing rationalizations for what he deemed "the order of things."

"In typical Reagan fashion," O says, " he did not perceive mind control as slavery, but as an opportunity for those who otherwise would 'have been nothing in life.'"

"Multigenerational incest abused children like myself," she says, or previously impoverished baseball players from 3rd world countries and slums are provided an opportunity to 'be all they can be' through making a contra-bution to society, our nation, and the world by utilizing their talents to maximum potential and becoming programmed machines. With this attitude, Reagan was proud of the role he played as 'The Wizard of Oz' to Project Monarch slaves like myself," O says.

The night she met Reagan, she says, Byrd acted in the capacity of a pimp and prostituted her to the President. "He informed me that 'Uncle Ronnie doesn't sleep with his mommy', preferring his L.L. Bean flannel sheets, nightshirt and nightcap because 'they're warmer, softer, more comfortable and don't snore.'

"Reagan accessed my sexual programming, and I became 'my part' as a prostitute to 'Uncle Ronnie'." O says he did not move during sex. "After all that was 'my job.' And my job was to please him, whatever it takes... and it takes more time than anything."

She says Reagan never hurt her, but "he made sure someone else did that". "He used this as a bond to the little child personality he always accessed for sex." O says that Reagan's "biggest kink" was bestiality pornography, and his "passion for pornography escalated its manufacture and distribution during his administration. He wholeheartedly approved and encouraged porn for funding covert activity."

Many porn films were manufactured solely for the president's pleasure, sometimes according to his instructions, O says. These were referred to as "Uncle Ronnie's Bedtime Stories."

After meeting President Reagan, O says, she endured additional base programming by Lt. Colonel Michael Aquino. She says this was done largely for security reasons in order to override Byrd's control.

"Since Reagan had been shot," she says, "he took extra precautions to ensure his safety which included directing Aquino as to how he wanted me programmed. Much to Aquino's dismay and embarrassment, Reagan loved the occult role that this Army Lt. Colonel played for mind control traumatization purposes as it fit in with the public promotion of religion Reagan had launched.

"The 'masterminds' behind the New World Order," O says, "wanted to project the illusion that their mind control operatives were 'demon possessed' and that the atrocities people were witnessing were 'biblical in proportion' in order that they would feel helpless to oppose them. Without Christianity, Satanism loses its effectiveness.. but together Reagan, like Byrd, the Pope, Aquino and so many others, believed world peace would be acquired by controlling the minds of the masses through their religion. Aquino's role delighted Reagan, and he demanded that Aquino wear his black robes to a White House party to influence the superstitions of a few South American diplomats. Aquino appeared foolish in the eyes of his peers who knew Aquino's image was only a guise for Psychological Warfare, as it made Aquino look like he believed in his own facade. Aquino paid Reagan back. Minutes before I was prostituted to Reagan that evening, Aquino ordered me into a closed side room of the White House and very quickly had intercourse with me, slapped me on the behind and disrespectfully said, 'Take that to the Chief'."

Later, Reagan instructed Aquino to use O for various military and government installations to provide "Hands on Mind Control Demonstrations of the latest advancements in training." According to O, Reagan said the 'hands on demonstrations' would 'educate our boys in the military to the wonders of the mind control phenomena'. And, says O, "Hands on meant sex... After all 'entertaining the troops is a long American tradition'."

O goes on to describe her programming and use as a "pigeon", one who carries secret messages locked behind post-hypnotic suggestions which must be triggered to be released. O's pigeon act was much more sophisticated than Candy Jones'.

After the Iran/Contra scandal had broken in the news, O says she was the one who delivered secret instructions from the president to Manuel Noriega. She was escorted aboard his yacht by Michael Aquino.

"I was helped onto the back of the yacht by Panamanian military guards who kept me there at gunpoint until I was cleared... " O says. After she was escorted to Noriega, he pressed a baby's ear shell into her hand which triggered the release of the message which was, as she remembers it:

"If you please, Sir, I have a message from the President of the United States of America: The successes we have enjoyed in our shared endeavors are now history in the making, who's (sic) course can not be altered — regardless of the imminent lifting of the veil by well-intentioned do-gooders. As this veil is lifted, it may shed light on you. So you must have your house in order, as does Ollie North, and cease any and all detectable activity. I will do my best to keep you under shield and out of view if you comply with these orders and cease all detectable activity at once."

O says Noriega acted insulted by this message and a moment of "ensuing chaos" reigned during which "Aquino hypnotically waved his hands in front of Noriega and dramatically spread out his satanic black cape which appeared to fill the room." Noriega was apparently a superstitious believer in something like Santeria, a Christian sect which mixes magic with practices which border on Voodoo.

"Aquino's manner was side-show-style rather than the usual somber tones used on Military bases for the Hands On demonstrations," O writes. "General, for your entertainment and in respect and appreciation of your successful enterprising 'Contra-bution', the Chief has sent his Presidential Model to demonstrate the latest technology in mind control advancements. With the flip of a switch, this pigeon becomes a kitten (I began undressing). Quite a different animal."

O says that because of Noriega's superstition, the personality switch frightened him. "Noriega believed whole heartedly in mind control," she wrote, "but could not grasp the concept of Multiple personalities (which he perceived as demonic possession) and therefore did not adhere to the idea of one slave being trained for business and pleasure. Aquino was manipulating these beliefs of Noriega's masterfully, compounded by the notion of Aquino being a 'devil' working for Reagan. The impact of this demonstration... would prove to be psychological warfare of the highest order administered to force Noriega to be more discrete."

Aquino then ordered her to lie on the bed and he invited Noriega to look closer at what the "Wizard" — "his Chief" — (Reagan) could create, O said. "Noriga stepped closer to see what Aquino was pointing out to him between my breasts. A large, carved baphomet appeared. Aquino had hypnotically regressed me to the time of its making which caused it to seemingly 'suddenly appear' right before Noriega's eyes..."

Noriega jumped back, terrified. "I believe Noriega stayed in the room for the rest of the demonstration simply because he was frozen in fear," O said, "Aquino hit me with a cat-o-nine-tails and I shrieked in pain. Noriega jumped. Aquino hit me with it again, this time activating me to respond sexually as though pain were pleasure — a mind control concept that Noriega more readily grasped. Then Aquino pointed out that the baphomet had disappeared as he cut me with a knife between my breasts using Byrd's hypnotic induction 'In like a knife, sharp and clean. I'll carve out what I want.'

"My trance had been deepened to the extent that my circulatory system was slowed," O said, " and I did not bleed until Aquino hypnotically changed my trance level. Aquino told Noriega that the baphomet carving had 'retreated to the depths of my body and soul, possessing me and evoking the 'heat of hell' as he commanded me to show my vaginal mutilation carving of the baphomet face. As I did, Aquino offered Noriega my sex, which Noriega refused as predicted with his eyes bulging in terror and revulsion. Aquino told him his 'rejection of me had killed me', and I ceased breathing and moving as conditioned. Noriega was dumbfounded as Aquino laughed wickedly and threatened, 'Even death would not permit me escape from the Wizard's (Reagan's) power'. He explained that I was the 'Wizard's own' and 'under his spell' and would 're-energize myself and come back to life.' He handed me the vaginal prod to masturbate myself, pushing the button to electrically jolt myself internally upon command. Noriega's eyes were enormous, he paled to a sickly gray, his mouth fell open and he ran out the door as Aquino assured him that he had 'no where to run, no where to hide from Reagan's powers."

According to O, Noriega interpreted the demonstration as a "threat from the depths of hell, which should have been enough to (make him) heed Reagan's commands to break the drug trafficking ties immediately..."

After I'd made the excerpts from her book I sent a draft to O for corrections. I hope I made them all. She added a few points in her letters to me that I think are worth sharing about the process of deprogramming she experienced with Mark Phillips:

Mark taught me the ins and outs of my own mind within the first 30 days of the process in order that I retrieve my memory myself... free of outside influence. By trancing myself deeper (I was already entranced), I was able to unlock various memory compartments with his knowledge of keys, codes, triggers, formulas, and accurately retrieve memory. I had to logically learn to decipher scrambles from reality. By common definition, MPD is the mind's sane defense to trauma too horrible to comprehend...

Mark's greatest influence on my deprogramming process was to help me deal with reality in order that the "incomprehensible" become comprehensible. Otherwise I would have fragmented further. He accomplished this by teaching me the revivification memory recovery method vs. the commonly used regression/abreaction method. (NLP calls this "triple dissociation".) Rather than reliving the events, I watched them on my mind's screen, deepening my trance as needed for reality checks. I untangled scrambles by using common sense(s)!... smelling the smells, seeing the views, tasting the sweat, etc... without having to re-experience the pain...

I am now reintegrated and most everyone who is qualified to judge it clinically speaking and who possesses common sense knows it..

My choice of terminology has been learned since childhood. You must remember that I had a photographic memory and I recorded all conversations going on around me. Like surgeons who don't give thought to the fact that their anesthetized patient can subconsciously hear them as they perform surgery, Aquino didn't give thought to my overhearing him talking with his "understudies" during my programming sessions and/or Hands on Demonstrations..

Mark went to extreme lengths to make sure that I reintegrated and deprogrammed into ME... not him. I had to "follow some long, hard roads" to learn certain things (seemingly) unnecessarily, just because Mark was concerned with my individuality. He could have provided me with "shortcuts" by sharing what he knows... including certain language... but no! He put me through the paces of learning all on my own, stumbling along the way... I respect him and love him all the more for his precautions to ensure he not influence me... especially considering where I have been!

This is personal... but I felt compelled to tell you so that you will better understand this aspect of my individuality and the importance of the Love Factor in the deprogramming process...

MINDWAR

In 1981, Major Michael A. Aquino collaborated with Colonel Paul E. Vallely to produce a paper entitled From PSYOP to MindWar: The Psychology of Victory. The paper was submitted to Military Review and Parameter, the publication of the U.S. Army War College. It was widely circulated among the psyop community and among mind control researchers without a copyright notice. Finally it appeared in its entirety in Milton William Cooper's Behold A Pale Horse,[36] a 1991 work that deals largely with the question of Unidentified Flying Objects. In that this paper has unquestionably been placed in the public domain, and due to its brevity, it is included here in its entirety:

> LTC John Alexander's Military Review article in support of "psychotronics" – intelligence and operational employment of ESP – was decidedly provocative.[37] Criticism of research in this area, based as it is on 'existing frontiers of scientific law, brings to mind the laughter that greeted the Italian scientist Spallanzani in 1794 when he suggested that bats navigate in the dark by means of what we now call sonar. "If they see with their ears, then do they hear with their eyes?" went the joke, but I suspect that the U.S. Navy is glad someone took the idea seriously enough to pursue it.
> Psychotronic research is in its infancy, but the U.S. Army already possesses an operational weapons system designed to do what LTC Alexander would like ESP to do – except that this weapons system uses existing communications media. It seeks to map the minds of neutral and enemy individuals and then to change them in accordance with U.S. national interests. It does this on a wide scale, embracing military units, regions, nations, and blocs. In its present form it is called Psychological Operations (PSYOP).
>
> Does PSYOP work, or is it merely a cosmetic with which field commanders would rather not be bothered?

The following footnotes to MindWar are by Vallely and Aquino:

[37] Alexander, Lieutenant Colonel John B., "The New Mental Battlefield:' Beam me up, Spock'" in Military Review, Vol. LX, No.12, December 1980.

Had that question been asked in 1970, the answer would have been that PSYOP works very well indeed. In 1967 and 1968 alone, a total of 29,276 armed Viet Cong/NVA (the equivalent of 95 enemy infantry battalions) surrendered to ARVN or MACV forces under the Chieu Hoi amnesty program – the major PSYOP effort of the Vietnam War. At the time MACV estimated that the elimination of that same number of enemy troops in combat would have cost us 6,000 dead.[38]

On the other hand, we lost the war – not because we were out-fought, but because we were out-PSYOPed. Our national will to victory was attacked more effectively than we attacked that of the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong, and perception of this fact encouraged the enemy to hang on until the United States finally broke and ran for home.

So our PSYOP failed. it failed not because its principles were unsound, but rather because it was outmatched by the PSYOP of the enemy. The Army's efforts enjoyed some battlefield success, but MACV PSYOP did not really change the minds of the enemy populace, nor did it defend the U.S. populace at home against the propaganda of the enemy. Furthermore the enemy's PSYOP was so strong that it -- not bigger armies or better weapons -- overcame all of the Cobras and Spookys and ACAVs and B-52s we fielded. The lesson is not to ignore our own PSYOP capability, but rather to change it and strengthen it so that it can do precisely that kind of thing to our enemy in the next war. Better hardware is nice, but by itself it will change nothing if we do not win the war for the mind.

The first thing it is necessary to overcome is a view of PSYOP that limits it to routine, predictable, over-obvious, and hence marginally effective "leaflet and loudspeaker" applications. Battlefield devices of this sort have their place, but it should be that of an accessory to the main effort. That main effort cannot begin at the company or division level; it must originate at the national level. It must strengthen our national will to victory and it must attack and ultimately destroy that of the enemy. It both causes and is affected by physical combat, but it is a type of war which is fought on a far more subtle basis as well -- in the minds of the national populations involved.

So let us begin with a simple name change. We shall rid ourselves of the self-conscious, almost "embarrassed" concept of "psychological operations". In its place we shall create MindWar. The term is harsh and fear-inspiring, and so it should be: It is a term of attack and victory – not one of rationalization and coaxing and conciliation. The enemy may be offended by it; that is quite all right as long as he is defeated by it. A definition is offered:

Mindwar is the deliberate, aggressive, convincing of all participants in a war that we will win that war.

It is deliberate in that it is a planned, systematic, and comprehensive effort involving all levels of activity from the strategic to the tactical. It is aggressive because opinions and attitudes must be actively changed from those antagonistic to us to those supportive of us if we are to achieve victory. We will not win if we content ourselves with countering opinions and attitudes instilled by enemy governments. We must reach the people before they resolve to support their armies, and we must reach those armies before our combat troops ever see them on battlefields.

[38] "Chieu Hoi: The Winning Ticket". MACV Command Information Pamphlet. 6-69, March 1969.

Compare this definition with that of psychological warfare as first offered by General William Donovan of the OSS in his World War II - era Basic Estimate of Psychological Warfare:

"Psychological warfare is the coordination and use of all means, including moral and physical, by which the end is attained -- other than those of recognized military operations, but including the psychological exploitation of the result of those recognized military actions -- which tend to destroy the will of the enemy to achieve victory and to damage his political or economic capacity to do so; which tend to deprive the enemy of the support, assistance, or sympathy of his allies or associates or of neutrals, or to prevent his acquisition of such support, assistance, or sympathy; or which tend to create, maintain, or increase the will to victory of our own people and allies and to acquire, maintain or to increase the support, assistance, and sympathy of neutrals."[39]

If the euphemism "psychological operations" resulted from, as one general officer put it in a 1947 letter, "a great need for a synonym which could be used in peacetime that would not shock the sensibilities of a citizen of democracy," then it may have succeeded domestically.[40] On the other hand it does not seem to have reassured the sensibilities of the Soviets who in 1980 describe U.S. Army PSYOP as including: "... unpardonable methods of ideological sabotage including not just flagrant lies, slander, and disinformation, but also political blackmail, provocation, and terror."[41]

The reluctance with which the Army has accepted even an "antiseptic" PSYOP component is well-documented in Colonel Alfred Paddock's brilliant treatise on the history of the PSYOP establishment. Again and again efforts to forge this weapon into its most effective configuration were frustrated by leaders who could not or would not see that wars are fought and won or lost not on battlefields but in the minds of men. As Colonel Paddock so aptly concludes:

"In a real sense, the manner in which psychological and unconventional warfare evolved from 1941 until their union as a formal Army capability in 1952 suggests a theme that runs throughout the history of special warfare: the story of a hesitant and reluctant Army attempting to cope and concepts and organizations of an unconventional nature."[42]

According to present doctrine, PSYOP is considered an accessory to the main effort of winning battles and wars; the term generally used in "force multiplier." It is certainly not considered a precondition to command decisions. Thus PSYOP cannot predetermine the political or psychological effectiveness of a given military action. It can only be used to paint that action in the best possible colors as it is taken.

MindWar cannot be so relegated. It is, in fact, the strategy to which tactical warfare must conform if it is to achieve maximum effectiveness. The MindWar scenario must be preeminent in the mind of the commander and must be the principal factor in his every field decision. Otherwise he sacrifices measures which actually contribute to winning the war to measures of immediate, tangible satisfaction. (Consider the rationale for "body counts" in Vietnam.)

Accordingly PSYOP "combat support" units as we now know them must become a thing of the past. MindWar teams must offer technical expertise to the commander from the onset of the planning process, and at all levels down to that of the battalion. Such teams cannot be composed -- as they are now -- of branch-immaterial officers and NCOs who know simply the basics of tactical propaganda operations. They must be composed of full-time experts who strive to translate the strategy of national MindWar into tactical goals which maximize the effective winning of the war and minimize loss of life. Such MindWar teams will win commanders' respect only if they can deliver on their promises.

What the Army now considers to be its most effective PSYOP -- tactical PSYOP -- is actually the most limited and primitive effort, due to the difficulties of formulating and delivering messages under battlefield constraints. Such efforts must continue, but they are properly seen as a reinforcement of the main MindWar effort. If we do not attack the enemy's will until he reaches the battlefield, his nation will have strengthened it as best it can. We must attack that will before it is thus locked in place. We must instill in it a predisposition to inevitable defeat. Strategic MindWar must begin the moment war is considered to be inevitable. It must seek out the attention of the enemy nation through every available medium, and it must strike at that nation's potential soldiers before they put on their uniforms. It is in their homes and their communities that they are most vulnerable to MindWar. Was the United States defeated in the jungles of Vietnam, or was it defeated in the streets of American cities?

To this end MindWar must be strategic in emphasis, with tactical applications playing a reinforcing, supplementary role. In its strategic context, MindWar must reach out to friends, enemies, and neutrals alike across the globe -- neither through the primitive "battlefield" leaflets and loudspeakers of PSYOP nor thorough the media possessed by the Untied States which have the capabilities to reach virtually all people on the face of the Earth. These media are, of course, the electronic media -- television and radio. State of the art developments in satellite communication, video recording techniques, and laser and optical transmission of broadcasts make possible a penetration of the minds of the world such as would have been inconceivable just a few years ago. Like the sword Excalibur, we have but to reach out and seize this tool; and it can transform the world for us if we have but the courage and the integrity to guide civilization with it. If we do not accept Excalibur, then we relinquish our ability to inspire foreign cultures with our morality. If they then devise moralities unsatisfactory to us, we have no choice but to fight them on a more brutish level.

MindWar must target all participants if it is to be effective. It must not only weaken the enemy; it must strengthen the United States. It strengthens the United States by denying enemy propaganda access to our people, and by explaining and emphasizing to our people the rationale for our national interest in a specific war. Under existing United States law, PSYOP units may not target American citizens. That prohibition is based upon the presumption that 'propaganda' is necessarily a lie or at least a misleading half-truth, and that the government has no right to lie to the people. The Propaganda Ministry of Goebbels must not be part of the American way of life. Quite right, and so it must be axiomatic of MindWar that it always speaks the truth. Its power lies in its ability to focus recipients' attention on the truth of the future as well as that of the present. MindWar thus involves the stated promise of a truth that the United States has resolved to make real if it is not already so.

MindWar is not new. Nations' greatest -- and least costly -- victories have resulted from it, both in time of actual combat and in time of threatened combat. Consider the atomic attacks on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The physical destruction of those two cities did not destroy Japan's ability to continue fighting. Rather the psychological shock of the weapons destroyed what remained of Japan's national will to fight. Surrender followed; a long and costly ground invasion was averted.

MindWar's effectiveness is a function of its skillful use of communications media, but no greater error could be made than to confuse MindWar with merely a greater and more unprincipled propaganda effort. "Propaganda" as defined by Harold Lasswell "is the expression of opinions or actions carried out deliberately by individuals or groups with a view to influencing the opinions or actions of other individuals or groups for predetermined ends and through psychological manipulations."[43]

Propaganda, when it is recognized as such -- and anything produced by a "PSYOP" unit is so recognized -- is automatically assumed to be a lie or at least a distortion of truth. Therefore it works only to the extent that a militarily- pressed enemy is willing to do what we want him to do. It does not work because we have convinced him to see the truth as we see it.

In his "conclusions" chapter to the Army's exhaustive 1976 case-study of PSYOP techniques, L. John Martin affirms this coldly and bluntly:

"What all this boils down to is that if our persuasive communication ends up with a net positive effect, we must attribute it to luck, not science ... The effectiveness of propaganda may be even less predictable and controllable than the effectiveness of mere persuasive communication."[44]

Correspondingly propagandists are assumed to be liars and hypocrites, willing to paint anything in attractive colors to dupe the gullible. As Jacques Ellul puts it:

"The propagandist is not, and cannot be, a 'believer.' Moreover he cannot believe in the ideology he must use in his propaganda. He is merely a man at the service of a party, a state, or some other organization, and his task is to insure the efficiency of that organization... If the propagandist has any political conviction, he must put it aside in order to be able to use some popular mass ideology. He cannot even share that ideology, for he must use it as an object and manipulate it without the respect that he would have for it if he believed in it. He quickly acquires contempt for these popular images and beliefs..."[45]

Unlike PSYOP, MindWar has nothing to do with deception or even with 'selected' – and therefore misleading - truth. rather it states a whole truth that, if it does not now exist, will be forced into existence by the will of the United States. The examples of Kennedy's ultimatum to Khrushchev during the Cuban Missile crisis and Hitler's stance at Munich may be cited. A MindWar message does not have to fit conditions of abstract credibility as do PSYOP themes; its source makes it credible. As Livy once said:

"The terror of the Roman name will be such that the world shall know that, once a Roman army has laid siege to a city, nothing will move it -- not the rigors of winter nor the weariness of months and years -- that it knows no end but victory and is ready, if a swift and sudden stroke will not serve, to preserve until that victory is achieved."[47]

Unlike Ellul's cynical propagandist, the MindWar operative must know that he speaks the truth, and he must be personally committed to it. What he says is only a part of MindWar; the rest -- and the test of its effectiveness -- lies in the conviction he projects to his audience, in the rapport he establishes with it. And this is not something which can be easily faked, if in fact it can be faked at all "Rapport" which the Comprehensive Dictionary of Psychological and Psychoanalytical Terms defines as "unconstrained relations of mutual confidence", approaches the subliminal; some researchers have suggested that it is itself a subconscious and perhaps even ESP-based "accent" to an overt exchange of information. Why does one believe one television newsman more than another, even though both may report the same headlines? The answer is that there is rapport in the former case; and it is a rapport which is recognized and cultivated by the most successful broadcasters.

We have covered the statement of inevitable truth and the conviction behind that statement; these are qualities of the MindWar operative himself. The recipient of the statement will judge such messages not only by his conscious understanding of them, but also by the mental conditions under which he receives them. The theory behind "brainwashing" was that physical torture and deprivation would weaken the mind's resistance to suggestion, and this was true to a point. But in the long run brainwashing does not work, because intelligent minds later realize their suggestibility under such conditions and therefore discount impressions and opinions inculcated accordingly.

For the mind to believe in its own decisions, it must feel that it made those decisions without coercion. Coercive measures used by the MindWar operative, consequently, must not be detectable by ordinary means. There is no need to resort to mind-weakening drugs such as those explored by the CIA; in fact the exposure of a single such method would do unacceptable damage to MindWar's reputation for truth.[48] Existing PSYOP identifies purely sociological factors which suggest appropriate idioms for messages. Doctrine in this area is highly developed, and the task is basically one of assembling and maintaining individuals and teams with enough expertise and experience to apply the doctrine effectively. This, however is only the sociological dimension of target receptiveness measures. There are some purely natural conditions under which minds may become more or less receptive to > ideas, and MindWar should take full advantage of such phenomena as atmospheric electromagnetic activity,[49] air ionization[50] and extremely low frequency waves.[51]

> At the root of any decision to institute MindWar in the U.S. defense establishment is a very simple question: Do we wish to win the net war in which we choose to become involved, and do we wish to do so with minimum loss of human life, at minimum expense, and in the least amount of time? If the answer is yes, then MindWar is a necessity. If we wish to trade that kind of victory for more American lives, economic disaster, and negotiated stalemates, then MindWar is inappropriate, and if used superficially will actually contribute to our defeat. In MindWar there is no substitute for victory.

Within this article there looms layer upon layer of meaning. It's obvious that the authors of MindWar are familiar with the techniques of NeuroLinguistics Programming and/or hypnosis. They argue that a clear future should be suggested, which is a powerful tool of communicating with the unconscious called "future-pacing". They also suggest that the MindWar be waged covertly,

[49] Atmospheric electromagnetic (EM) activity: The human body communicates internally by EM and electrochemical impulses. The EM field displayed in Kirlian photographs, the effectiveness of acupuncture, and the body's physical responses to various types of EM radiation (x-rays, infrared radiation, visible light spectra, etc.) are all examples of human sensitivity to EM forces and fields. Atmospheric EM activity is regularly altered by such phenomena as sunspot eruptions and gravitational stresses which distort the Earth's magnetic field. Under varying external EM conditions, humans are more or less disposed to the consideration of new ideas. MindWar should be timed accordingly. Per Dr. L.J. Ravitz: "Electrodynamic field constructs add fuel to the assumption unifying living matter harmoniously with the operations of nature, postulating that each biologic thing is organized by a total dynamic pattern, the expression of an electromagnetic field no less than non-living systems; and that as points on spectrums, these two entities may at last take their positions in the organization of the universe in a way both explicable and rational... A tenable theory has been provided for emergence of the nervous system, developing not from functional demands, but instead deriving as a result of dynamic forces imposed on cell groups by the total field pattern. living matter now has a definition of state based on relativity field physics, through which it has been possible to detect a measurable property of total state functions." (Ravitz, Leonard J., M.S., M.D., F.R.S.H., "Electro-magnetic Field Monitoring of Changing State-Function, Including Hypnotic States" in Journal of American Society of Psychosomatic Dentistry and Medicine, Vol. 17, No. 4, 1970.)

[50] Ionization of the air: An abundance of negative condensation nuclei ("air ions") in ingested air enhances alertness and exhilaration, while an excess of positive ions enhances drowsiness and depression. Calculation of the ionic balance of a target audience's atmospheric environment will be correspondingly useful. Again this is a naturally-occurring condition – caused by such varying agents as solar ultraviolet light, lightning, and rapidly-moving water – rather than one which must be artificially created. (Detonation of nuclear weapons, however, will alter atmospheric ionization levels.) See for example Soyke, Fred and Edmonds, Alan, The Ion Effect. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1977.

[51] Extremely Low Frequency ELF waves: ELF waves (up to 100 Hz) are once more naturally occurring, but they can also be produced artificially (such as for the Navy's Project Sanguine for submarine communication). ELF-waves are not normally noticed by the unaided senses, yet their resonant effect upon the human body has been connected to both physiological disorders and emotional distortion. Infrasound vibration (up to 20 Hz) can subliminally influence brain activity to align itself to delta, theta, alpha, or beta wave patterns, inclining an audience toward everything from alertness to passivity. Infrasound could be used tactically, as ELF-waves endure for great distances; and it could be used in conjunction with media broadcasts as well. End of Mind War Notes invisibly, which any NLP practitioner knows has more effect than addressing the problem up front, to the conscious mind, which would only lock a state in, bringing forth all sorts of defense responses and making change more difficult.

Aquino and Vallely's footnote referring to the first edition of Operation Mind Control, methinks, protests too much, especially since this book does not single out drugs as the main tool of mind control, and a successful psyop of that day was "Just say No" to drugs. Most students of NLP know that negative phrases can be used as effective embedded commands to produce the opposite effect. Most parents know, when dealing with a young child, to try a little reverse psychology. The "just say no" slogan, and the billboards with a photo of a man with a gun up his nose and the slogan "Say No to Cocaine" under it, may have been just part of a successful psyop campaign which got Americans to take more drugs. It's well-known by now that the "war on drugs" is a complete failure. The extent to which the cryptocracy's black funds depends upon the drug trade is also widely noted. George Bush gave the game away, many believe, during one of his televised debates with Clinton when he wiped his nose in an involuntary response after he said the word "cocaine."

The MindWar article is quite revealing even though it is written to appeal to the War College and the community which, it turns out, is the number one target of mind control, the military. The authors of MindWar have a vested interest in playing the old standby "War on Drugs" tune, in the "garbage in/ garbage out" system which makes up not only the standard American education, but especially the standard military education when it comes to the "soft" subjects.

The authors give their Nazi leanings away when they cite Goebbels and Nazi examples, but that fits right in with the large Nazi German contingency which was incorporated into the cryptocracy under Operation Paperclip.[52] "Denying enemy propaganda access to our people", the authors suggest is desirable without so much as a glance at the Bill of Rights which guarantees freedom of speech etc. Goebbels would be proud of them, yet they claim that the "Propaganda Ministry of Goebbels must not be part of the American way of life." Whatever that means -- perhaps an example of good MindWar deniability technique, first you say one thing in a disguised fashion, then you deny that it means what it means. Does this seem all too familiar? And as Paul Wilcher's letter to Janet Reno (in the chapter FIRES OF WACO) indicates PSYOP units have, at least on that occasion, for 51 days, targeted American citizens within the U.S. The authors state that U.S. law does not permit that. But they cleverly deem no recognition of the existence of a cryptocracy which operates above the law.

One of the authors, Michael A. Aquino was a disciple of Anton Levey's Church of Satan for ten years. The C of S was among a half dozen Satanist churches and organizations which were influenced by the magical secrets of National Socialism in Germany. A number of radical-right groups had tried to ally themselves with The Church of Satan, including the American Nazi party and Robert Shelton's United Klans of America. Publicly, LaVey had maintained his distance. Secretly, there was reason to believe that a strong bond existed.

As author, Arthur Lyons notes in Satan Wants You, "... the historical affinity between occultism and the radical right has been well documented. Both believe and adhere to the conspiracy theory of history -- that is, the events are shaped by the workings of small, elite, but concealed groups -- and both believe in the ability of one man, whether it be a Magus or a Hitler, to alter global events through the sheer force of his will..

"Radical rightists saw an ally in LaVey presumably because of his Machiavellian, power-oriented philosophy and because of public statements he'd made advocating establishment of a "benign police state," not to mention the strong Germanic flavor of some of his rituals..."[53]

A 1971 Newsweek article expressed concern about LaVey's political intentions: "If there is anything fundamentally diabolic about LaVey, it stems more from the echoes of Nazism in his theories than from the horror-comic trappings of his cult."[54]

That the cryptocracy hides within the radical-right goes without question. Perhaps through outright rightist patriotism or insidious effects of mind control a number of Nazi and Satanist organizations are funded, guided and controlled by the cryptocracy.

The editor of the Church of Satan's newsletter, Michael Aquino, accused LaVey of selling priesthood's and, in 1975 broke with him to found the Temple of Set (Set being a lesser known name for the Devil himself.) According to one declassified Army Intelligence file (#81-776) the Temple of Set "is a small group but nonetheless has several hundred members and operates on a National level. Aquino is the official head of the organization and rules the organization through a council of nine, who are in fact his chief lieutenants." An 1981 check of files of the FBI by Colonel Donald Press, concerning the Temple of Set "reflected no record of such an organization."

While spokespersons for the Church of Set would deny that the Church is politically aligned with Nazism, they admit to a fascination with Nazi black magic. In fact, following the footsteps of SS leader Heinrich Himmler, on October 19, 1992, Aquino held a magical "working" in the Hall of the Dead in the North tower of Wewelsburg Castle. Wewelsburg was conceived by Himmler to be the focus of the Hall of the Dead, and was frequently used in secret Nazi SS rituals to summon the powers of darkness at this "their most powerful locus."

In a paper entitled The Wewelsburg Working, Aquino describes the results of his black magic ritual:

> First, the suction-like impression of the inflow of certain realizations and kinds of knowledge (accompanied by an almost 'electrical' sort of exhilaration), which seemed to have 'remained dormant' pending an 'activating' Working of this sort. Second, an extended 'reverberation' or 'echoing' of the focus of this Working within the Walhalla, culminating in its sending-forth into the material world.
>
> The central features of the various principal occultisms of the 19th and 20th centuries CE ran through my consciousness almost as a pageant. I understood the object of this to be an exposure of contrasts, inaccuracies, and inconsistencies - a vast, spiraling dialectic designed to clear away the debris of sectarianism and superficiality in the search for the key principles of the true Powers of Darkness.
>
> Concepts of 'will', 'intelligence', 'self- consciousness', 'initiation', and 'magic' appeared in turn and fell aside as well... The intelligent mind cannot be 'escaped' so easily. If it is argued, convinced, threatened, hypnotized, drugged, or diseased into non-rational channels, then its self-consciousness will merely reassert itself in some other form. This, I understood in the Wewelsburg, was the 'magical epitaph' of Nazi Germany: that, in fighting against certain features of the mind, it had seemed at first to succeed - but then had thus unleashed other, even less desirable features of that same mind which had previously remained in some rough degree of socially-controlled equilibrium before this ultimately disastrous experiment in 'conscious evolution' was attempted.
> The chamber in which I stood, I now realized, was nothing less than an SS laboratory for experiments in 'conscious evolution' - a sort of 'Krel machine' without computerized, science-fiction accouterments. It was not designed to teach or educate, rather to mirror and enhance thoughts and impulses already in existence. Hence its effect on the consciousness could be devastating for better or for worse..
> Here in the Hall of the Dead, Heinrich Himmler's Sanctum Sanctorum and 'Mittelpunkt der Welt', was the Earthly focus of that which has been thus symbolized by the Order of the Trapezoid. The reality of this chamber rushed in upon me. This was no Hollywood set, no ordinary room painted and decorated to titillate the senses. 1,235 inmates of the Niederhagen concentration comp died during the reconstruction of the Wewelsburg for the SS. If the Marble Hall and the Walhalla were memorials to a certain unique quality in mankind, they also serve as grisly reminders of the penalty which mankind pays for that quality.."

Lyons offers a chilling quote by Aquino, one which, in light of present developments has the uncanny ring of the prophecy of a cryptocracy insider:

"We are fortunate that the Auschwitz taboo prevents people from looking too closely at... Nazi Germany, or from experimenting with any of its regular governmental doctrines. Because they work. They are the essence of true political power. Anti-Semitism is irrelevant to them... It is ironically true that a right-wing backlash in the United States -- which is what the neo-Nazis are hoping for -- would wipe them out first. If an American Fuehrer does appear, he won't be wearing a uniform with a swastika armband. He will wear a business suit, and he will be calling popular attention to the patriotic virtues in 1776."[55]

One has to wonder, is Aquino himself a victim of mind control? Could he simply be mentally ill? Or both, for as you shall no doubt begin to ask, where does one begin and the other leave off, for the victimizers as well as the victims?

An article in the National Enquirer[56] was headlined: "Devil Worshiper Holds Sensitive Army Post and Top Brass Say 'No Problem.' Written by Chris Fuller the article said: " A senior U.S. military intelligence officer with a secret security clearance admits he's also the founder and high priest of a satanic church -- and amazingly the Army says "no problem"!

The article quoted Aquino saying: " My religion has been no secret in the Army." It said Col. Aquino served as a psychological warfare specialist in Vietnam and "is now a reserve officer working full-time on extended duty at the Army's reserve personnel center in St. Louis." He admitted satanic terminology is used in his church's rituals, adding: "We are quite proud of that."

"Col. Aquino's satanic church is advertised in the yellow pages in San Francisco, where he was stationed from 1981 to 1986," the article said. "He says most members are in the U.S. and Canada although 'we have a sprinkling of members in places like Western Europe and the Pacific.'

"The Constitution's guarantee of freedom of religion protects Col. Aquino from action by the Army," the article quoted Lieut. Col. Greg Rixon, an Army public affairs officer in Washington, D.C. saying. "'As long as an individual's religious practice remains within the limit of the law, there is no problem."

The 1981 intelligence file previously cited reports: "Allegedly, Aquino has sexual identity problems and is known to frequent prostitutes in San Francisco in order to become involved in various forms of Sadomasochistic sexual activities. It is believed that Aquino is bi-sexual."

In the November 1987 issue of Newsweek magazine tabbed him "the second beast of revelation" in the wake of a criminal investigation by the San Francisco Police Department involving allegation of child molestation. A year earlier, a civilian child day-care worker at the Presidio Army base was charged by police in connection with the alleged molestation of as many as 60 children. The allegations against the day-care worker, Gary Hambright were:

> He had taken children to private homes, including two on army property, where they had been sexually molested.
> Other children talked about a 'googoo' game in which they were urinated and defecated on by 'Mr. Gary.'
>
> Pencils were used to doodle on the skin and genitals of the children and were also inserted in at least one child's anus.
>
> A gun was pointed at the head of an adult in front of the children.
> There were five confirmed cases among the children of clamydia, a sexually transmitted disease.

All charges against Hambright were eventually dropped. The parents of the children said it was because strong pressure was put on the federal investigators and the San Francisco police.

Then, Aquino's face appeared much older in a 1988 article in the San Jose Mercury News. Bylined Linda Goldston the article read: "Six months after the U.S. Attorney's Office closed the Presidio child sex abuse case, the Army has launched a new investigation of one of the original suspects in the matter -- a high-ranking officer who founded a satanic church, according to those close to the probe.

"Lt. Col. Michael Aquino, founder and high priest of the Temple of Set, has been formally notified of the criminal investigation and had his top security clearance suspended, according to sources. Most of the sources would speak only on the condition that they not be named.

"Neither Army officials nor Aquino would discuss the investigation which revolves around allegations that children were sexually abused at the day care center run by the U.S. Army at the Presidio of San Francisco."

Aquino, 42 at the time, was by then stationed in St. Louis. He had been branded, he said, in the earlier probe by allegations against him and his wife. He called the investigation a witch hunt, and vehemently denied any wrongdoing. No charges were filed against Aquino in the earlier investigation and charges against another man were dropped.

Lt. Col. Greg Rixon, spokesman for the Department of the Army at the Pentagon, said, "It's still a privacy matter until charges are brought... I don't know what will transpire next."

Others "close to the investigation" which was being conducted by the Army's Criminal Investigation Division in Washington -- said that parents involved in the original sex abuse case were being re-interviewed and told about the new probe.

"In our case, we've been told that he's (Aquino) under investigation for kidnapping, sodomy and knowingly and maliciously making false charges against another officer," said Michelle Adams-Thompson whose then-3-year-old daughter first accused Aquino of molestation

Adams-Thompson and her husband, the Rev. Larry Adams-Thompson, the former assistant chaplain at the Presidio, were informed of the new probe Nov. 23 by an investigator for the CID. "He has officially been titled,' said Larry Adams-Thompson.

According to Mary Melanson, spokeswoman for the CID in Washington, being titled under the uniform code of military justice means "we feel there is sufficient evidence to believe a crime has been committed," the article said.

'The closest thing in civilian terms would be a grand jury indictment,' Melanson said.

"The new investigation is the latest move in the case, which began when one boy said he was molested in November 1986 at the day care center, and grew to include allegations that as many as 60 children were involved.

"Charges were filed and withdrawn twice by U.S. Attorney Joseph Russoniello against Gary Hambright, a Southern Baptist minister and former civilian worker at the day care center. Russoniello's controversial decision to formally close the case in June came after an 18-month investigation by the FBI and the Army," the article said.

Russoniello had said he did "everything we could to build a case," but, he said, he thought prosecution would not be successful. In addition to the 60 alleged cases of sexual abuse, investigators looked into two arson fires at the day care center.

They confirmed that five children had contracted chlamydia, a sexually transmitted disease.

"The seriousness of the new investigation is reflected in the suspension of Aquino's top security clearance," sources told the San Jose Mercury News. His security clearance had not been suspended during the previous investigation of the same case.

Aquino said in November 1987 that, "I have consistently since 1969 held either a secret or a top secret security clearance."

Aquino first was investigated in August 1987, after the Adams-Thompsons' daughter recognized him and his wife, Lilith, at a store at the Presidio, according to a San Francisco police report. The little girl identified Hambright from a photo lineup and said she had been driven to the Aquinos' San Francisco home by Hambright.

When she was driven to Leavenworth Street by investigators and asked to identify any of the houses she had been to before, the girl identified the Aquinos' home. The child also accurately described some features of the home, including a room with black walls. To police she identified Aquino as "Mikey" and his wife, Lilith Sinclair (aka Pat Wise) as "Shamby."

In statements to therapists and investigators, some children said they were abused at the day care center; others said they were abused while on field trips to private homes away from the center.

Twenty-two families filed $66 million in personal injury claims against the Army in connection with the case. Parents alleged that the Army's negligent operation of the day care center led to the abuse of their children. The Army refused to comment.

Aquino began to fight a media campaign against his persecutors. On February 17, 1988, Oprah Winfrey invited the Aquinos to answer for themselves before a national television audience.

On the show Aquino told Winfrey:" The Army has known about my religion for the entire span of my Army career, which began in 1968, and there was a resonable amount of curiosity, as there has been all the way along, with what exactly is this strange and unusual thing. And I have talked about it, much the same way that I've talked here today on your show about it. And other than that the Army has paid very little attention to it, the same as it would to anybody who's, say, a follower of Hinduism or of Buddhism or any other slightly unusual religion today?"

Continuing from the transcript of the Orah Winfrey Show prepared by Journal Graphics, Inc.:

WINFREY: So you just go about your Army duties and it's fine?

AQUINO: Uh-huh.

Following her usual format Windrey takes questions from the audience:

2ND AUDIENCE MEMBER: ...How do you apply your fom of Nazi occultism within your brand of satanism? When you review your material, you'll see Nazi occultism reflected through it.

AQUINO: How do we approach the Nazis' attitude towards --

2ND AUDIENCE MEMBER: How do you apply your form of Nazi occultism into your brand of satanism?

AQUINO: We do not advocate any of the Nazis' political principles, whatever. There was a good deal of occult study that went on during the Third Reich in Germany, and because the records of that exist, we have studied that much the same as we have studied magical records from a great many cultures throughout history. But I think if you have reviewed our literature at all, you will also find that there is a very strong prohibition against the sort of political and social values.

WINFREY: What you're telling us, Dr. Aquino, is that you are a good satanist?

AQUINO: We are indeed.

2ND AUDIENCE MEMBER: Are you pro-Hitler?

AQUINO: No, I am not pro-Hitler.

2ND AUDIENCE MEMBER: Are you against Hitler?

AQUINO: I am against Hitler.

2ND AUDIENCE MEMBER: But when you look in the material that you have, which I have some of it here, you can see the endorsement of Nazism.

MRS. AQUINO: You don't see any endorsement of Nazism. We're talking about occult practices of the Third Reich. We're not talking about their political and their social behavior, their criminal behavior. And that's very explicit in our literature, and it's pointed out in great detail, simply because people will misinterpret it just as you have done.

2ND AUDIENCE MEMBER: I just read it.

MRS. AQUINO: Read it again.

And yet later Winfrey brings on the usual panel of experts, among whom is Johanna Michaelsen, author of The Beautiful Side of Evil after one of the audience has said they witnessed the murder of a man when they were a member of the church, and another has brought up the alleged satanic practice of ritually murdering children.

> MS. MICHAELSON: Well, I think that what's important to realize is that, in a sense, Colonel Aquino has a point in that not necessarily every single satanist goup would do that (murder infants). Certainly we can't sit here or Officer Jones can't sit here and say, "Yes, we can prove that Mr. Aquino and his people are doing this." However, it is rather –
> WINFREY: Because wouldn't it be hard for him to be a lieutenant colonel in the U.S. Army –
>
> MS. MICHAELSON: Oh, not at all.
> WINDREY: No?
> MS. MICHAELSON: And in fact I firmly believe that many in the U.S. Army are deeply involved and perhaps have gone beyond what he publicly is willing to admit to going to. I mean, they're not going to sit here and say, "Yes", we murder children...

A short time after that Detective Larry Jones , an investigator of satanism, joins in the discussion.

> DET. JONES: .. We're hearing reports from survivors from across the country there are documentations coming in.The police are educating their own. In the last two or three years we've accepted the firefighters' philosophy that where there's smoke there's fire, and we're getting enough reports, we're starting to believe it.
>
> WINFREY: Of child molestation. You were accused also of child molestation,were you not, Dr. Aquino?
>
> AQUINO: And what he refers to is one of the cruelest examples of persecution that extends not just to people who are acknowledged satanists but to a great many innocent people around this country who are being accused wrongfully of ritual abuse of children on virtually no evidence at all. And to dispute what he has said in case after case after case for years and years, when these have been brought before investigation, where they've been brought into indictments and trials, again and again they've been thrown out because the so-called evidence –
> WINFREY: They've been thrown out because nobody believes the children, nobody believes the children...
>
> MRS. AQUINO: There's no evidence.
> MS. MICHAELSON: Well, that's exactly right. Who's going to believe in a modern civilized society that people are capable of such horrors? Few of us are willing to deal with it. So that when a three-year-old and a four-year-old or a six-year-old or even an adult survivor comes up and says, "I have seen children murdered, I have been a part of slaughtering little animals. I've been told my family will be killed if I speak up. I was placed in a coffin. I was forced to drink things that are hideous beyond belief," who's going to believe them? Which of you would say, "Oh, yes, this happens every day?" And I think this is one of the things which people, who are > indeed expert in brainwashing techniques, as I know you (to Aquino) yourself are a recognized expert in that, would count on that.

And a few moments later Winfrey is talking in the audience to a man identified only as 3rd Audience Member.

> 3RD AUDIENCE MEMBER*: With the doctor here, he was mentioning that no one's coming up with the bodies. I'm a criminal investigator; I investigate court-related crimes. And I've been now involved in a number of cases with the last, well, one indiviual, of course, killing his mother and stepfather as well as a Circle convenience store clerk, worshipping before his altar, before he went out to do this, and offering them up in human sacrifice.
> WINFREY: And Dr. Aquino would say, "Well, where is his card to prove that he is a certified member of the satanic church?"
> 3RD AUDIENCE MEMBER*: Well, first of all, Dr. Aquino, he's in prison. Okay, that's number one. The second case, which the altar was brought into the courtroom and tried; the body was never found, the legs was found, and he was very much a satanist. Every one of the cases that I've investigated now extending over 200, I have found this particular book that has been there.
>
> WINFREY: Which is The Satanic Bible.
> 3RD AUDIENCE MEMBER*: And I understand that there's traditional satanists, and I focus mainly on the non-traditional or self-stylist satanist. I understand that. But to say that there is no bodies and that these people are not committing crimes is the farthest from the truth.
>
> WINFREY: Yes, ma'am? You wanted to say something?
>
> AQUINO: Are you in fact a law enforcement official yourself attached with a law enforcement agency?
>
> WINFREY: Yes, he is.
> 3RD AUDIENCE MEMBER*: Yes, I am. I'm a commissioned law enforcement officer as well as with the courts in Logan County.
> AQUINO*: I would respond to that, that there may be indeed a number of people with warped personal value systems who, considering the devil to be something evil, might excuse their vicious deeds because of that. But I would deny that that's part of the satanic religion.

Earlier when Winfrey asked if human or animal sacrifices were performed at his temple, Aquino became indignant. He said that such talk "perverts" the idea of Satan. Aquino said that Satanists work "for the good of humankind," and that Satanism is a distinctive brand of human psychology.

Aquino brought suit against the Secretary of the Army in 1991 seeking to amend the Army report of criminal investigation about him and to recover damages caused by "inaccuracies in the report." Within two months Circuit Judge Niemeyer found: " that the secretary's decision not to amend was not arbitrary or capricious. Finding no reversible error, we affirm."

Judge Niemeyer's judgment went on to reveal that the investigation against Aquino was closed because "all further leads involved adults who refused to cooperate, and the applicable three year statute of limitations had expired in June 1989...

"... The child-abuse charges remained, because 'the evidence of alibi offered by LTC Aquino was not persuasive."

In The Book of Coming Forth by Night, written in 1985, Aquino describes a number of peculiar dreams and visions, expressing a consistent interest in mind control. Paraphrasing Crowley's Book of the Law, Aquino wrote:

> The Equinox has succumbed to my Solstice, and I, Set, am revealed in my Majesty... I am the ageless Intelligence of this Universe... and from my manifest semblance, which alone is not of Earth. Known as the Hebrew Satan, I chose to bring forth a Magus, according to the fashion of my word. He was charged to form a Church of Satan, that I might easily touch the minds of men (emphasis added) in this age they had cast for me.

Aquino is bright and "well educated." He graduated with honors from Santa Barbara High School in 1964 and was the National Commander of the Eagle Scout Honor Society of the Boy Scouts of America in 1965-66. He received a Department of the Army scholarship to the University of California and after graduation served his country as a Psyops officer in Vietnam where he received the Army Commendation Medal, Air Medal, Bronze Star, Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry from the Vietnamese Government, an Oak Leaf Cluster to the Army Commendation Medal, and a second Oak Leaf Cluster in 1980.

Not only is Aquino a citizen in good standing with the U.S. military (now the reserves), he's a member in good standing in academia. He is, in fact, a doctor, having obtained his Ph.D. in Political Science from the University of California, Santa Barbara in 1980. His dissertation was entitled The Neutron Bomb. His resume says he's qualified in International Relations, Comparative Politics, American Government and Political Theory. For several years he was a consulting faculty member of the U.S. Army Command and General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth Kansas. He's a member of the National Advisory Board of the American Security Council, a member of the World Future Society and the L5 Society and the Academy of Magical Arts, Inc. (the "Magic Castle" of Hollywood.)

Michael Aquino speaks fluent German as did his mother, the late Betty Ford. His interest in Nazism and intelligence may have been inherited from her. She was a child prodigy who was the youngest writer for The San Francisco Chronicle, and one of the youngest graduates of Stanford University. In the 1930's she lived in Germany and became close to a high-ranking SS officer, whom, it is said, she sculpted in the nude. It is not known whether Ms. Ford worked for Axis or Allied Intelligence agencies. She was certainly qualified for such spy duties during WWII. But perhaps she did no more than pass on unfulfilled interests in intelligence and Nazism to her son.

Other than his hard-core catechisms for the Temple of Set, one of Michael Aquino's resumes cites three books he's written as "future sequels to the film Star Wars: Secret of the Sith, Pantechnikon, and Xronos. He has been reported as having been identified standing outside the gate at Sky Walker Ranch forcing copies of these manuscripts upon people employed by George Lucas. Since Lucas does not received "unsolicited manuscripts" the manuscripts were returned unopened upon several occasions. One was subsequently published in a monster magazine.

The bizarre theatrical nature of Michael Aquino would appear unbounded. At least, so says more than one eyewitness to some of his more ingenious mind control work.

Satanic U.S. Army Psyops Col. Michael Aquino's religion is protected under the Constitution of The United States of America. Not only does he have the right to worship any god he chooses, a recent Supreme Court ruling found that a soldier in the army had the right to practice satanic rituals. At least one satanic soldier has been buried in Arlington National Cemetary for many years. (Photo courtesy of Linda Blood author of The New Satanists.)

PROJECT MONARCH?

Project Monarch, according to Mark Phillips[57], is a U.S. Defense Department project begun in the 1960's. Its code name was assigned to a subsection of the CIA's Operation Artichoke which later became Project MKultra. The Oxford English Dictionary might shed some light on why this code name was chosen:

> Monarch 1. In early use, a sole and absolute ruler of a title of king, queen, emperor, or empress, or the equivalent of one of these...
> 3. A very large red and black butterfly (Danais Plesippus)... The Monarch... is one of the commonest species throughout a great part of North America.
>
> Butterfly 1. An insect belonging to any of those diurnal species of lepidoptera, or scaly-winged flies, which have knobbed antennae, and carry their wings erect when at rest.
> 2.fig. A vain gaudily attired person (e.g. a courtier who flutters about the court); a lightheaded, inconstant person; a giddy trifler.
> b. Applied to something flimsy, like a butterfly's wings. 4. The guide for the reins on the front of a hansom cab, named from a fancied resemblance to a butterfly with extended wings...

So-called "Presidential Models", the most highly prized products of the Project Monarch mind control factories have a distinct (conditioned) habit of sitting very erect with their legs daintily perched. They serve kings and presidents and high ranking government officials as sex slaves. They are controlled by invisible reins. The Presidential Models have "fluttered about the White House" and European hideaways which, in another day, would have been the "courts." While they appear to be "lighthearted" and "inconstant" sex slaves, they are trained at the art of pillow talk and do, in fact, have memories like human tape-recorders.

[57] Phillips, Mark, The Top Secret Project Monarch, Arab, Alabama, 1994.

Phillips says Monarch was spawned from the collected research of top SS Nazi Scientists over the years 1927-1941. The identified leader of this research was Heinrich Himmler who was, as we have learned from Michael Aquino, a master of the "black arts". Fascinated by both occultism and genetic theories, Himmler's team of scientists took a" genealogical approach to transgenerational behavior modification". The idea was, apparently, in Phillips terms, to apply "trauma based" mind control to children for three or more generations so that the psychological aberrations which were conditioned would "breed true"

"The German government Top Secret ("BLACK ARTS") research was originally considered to be a significant "bonus" by-product of the US Department of Defense's Project 63 also known as Project National Interest. Project 63 was dedicated to the secret importation of a group of German Nazi and Italian fascists scientist whose areas of expertise were primarily physics, psychiatry, microbiology and pharmacology. Although Project Monarch has not been declassified... it nevertheless has become a household word among a multitude of Intelligence Community operatives."

Mark Phillips is a respected if controversial figure among researchers. Some think he's telling the truth about his background. Others think that he is a former cryptocrat who had a change of heart and is running great risk telling what he knows. Still others believe that he's still working for the cryptocracy as a disinformation agent. Three of his clients I've talked to sing his praises. All say that he helped them in ways in which the other psychologists or psychiatrists who treated them could not. Amid the swamp of name-calling and suspicion which makes up the "conspiracy underground" one researcher said he thinks that Phillips' most articulate client is a CIA agent and Phillips is under her control. None, however, have come forth to refute the information he gives, or dispute his credentials, so we can do no harm in repeating the information he offers, especially since it's been confirmed by others.

Phillips came by the Project Monarch information, piecemeal, when, as a young man, he was hired by a government sub-contractor (which he does not want to name as a precaution against lawsuits.) His job was in the sales and engineering department of one branch of this firm which had developed through its independent research an array of electronic devices which could be of great use in the cryptocracy's burgeoning mind control research. Through his exposure to some customers (military bases and State mental institutions) that were so sensitive, the government required him to obtain a "Top Secret" clearance from the US Department of Defense.

"I was required to take battery after battery of psychological tests... and when they were through they knew I would keep my mouth shut before I saw or heard anything," Phillips says.

"Then, I saw sensory deprivation tanks, electric grid rooms, harmonics generators, chairs wired for shock and sound, special "helmets" now known as "virtual reality" helmets which allow the wearer to see in three dimensions.

"I heard of formulas for mind altering hypnotic drugs that made LSD look like aspirin. I personally met scientists who were traveling the world, gathering seeds, leaves, roots and herbs from such places as the jungles of Zimbabwe. They were even consulting witch doctors looking for drugs that could affect the human brain and make predictable zombies.

Phillips said he talked to agents who studied with African witchdoctors like Credo Vusa'mazulu Mutwa. The stories of tokoloshe's they told Phillips matched this excerpt from Mutwa's story MY PEOPLE, Writings of a Zulu Witch-Doctor:[58]

> A tokoloshe is not a ghostly or supernatural phenomenon. He is a physical human being, and he operates along perfectly scientific lines. Mulundi had used a very small pigmy whose weight he had drastically reduced with a severe diet. He had furthermore turned the little creature into a zombie by a simple interference with his brain. A sharp awl can do the trick. He was posted up the marula tree and along a branch that reached across to the roof of Kambela's hut. With a long thong he lightly descended upon the roof of the hut and wriggled his skeletal little frame through the grass roof. He escaped the same way.
> This weird practice has today been perfected into a fine art. Cases are known to me where wizards have arranged the fake death of a particular person whom they have selected for a prospective zombie. The person is actually buried, but exhumed the same night and revived. He is then turned into a zombie and many days or weeks later heavily decorated with parts of other people's bodies, also exhumed from graves, the puppet is induced to pay a particular victim an unexpected visit. The victim simply dies of fright. It is as simple as that. Any chance eye-witness will relate a beautiful tokoloshe story to the police, and the police will dismiss it as so much nonsense.
> In later generations the wizards perfected their art of tkoloshe-making and they started breeding tokoloshes from childhood. As recently as 1922 there was a secret tokoloshe farm kept by a gang of wizards in the Drakensberg in Basutoland.
>
> With the arrival of the white man and Christianity, the killing of children who were born cretins and idiots went out of fashion, and these grotesque specimens of humanity grew plentiful. But an idiot is something no one misses should it mysteriously disappear -- the parents least of all – and many of these idiots, particularly female, landed up in the hands of these wizards. They reared them, and when they were adult, they mated with them and kept them in dark caves for their children to be born. Often in Basutoland - the land of ritual murder -- the babies were brought into the world the cesarean way with no concern over the life of the mother. Parts of her body were used for medicines that were administered to her own baby to make it grow up in an atmosphere of deep evil.
> The baby was reared by other idiot women who fed it a mixture of the milk of dogs, donkeys and cows, and the blood of raves and vultures. At the age of six months it > was subjected to specialized treatment for its particular task of the future. it was made to develop a crooked or hunch back by strapping it to a curved piece of wood. The legs too were strapped into attitudes that encouraged their growth into grotesque shapes. At the age of twelve the tongue was damaged to destroy speech. The child was taught to hate the world and idolize its wizard master.

> It was then put through a course of queer tricks ranging from tree climbing with its crooked limbs to burrowing underground. It was taught ways to commit murder and to remove all its tracks afterwards. When it had reached the age of about twelve, the wizard had in his hands a lean featherweight puppet-like creature, an unthinking robot that obeyed every command [emphasis added] -- a creature worth a hundred head of stolen cattle to the one who bred and trained him.
>
> Genuine tokoloshes are today found only in Basutoland and Nyasaland, where hiding places in the mountains can still be found for them.
>
> With the difficulties in breeding, rearing and keeping this kind of tokoloshe these days, the wizards have resorted to using baboons and monkeys. Their young are nowadays turned into the weirdest monstrosities and can be taught to do considerable damage to their master's enemies.
> There is currently a growing market for tokoloshes in South Africa. A trained monkey or baboon tokoloshe fetches as much as twenty-eight pounds.
> The tokoloshe is no figment of the imagination. The word tokoloshe means 'a great mysterious evil'. The Bantu will never portray one in a carving. When a Bantu describes something as a tokoloshe, he says 'a mysterious evil' and means 'mind your own business'.

Cryptocrats on both sides of the "Iron Curtain" created modern tokoloshe's. Phillips read the "pinks" (classified documents) which summarized the KGB's progress in selective and mass mind control techniques. To his surprise he found that the U.S. cryptocracy had cooperated with the Soviets and others in their mind control development.

"There was even a Top Secret Soviet weapons system which incorporated yet another "exotic" version of mind control -- electromagnetic directed energy -- the Scalar Weapons System."

One variety of mind control he found to be "hideously simple. It did not require any sophisticated electronics such as Ether Wave (Harmonics)," Phillips said.

This simple mind control technique involves only isolation (incarceration) deprivation of stimulace, clocks, and sleep; controlled intake of food and water; electroshock at precise intervals, high voltage for pain, lower voltage for the induction of implanted suggestions, hypnotic suggestions (often drug induced) all in combination.

"This," Phillips said, "was considered a 'secret weapon'.

"I was told that we tested this 'secret weapon' on captured spies. We found out everything they knew and made them forget how we found out. Then we reprogrammed them to return to their mother country and spy for us, then return when triggered to be reprogrammed.

"It seemed humane enough for the espionage business, but then I heard of 'suicide agents' programmed to perform a task they could not possibly complete without being captured by the enemy. I knew then that our spies no longer needed to carry a cyanide capsule with them on their missions. The use of this 'secret weapon' made it possible that, if a spy was caught, there would be a 'natural' failure of one or more of their organs. Their subconscious mind had been reprogrammed right over the top of their genetically encoded mind to facilitate this self-induced suicide. Better blue lips than loose lips! If they were caught, this program would 'kick in' and they would 'die of natural causes,'" Phillips said.

From the circle of cryptocrats with whom Phillips associated, he heard many bizarre tales. One was that Idi Ami had learned from a book by an obscure Nazi scientist how to somehow facilitate his sudden rise to power by cannibalism -- particularly eating the small walnut shaped pituitary gland and spinal cord of human beings. He heard of "electronic possession" which is created by transmitting voices into the minds of "expendable" individual test subjects via compressed wicrowaves.

"I heard of hideous crimes being committed by members of 'brainwashed' cults," Phillips said. "Serial killings were on the increase 200 fold. Some of the killers blamed Satan for their exploits and crimes, others could not legitimately remember anything. I heard that the leader of one religious cult had been 'educated' at the cost of over 2 million US dollars by a Pakistani secret service agent, who himself was educated by the same US Intelligence unit that President Carter denied existed, the one which trained a Cuban spy, Manuel Noriega, who later became a double agent, formerly of Panama, now a Florida 'resident'-- of one of our best prisons.

"I noticed how Rev. Jim Jones' former lawyer, Tim Stone, was apparently running 'containment' for the CIA in Marin County, California. And I personally knew of this US Army Major promoted to Lt. Col., attached to the Psychological Warfare Division and the Defense Intelligence Agency, who had ingeniously organized a "church", legal under the First Amendment of the Constitution. I learned that this Lt. Colonel, Michael Aquino, had, like Jim Jones, been supported by politicians and the CIA.

"What I didn't know at the time," Phillips said, "was that this operation would encompass every evil known to mankind. Sexual perversion, slavery, tortures of the mind and body, even ritual cannibalism. Age seemed to be no barrier -- children were being used in Satanic rituals, filmed pornographically, and beautiful young women used for Project Monarch, trained to sexually service politicians, bankers, law enforcement officials, and to mule drugs, and carry secret messages locked behind post-hypnotic blocks. These people are now being bought and sold -- specifically programmed to tasks too disgusting to describe."

Phillips is talking about slaves of the cryptocracy, human "butterflies" created by Project Monarch. Many were assassinated after they were no longer useful. They were "thrown from the Freedom Train," Phillips says.

According to Phillips, Project Monarch has four distinct levels of behavior modification named Alpha, Beta, Delta and Theta.

Alpha is considered "'regular programming.' This is actually what would be considered the 'base control personality'. Originally the purpose of Alpha programming was to condition the mind through torture so that Black Ops mercenaries and espionage agents could perform certain difficult tasks. This program also locks in photographic memory and improves physical strength. Visual acuity is radically improved. It develops in the individual a number of almost super-human traits.

"Alpha programming," Phillips says, "is accomplished through deliberately subdividing the victim's personality, which in essence causes a left-brain-right-brain division, which then allows for a triggerable reprogrammed union of left and right through neuron pathway stimulations. Once this is accomplished you have a person who can utilize both sides of their brain at once for any simple task.

"Beta programming deals with the primitive mind's reproductive system and sex programming. It eliminates learned moral convictions and stimulates the primitive sex instincts devoid of inhibitions. This training program is for developing the ultimate prostitute -- a sex machine. This is used most by the abusers knowledgeable of the MKULTRA Project Monarch program," Phillips said. (Apparently there are good guys and bad guys even within the cryptocracy?) "Children of knowledgeable persons are being preconditioned through incest and "sold" into the conspiracy for additional Beta conditioning to eventually satisfy the bizarre perversions of politicians, bankers, drug lords, or anyone deemed valuable."

Phillips says that Delta programming, "was originally designed to train special Black Ops and espionage agents' minds for becoming terrorists devoid of fear and basic self preservation instincts capable of incredible feats of physical endurance and murder. Delta eventually was used to train 'a new breed', one who kills and, if caught, self -destructs. This program is now applied to some Beta prostitutes who double as drug mules – to protect the identity of their owners. If they are caught, they die of 'natural causes' or suicide.

Theta programming is: "Psychic programming which evolved into bio-medical human telemetry and directed target energy involving lasers and/or electromagnetics, the results of which are referred to as 'electronic possession'. It's the ultimate challenge for the 21st century exorcist, providing he works a day job as a skilled CIA supported neurosurgeon."

Theta programming, Phillips said, "involved the surgical implantation of sodium/lithium powered high frequency receiver/transducers coupled to a multi-range discharge capacitor that , when signaled by remote control, would electronically stimulate designated parts of the brain to signal the victim to respond according to his or her hypnotic program.

"These "Delgado" experiments were only partially successful," Phillips said, "with a high mortality and paralysis rate. However, the technical mind control equipment evolution has advanced to levels well beyond the grasp of most people. Non-implanted, non-programmed victims will hold the largest majority since, in the 1990's breakthroughs were made which allow mind control without either implant or trauma base".

The new Theta programming," Phillips said, "operates by computer driven satellite directed energy. Now, anybody can become a target of the new technology.

The original physical apparatus for mind control were, according to Phillips, "rather complex and cumbersome. There were elaborate sound and light-proof sensory deprivation isolation chambers using exotic suspension fluids that could mimic weightlessness. Direct current high voltage and very low amperage electroshock devices, plus designer drugs, were the most important tools of the trade as the brain is electrically and chemically powered.

Voltages ranged from .072 volts to 200,000 depending on application and to what part of the body it was to be administered. There were 'strap on' head and foot devices that could deliver a mild altering shock of an exact duration according to he subject's brainwave activity and/or heartbeat. Other portable handheld stun gun type devices can delivered shocks up to 200,000 volts for the instant control of the human conscious mind.

"A great deal of successful research and development went into the effects of harmonics or inaudible sound waves that affect the RNA covering of the neuron pathways to the subconscious," Phillips said. "Harmonics generators, code named ether-wave, are capable of subconscious mind embedding detailed messages -- commands linked to audible triggers. This is known as electronic programming and is a standard programming device in all forms of Project Monarch. Hence the reason many Monarch survivors (drug mules and prostitutes) recall being taken onto certain US military bases and "Freedom Ranches," that are trauma centers for 'reprogramming.'

"Mind altering drugs, both natural and synthetic compounds," Phillips said, "were discovered and developed which can instantly alter certain brain/thought functions. These were developed from modern medical technology and discovered from ancient shamanic and witchcraft formulas.

"The components list is not immense. A sound proofed burial casket makes a great sensory deprivation chamber similar to the one being used at a Kentucky (CIA) conditioning camp in which Delta, Alpha, and Beta victims are regularly put for 'reconditioning' and 'programming' for drug muling assignments. The only other components needed are devices to hang victims upside down by their ankles, cattle prods -- the cylinder type -- that are inserted deep into the vagina or rectum for a simulated 'orgasm with the devil.'

"High voltage (up to 200,000 volts DC) hand-held law enforcement type stun guns are a must tool for the victim's owner to erase certain memories," Phillips said. "They are used on the muscle area of the victims within two hours of the 'to-be-forgotten' event, and to control the victim's 'insane' fits of rage if they are mistakenly triggered to perform a pre-conditioned task when they are at the moment in the 'wrong personality.'

"The only other component the Beta owner must posses," Phillips said, "are a diary or a damn good memory of their programs, keys/triggers, and a working knowledge of hypnosis. In other words, a small briefcase will contain everything a Beta owner needs to control his slave... completely... forever...

"The formula for Beta programming is the exact same as for Alpha. The only difference is that through a series of specific tortures and commands the Beta victim retreats deeper into their (71 % are female, 100% are MPD's most recently called DID) primitive mind: The results are, you have a person with a child-like insatiable sexual appetite. This re-tapped sexual appetite is 'developed' in the formative years through constant incest with a father figure.
